PACIFIC GOLD DREDGING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9524.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1920. Rehearing Denied Jan. 3, 1921.)

1. Master and servant 🔑388—Child, awarded to custody of disappearing mother, held "dependent" on father, within Workmen's Compensation Act.

Though, under Civ. Code, § 196, making the parent entitled to a child's custody liable for his support, a divorce decree awarding custody of a boy to the mother, without requiring the father to contribute to his support, relieved the father from liability for the time being, where the mother abandoned the boy, and disappeared, and was presumptively dead, the father was under a legal duty to provide for him, making the boy "dependent" on him, within the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 844).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dependent.]

2. Parent and child 🔑3(1)—Exemption from liability for support of child awarded to another's custody not unconditional or permanent.

Where a parent is deprived of the custody of a child, and therefore of its services and earnings, he is no longer liable for its support and education; but this exemption is not unconditional, and may not be permanent.

3. Parent and child 🔑3(1)—Statute merely makes parent, given custody, primarily liable for support.

Civ. Code, § 196, providing that the parent entitled to the custody of a child must support him, merely means that such parent is primarily liable for the child's support, and that between such parent and the one deprived of such custody the latter is absolved from liability, in the absence of any decree requiring contribution to such maintenance.

4. Divorce 🔑324—Father, denied custody by divorce decree, may voluntarily resume responsibility for support.

Though a divorce decree awarded custody of a child to the mother, and found that the father was not a fit person to have such custody, where the mother abandoned the child, and disappeared for such time as to be presumptively dead, there was nothing to prevent the father from voluntarily resuming responsibility for the child's support.

5. Master and servant 🔑405(5)—Finding of dependency, within Workmen's Compensation Act, held warranted.

In a workmen's compensation proceeding, evidence held to justify the conclusion that deceased, denied custody of a minor child by a divorce decree, had voluntarily resumed his parental relations and obligations, and assumed the burden of the child's maintenance, education, and support.

6. Master and servant 🔑388—Son a dependent, within Workmen's Compensation Act, where divorced father resumed responsibility for support.

Where a father, deprived of the custody of a son by a divorce decree, had voluntarily resumed responsibility for the son's support and had taken the boy to live with him, the relation of parent and child was restored, and the child was dependent on the father, as though the relation had never been disturbed.

7. Master and servant 🔑388—Child under 18 conclusively presumed dependent, within Workmen's Compensation Act, though working out for board.

Under Employers' Liability Act, § 14, providing that a child under 18 is conclusively presumed dependent on the parent legally liable for his maintenance, there being no surviving dependent parent, where deceased was divorced from his wife, and the custody of a boy was awarded to her, but he voluntarily resumed responsibility for the boy's support, the boy was dependent on him, though at the time of the death working for a third person for his board.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Kenneth Frank Fruit for compensation for the death of his father, John A. Fruit, opposed by the Pacific Gold Dredging Company and others. Compensation was awarded, and defendants bring certiorari. Affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is a proceeding to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation to the respondent Kenneth Frank Fruit, a minor, 15 years of age, under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), on account of the accidental death of his father, John A. Fruit. The commission awarded the maximum amount for total dependency, being three times the annual earnings of the father. The only points in controversy arise upon the question of dependency of the minor upon his father.

It is urged that dependency was not shown, either actual or presumptive. The undisputed facts disclose that the mother of the minor had, on May 16, 1908, procured a decree of divorce from John A. Fruit for extreme cruelty and habitual intemperance, and the custody of the minor son was therein awarded to the mother, on the finding that she was a fit and proper person to have such custody and that the father was not. About two years later the mother placed the boy, the respondent here, in an orphanage in Portland, Or., where they resided when the decree of divorce was obtained, and then disappeared, and since that time neither the directors of the orphanage nor members of her family have had any information or knowledge of her existence or whereabouts.

About the time of the divorce the father also disappeared, and it was not until some 10 years later that the son had any knowledge of or connection with him. In 1918, through a letter from an uncle, the son located his father, who was then employed with a dredging company near Trinity Center, Trinity county, Cal. As a result of correspondence between them, the father sent Kenneth a present of a watch and contributed money to him on several occasions. Subsequently, about April, 1918, the father outfitted the boy with clothing and sent him money for his traveling expenses from Oregon to Trinity county, where he joined his father in May, 1919. They lived together in a cabin on the properties of the dredging company during May, June, and July of 1919; the father providing the boy with his board, clothing, and spending money. From the conversations and relations between them it was apparent that the father manifested his intentions of resuming parental relations with his son and affording him support and education. It was tentatively agreed between them that the father would give up his present employment and move to the town of Westwood, in Lassen county, where he would obtain work and send the boy to school. Before any change of location was made, and 3 or 4 days before the father's death, Kenneth, apparently with his father's consent, left the cabin where they were living and went to Trinity Center, some 2 or 3 miles distant, where he entered the home of a Mrs. Miles, with the understanding that he was to work for his board, and at the beginning of the school term go to school. He was also to receive $1 per day for extra work that Mrs. Miles had in contemplation. No definite duration for this arrangement with Mrs. Miles was agreed upon. This was the situation of the parties when the father met with the accident resulting in his death.

[1, 2] It is probably clear that the decree giving the custody of the boy to the mother relieved the father from all legal responsibility for support of his son and removed all relation of dependency, at least for the time being. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that—

> "The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances."

No requirement was made in the decree that the father should contribute anything to the boy's maintenance. When a parent is deprived of the custody of his child, and therefore of its services and earnings, he is no longer liable for its support and education. Selfridge v. Paxton, 145 Cal. 713, 79 Pac. 425; Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 648, 42 Pac. 428; McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 Pac. 677; Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 129 Pac. 773; People v. Hartman, 23 Cal. App. 72, 137 Pac. 611. This exemption, however, is not unconditional, and may not be permanent. In divorce proceedings power is reserved by section 138 of the Civil Code to the court, at the hearing of the case or at any time during the minority of children of the marriage, to "make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such * * * children as may seem necessary or proper, and it may at any time modify or vacate the same"; and section 139 of the Civil Code provides that "where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband the court may compel him to provide for the children of the marriage," and "may from time to time modify its orders in these respects," and this irrespective of the fact that the control and custody of the children are taken from him. Similarly, section 199, Civil Code, provides for an action between husband and wife without divorce to determine the custody of children of the marriage, with authority in the court to make such order in the decree as to their support, education and maintenance as may be just, and to amend, vary, or modify such decree as the natural rights of the parties, including the children, may require.

[3] The requirement of section 196, Civil Code, means no more than that the parent who is entitled to the custody of the child is primarily liable for its support and education, and between such parent and the one who has been deprived of such custody the latter is absolved from liability, in the absence of any decree of court requiring contribution to such maintenance. It is true that it has been held that a father, deprived of the custody of his child in divorce proceedings, without requirement that he contribute to its support, is not liable to a third party furnishing such child with the necessaries of life (Selfridge v. Paxton, supra); but, under section 207, Civil Code, third persons seeking such recovery are limited in their right of action to the parent in charge of the minor. It is also held, in People v. Hartman, supra, that the defendant was not liable to prosecution, under section 270 of the Penal Code, upon a charge of willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously failing to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance for his infant child. In that case the infant had been given into the custody and control of the mother in a divorce action, without a requirement that the father contribute to its support, and no showing was made that its legal custodian was not abundantly able to care for it. In fact, the opinion states that "there is no evidence that the child failed to receive all 'necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance.'"

We find no authority for holding that, as between parent and child, the father is absolved from his legal duty to provide support to his minor child, who has no other source of maintenance, because, on account of his own fault, he has been deprived of the custody of such child. Both a legal and moral obligation rests upon a father to support his minor children. And while, as between himself and third parties, that obligation may be shifted in proceedings of divorce or guardianship, and he may by misconduct forfeit his right to the custody of his child, it may be doubted if by such proceedings, to which he is not a party, a minor can be deprived of his natural right to turn to his father for maintenance, if the substituted source of supply fails. It has been held that such right to look to a father for maintenance cannot be taken from the infant by contract between the parents (Fernandez v. Aburrea, 183 Pac. 366), and it certainly would be a reproach upon the law if a father, by his own misconduct making him an unfit custodian of the child, could absolve himself from legal responsibility for its support. He, at least, may voluntarily resume his legal responsibility.

[4] Conceding in this case, that the minor was not a dependent upon his father during the period he remained in the custody of his mother, there was nothing in the legal status of the parties at the time Kenneth joined his father in California to prevent the latter from voluntarily resuming responsibility for his son's support. It has been repeatedly held by this court that on the death of the mother, to whom the custody of a child has been given in divorce proceedings, the right to such custody reverts to the father. Schammel v. Schammel, 105 Cal. 258, 38 Pac. 729; Matter of Allen's Estate, 162 Cal. 625, 124 Pac. 237; Bell v. Krauss, 169 Cal. 387, 146 Pac. 874. It is urged that the father in this instance has been divorced for cruelty and intemperance and adjudged an unfit custodian of his child. On the other hand, the mother has been shown to have abandoned the child. Under section 224 of the Civil Code neither of them perhaps could have interfered with the adoption of Kenneth by a third party, but nobody has manifested any desire to adopt him. Is he to be left a waif in the community with no right to parental care, because both his parents have been derelict in their duty toward him?

The mother abandoned him 2 years after her divorce by leaving him in an orphan asylum, where he remained several years without provision for his support. She is presumptively dead, not having been heard from for more than 7 years. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26. The evidence on this point is not very full, but Kenneth testified that both he and his mother's other relatives had made persistent search and inquiry for her without avail.

[5, 6] It is clear that the boy was without means of support and had no legal guardian. Whatever the father's rights were to his son's custody, his duty to provide for him was clear, both legally and morally. The commissioners were justified by the evidence on this point in concluding that the father had voluntarily resumed his parental relations and obligations and had taken the boy to live with him and assumed the burden of his maintenance, education, and support. This being the fact, the relations of parent and child had been restored. The condition of dependency existed at the time of the father's death as though it had never been disturbed, unless it was again suspended by the fact that the boy had taken up a fortuitous residence and employment outside the father's home, some 3 or 4 days before the latter's death.

[7] In considering the relations of the parties at the time of the father's death, if we accept the fact that the duty of support and maintenance had been restored, we must treat the situation precisely as if this relation had never been disturbed. Would it, under the usual relationship between a father and his 15 year old son, be considered for a moment that the status of dependency had been destroyed or interrupted by the fact of such a casual outside employment as is shown here? In any event, the provisions of the Compensation Act are conclusive on this point. Section 14 of the Employers' Liability Act provides:

> "(a) The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee: (2) A child or children under the age of eighteen years * * * upon the parent with whom he or they are living at the time of the death of such parent or for whose maintenance such parent was legally liable at the time of death, there being no surviving dependent parent."

Assuming that the first condition of this conclusive presumption is avoided by the temporary residence and employment of Kenneth with Mrs. Miles, we have left the alternative condition, that of a minor under 18 years of age, whose father at the time of his death was liable for the minor's maintenance, with no other dependent parent. We are of the opinion that the fact of the child being left without any other means of support, whether by abandonment by or death of his mother, restored him to his right of dependency upon the father, and that, in any event, the Industrial Accident Commission was justified in reaching a conclusion favorable to the minor from the evidence showing a voluntary resumption of his parental obligations by the father. The only issue presented here is on the question of dependency, and the findings of the Commission expressly cover that issue.

The award is affirmed.

In re KELLEY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6368.)

1. Insane persons 🔑44 — Guardian cannot dispose of property after ward's death.

After the death of the ward, an incompetent, his guardian has no power to dispose of any property of the estate; but, until he is legally discharged, he is charged with the care and preservation of the ward's property.

2. Insane persons 🔑41 — Compensation of guardian must be confined to time during which he had custody of estate as such.

Where guardian of an incompetent served as such, having custody and control of the incompetent's estate, for 7 months and 16 days from January 28, when he was appointed and qualified as guardian, to September 13, when he turned over all property of the estate to himself as special administrator, the ward having died, and on his first accounting received compensation for 6 months of his guardianship at the rate of $150 a month, any further compensation to which he may be entitled for his services as guardian must be confined to compensation for the remaining month and 16 days during which he had custody of the estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas Jasper Kelley, an incompetent. From an order allowing compensation to his guardian, R. L. Bocock, A. W. Dewey and others, legatees and devisees, and David Beeson, executor and trustee, under the incompetent's will, appeal order reversed, with directions to modify allowance.

Lucien Gray and Leon F. Moss, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by A. W. Dewey, W. W. Sloss, and Luzetta Sanders, legatees and devisees under the will of Thomas Jasper Kelley, deceased, and by David Beeson, executor and trustee under said will, from a decree allowing respondent, R. L. Bocock, $1,650 for services rendered by him as guardian of the person and estate of the said Kelley, incompetent.

On January 28, 1918, the respondent was appointed and qualified as guardian of the person and estate of Kelley, who had previously been adjudged incompetent. On April 22, by order of court, it was determined that respondent was entitled to reasonable compensation at the rate of $150 per month for his services as guardian, and it was ordered that $150 per month to be paid to him out of the funds of the estate "until further notice." Kelley died on August 29, and on September 11 respondent was appointed and qualified as special administrator of his estate. Respondent filed his report of administration as guardian on September 13, together with his first and final account, which contained, inter alia, this charge:

> "Aug. 28. Paid salary for services to R. L. Bocock, 6 mo. at $150.00, $900.00."

Regarding this item, the respondent testified:

> "In my account * * * I have paid myself the allowance made, $900, being for the first 6 months of my services."

August 1, 1919, the court made a decree settling the account. It is from the following portions of this decree that the present appeal is taken:

> "(4) The court further finds that heretofore it made an order allowing the said guardian the sum of $150 per month for services rendered as such guardian, and that such amount should continue until the further order of court; that such services have continued to the date of this order, and that he is entitled to such compensation as such guardian to this time, namely, from the date of the last order, being for the month of August, 1918, amounting to the sum of $1,650, to be credited on said final account. * * *
> "(6) The said account should be and is hereby settled and allowed; * * * that he pay to himself as such guardian the sum of $1,650 in full of services rendered."

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Appellants contend that the evidence does not justify an allowance of $1,650 to respondent for his services subsequent to Kelley's death. This position is thus set forth in their brief:

> "The court should not have allowed the guardian for services in excess of one month and one day, being the period from the time to which he had been paid in full up to the date of the death of the ward. The allowance should have been $155 and no more. Therefore Mr. Bocock, as guardian, was erroneously awarded the sum of $1,495 for alleged services subsequent to the death of the ward."

[1] It is the well-established rule that after the death of the ward a guardian has no power to dispose of any property of the estate. Estate of Livermore, 132 Cal. 99, 64 Pac. 113, 84 Am. St. Rep. 37. Until he is legally discharged, however, he is charged with the care and preservation of the property of the ward. Downing v. Whitney, 46 App. Div. 307, 61 N. Y. Supp. 540; Schouler's Domestic Relations, 5th Ed., sec. 312; Spencer's Domestic Relations, § 786; 21 Cyc. 51. But in the case at bar, respondent, testifying in his own behalf, stated that on September 11, 1918, he had—

> "duly transferred and turned over from himself as guardian * * * to himself as special administrator * * * all the property and funds of said decedent and said estate; and that the cash belonging to said decedent had been by him deposited in the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank * * * in his name as special administrator."

[2] Thus the evidence shows that between January 28, when respondent was appointed and qualified as guardian, and September 13, when he turned over all the property of the estate to himself as special administrator, a period of 7 months and 16 days elapsed, during which he had the custody and control of said estate; that after the last-mentioned date respondent, while not yet legally discharged as guardian, nevertheless had nothing to do in that capacity with the property, and that, according to his first and final account, he had been paid for the first 6 months of his guardianship at the rate of $150 per month. It follows necessarily, we think, that any further compensation to which respondent may be entitled for his services as guardian must be confined to compensation for the 1 month and 16 days during which he had the care and custody of the estate and for which he has not as yet been paid.

It is urged by respondent that in fixing and determining the compensation to which he is entitled as special administrator the probate court has taken into consideration the fact that it had already allowed him compensation as guardian for the period from September 13, 1918, to August 1, 1919, and has therefore refused to allow him compensation for any duties performed by him as special administrator during that period. Respondent argues from this that there is no possibility that he will be allowed double compensation. But it is a sufficient answer to this contention to point out that the probate proceedings are not now before us and that there is nothing in the record to support the statement of respondent to which we have just referred. We are concerned here only with the question whether the court was justified in awarding respondent the sum of $1,650 for his services as guardian after July 28, 1918, and in view of the conclusion we have reached that question must be answered in the negative.

The order is reversed, with directions to modify the allowance in accordance with the views herein expressed.

In re CARSON'S ESTATE.

WALKER et al. v. CARSON et al.

1. Wills 🔑155(5)—Deception does not establish undue influence.

Undue influence which invalidates a will involves as an essential element the subjugation of the mind of testatrix, so that an allegation that the will was procured by the fraudulent representations of the residuary legatee that he was the lawful husband of testatrix does not establish undue influence.

2. Wills 🔑160(½)—Fraud of residuary legatee held to affect only clauses benefiting him.

Fraudulent misrepresentations by the residuary legatee that he was the lawful husband of testatrix, whereby testatrix was induced to make him the residuary legatee and executor, do not invalidate the will as to other legatees, in the absence of any showing that the bequests to them were affected in any way by the misrepresentations.

3. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)—On reviewing nonsuit, evidence must be given its utmost effect.

On reviewing an order of nonsuit, the evidence offered on behalf of appellant must be given its utmost effect.

4. Wills 🔑153—Deception into unlawful marriage is fraud which avoids legacies thereby procured.

One who deceived testatrix into marrying him by fraudulent misrepresentations that he was free to contract a lawful marriage was guilty of fraud, which avoided any bequests by testatrix, procured or induced by the fraud.

5. Wills 🔑324(3) — Evidence held to raise jury question whether bequest was procured by fraudulent marriage.

In proceedings to contest a will for the fraudulent representations of the residuary legatee to testatrix that he was free to marry her, evidence that the will was executed about a month after the marriage, and that testatrix died a year thereafter without ascertaining the truth, is sufficient to warrant an inference that the legacy to contestee was the result of the fraud by which the marriage was procured, though such inference might not be warranted if the marriage relation had continued for a long period of time, and it was error for the court to nonsuit contestants.

6. Wills 🔑166(12)—Fraud as procuring cause of bequest need not be proved by direct evidence.

It is not necessary that parties contesting a will on the ground it was procured by fraudulent representations that the residuary legatee was free to marry testatrix prove by direct evidence that the bequest was induced by the belief of testatrix that the legatee was her legal husband, and that it would not have been made except for that belief, but that fact may be established by inference from circumstances.

7. Wills 🔑285—Discretion in refusing amendment to petition contesting will must be reasonable.

Though the granting of leave to file an amended petition for the contest of a will rests within the discretion of the trial court, that discretion must be reasonably exercised, so that the case may, so far as possible, be determined upon the real facts.

8. Wills 🔑285—Refusal of amended petition for revocation of probate held error.

Where the original petition for contest of a will alleged fraud by the residuary legatee in representing that he was free to marry testatrix, whereas in fact he then had a wife living and undivorced, it was error for the trial court, in the absence of any showing of inexcusable delay by contestants or surprise to contestee, to refuse leave to file an amended petition, alleging that at the time of his marriage to testatrix contestee had several wives living and undivorced.

9. Wills 🔑165(1)—Declarations of testatrix out of legatee's presence admissible on issue of fraud to show state of mind.

In proceedings to contest a will for fraudulent misrepresentations by the residuary legatee that he was free to marry testatrix, declarations by testatrix out of the presence of that legatee to the effect that she believed her marriage to him was legal are admissible, not as evidence of the facts therein stated, but to show her state of mind.

10. Evidence 🔑268, 269(1)—Declarations admissible to show mental state.

Whenever the intention, feeling, belief, or other mental state of a person at a particular time, including his bodily feeling, is material to an issue on trial, evidence of such person's declarations at the time, indicative of his then mental state, are admissible, whether made in the presence of the adverse party or not, but such declarations are only competent to establish the mental state, not the facts stated in the declaration.

11. Wills 🔑164(1)—Exclusion of false statements of legatee relied on as fraud held error.

In proceedings to contest a will for fraudulent misrepresentations by the residuary legatee that he was free to marry when he married testatrix, it was error to exclude from evidence statements by the legatee to the testatrix before their marriage as to his previous matrimonial experiences, which were the fraudulent statements relied on by contestants.

12. Witnesses 🔑276—Contestee of will may be examined by contestant under statute.

In proceedings to contest a will for fraudulent misrepresentations by the residuary legatee that he was free to marry when he married testatrix, is was error to refuse to permit contestants to examine the legatee as to his previous marriages and as to his knowledge that he had a wife living when he married testatrix, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, adopted by St. 1917, p. 58, expressly permitting such an examination of an adverse party, which is only declaratory of an elementary rule of daily application in the trial of cases.

13. Wills 🔑164(1)—Transfer of bank account to supposed husband held admissible to show marriage was cause of bequest.

In proceedings to contest a will for the fraud of the residuary legatee in representing he was free to marry when he married testatrix, evidence that shortly after her marriage testatrix transferred her bank account into the joint names of herself and the residuary legatee was admissible, as tending to show that the bequests to the legatee contained in the will, executed a month after the marriage, were made because of the belief of testatrix her marriage was lawful.

14. Wills 🔑152—Mere mistake is not ground of contest.

Mere mistake, which does not show a want of execution of a will or a want of testamentary intent as to a portion of it, is not ground of contest under Code Civ. Proc. § 1312, so that a mistaken belief by a testatrix, who knew the facts as to the previous matrimonial experiences of the man she married, that he was nevertheless her lawful husband, would not vitiate the will.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Petition by Sarah E. Walker and others against J. Gamble Carson, individually and as executor of the will of Alpha O. Carson, deceased, and others, to contest the will. From a judgment denying revocation of the probate after the contestants were nonsuited at the trial, the contestants appeal. Reversed.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Horace S. Wilson, Daniel M. Hunsaker and Hunsaker & Britt and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, and Joseph P. Sproul and Le Roy M. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. One Alpha O. Carson died, leaving a duly executed will by which she made bequests, aggregating some $35,000, to various relatives, some 41 in number, and left the balance of her estate, something over $100,000 in value, to "my husband J. Gamble Carson." She also nominated the last-named as the executor of the will. The instrument was duly probated, and thereafter and within the statutory time certain of her heirs filed petitions, contesting its validity and asking that its probate be revoked. The residuary legatee, Carson, and some of the other beneficiaries answered the petitions, and trial was had before a jury upon the issues so made. At the trial, the contestants were nonsuited, and judgment was entered denying the revocation of probate. From this judgment the contestants appeal.

The grounds of contest, as alleged, were three: First, a want of due execution; second, undue influence upon the testatrix, alleged to have been exerted by Carson; and, third, fraud upon her, alleged to have been likewise practiced by him. The first ground was abandoned, and may be dismissed from consideration. The substance of both the second and third grounds was that, while Carson had gone through a marriage ceremony with the testatrix a year before her death, and she believed then and always thereafter that he was her husband, and made her will in that belief, yet he was not such legally, because he was already married to a woman who was still living and from whom he had not been divorced. It is also alleged that Carson knew he was not free to marry, and yet represented that he was, and that the testatrix's belief was induced by these false representations. It is also alleged that solely because of this belief she made the will in question, leaving the bulk of her estate to him.

Shortly before the matter came on for trial the contestants offered an amended petition for revocation, and asked for leave to file it. Their application was denied, and the contestants complain of this ruling as error. When it came to the trial, the contestants were also prevented in very large measure from proving their case by rulings of the court excluding their evidence, and of these rulings they also complain. We think the rulings were in truth wrong, but it is apparent that if both the evidence introduced by the contestants and that which they sought to introduce, and were not permitted to, would together not have made out a case justifying the revocation of probate, the result would have been the same, and the errors mentioned were not prejudicial. The first and the most important point in the case, therefore, is, Was the evidence for the contestants, both that which they introduced and that which they sought to introduce, sufficient to justify a revocation of the probate of the will?

[1] In discussing this point, it should be said at the outset that neither the contestants' petition nor their evidence makes out a case of undue influence. The only substantial difference between the second count of the petition, that alleging undue influence, and the third count, that alleging fraud, is that in one it is alleged that the will was executed under the undue influence of Carson, consisting in his deceit, whereby he induced the testatrix to marry him and to assume and maintain the relation of wife and husband with him, and in the other it is alleged that the will was executed through his fraud consisting in the same deceit. There is no allegation of any subjugation of the mind or will of the testatrix to that of Carson, so that in making her will she was not acting freely upon the facts as she believed them to be. Such subjugation of the mind of the testatrix was an essential element of a case of undue influence, and had to be both alleged and proved. It was not alleged, as we have said, nor was there any evidence whatever introduced or offered tending to prove it. It is alleged that the testatrix and Carson lived in closest intimacy and association until her death, but there is no allegation that Carson abused the confidential relation which thus existed. The wrong alleged is the deceit whereby that relation was brought about and came to exist, and not any misuse of the relation as it did exist. The distinction between a case of undue influence and one of fraud is discussed at length in Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, beginning at page 480, 117 Pac. 539, and it is not necessary to repeat that discussion here. Suffice it to say that it is to the effect mentioned, that in order that there be undue influence there must be a subjugation of the will of one to that of another.

[2] The present case is, then, one of fraud only. Being such, there is another point of which we would speak before taking up the sufficiency of the evidence. It seems to have been assumed that in case the contestants showed that the will was induced by the alleged fraud of Carson, the entire will would fail. We do not so understand. There is nothing, either in the allegations of the contestants' petition or in their evidence, which would tend to show that any of the other beneficiaries was a party to Carson's alleged fraud, or that his fraud had any effect upon the testatrix's testamentary intentions other than to induce her to make him her residuary legatee and to appoint him as her executor. So far as the other beneficiaries are concerned, their situation is that the testatrix died leaving behind her a duly executed instrument, expressing her testamentary wishes in their favor unaffected by undue influence, fraud, or other vitiating circumstance. This means nothing more or less than that the will is perfectly valid as to them. The result is that it is only the portions of the will in favor of Carson whose probate should be revoked in case the contestants should succeed, the remaining portions continuing as a valid expression of the testatrix's testamentary intention. 1 Schouler on Wills, Executors, and Administrators, § 248; 14 Cyc. 1149; section 1272, Civ. Code. If it were not possible to separate the portions affected by the fraud from those unaffected, it may be that the whole will would have to fail, but that question is not presented here, for the provisions in favor of Carson are easily and completely separable from the remainder. This being the situation, it is apparent that the beneficiaries, other than Carson, are not affected by the contest, however it may go, and are not interested parties to it.

[3] Passing now to the sufficiency of the evidence, the evidence of the contestants, giving to it its utmost effect as we must do in view of the fact that it is an order of nonsuit which is under review, was confined to showing that the testatrix married Carson under the mistaken belief, induced by his representations, which he knew to be false, that he was free to marry, that she made the will in the belief that he was her lawful husband, and that she was never undeceived upon this point. It also appears that the will was executed about a month after the marriage, and, as we have said, that the parties lived together as husband and wife in closest association until her death at the end of a year. Are these facts sufficient to have sustained a possible verdict by the jury invalidating the will or those portions of it by which Carson benefits? If they are, the order appealed from must be reversed.

[4] We have been cited to but two cases involving substantially the same state of facts as that presented here. They are those of Kenneth v. Abbott, 4 Vesey, Jr., 803, 31 Eng. Reprint, 416, and Wilkinson v. Joughin, L. R. 2 Eq. Cases, 319. In each, the facts were practically identical with those of the present case, and in each a bequest in favor of the supposed spouse was held void for his or her deceit. As authorities to the contrary, we are cited by counsel for Carson to Moore v. Heineke, 119 Ala. 627, 24 South. 374, In re Will of Donnely, 68 Iowa, 126, 26 N. W. 23, Smith v. Diggs, 128 Md. 394, 97 Atl. 712, In re Dries' Will, 69 N. J. Eq. 475, 55 Atl. 814, Taylor v. Higgs, 202 N. Y. 65, 95 N. E. 30, Meluish v. Milton, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 27, and Rishton v. Cobb, 5 My. & Cr. 145, 41 Eng. Reprint, 326. But in every one of these cases, with the exception of the last, there was either an entire lack of evidence that the deceased spouse was unaware of the true state of facts, or else it affirmatively appeared that he or she knew what it was; in other words, it did not appear that there had been any deceit. This, of course, distinguishes these cases at once from the present. In fact it is fairly implied in all that the bequest would have been void if the facts had been as the contestants claim they are here, and this is directly said in several of them. In the last case, that of Rishton v. Cobb, a bequest to a woman to whom the testator had paid court and made a proposal of marriage, which had been refused, was held valid, although unknown to the testator she was not a single woman. The difference between such a case and the present is evident without discussion.

The weight of authority, then, is distinctly in favor of the sufficiency of the contestants' evidence to avoid a nonsuit, and such also we think is the rational view. The gross fraud upon the testatrix is, of course, apparent. According to the evidence, she was seduced by a marital adventurer into a marriage with him which was no marriage in the eyes of the law because of the fact, which he concealed from her, that he had already had at least one, if not more, spouses, legal and illegal, who were still living and undivorced. There can be no question also that if the bequest to Carson were the direct fruit of such fraud, it is void.

[5] The only question in the case, assuming the contestants' evidence to be true, as we must, is, Was the bequest in fact the fruit of the fraud? This is a question of fact which it was for the jury to determine; and, unless it can be said that the jury could have reasonably reached but one conclusion concerning it, and that was that the bequest to Carson was not the direct fruit of his fraud, the evidence was sufficient to prevent a nonsuit.

Now a case can be imagined where, nothing more appearing, as in this case, than that the testatrix had been deceived into a void marriage and had never been undeceived, it might fairly be said that a conclusion that such deceit had affected a bequest to the supposed husband would not be warranted. If, for example, the parties had lived happily together for 20 years, it would be difficult to say that the wife's bequest to her supposed husband was founded on her supposed legal relation with him, and not primarily on their long and intimate association. It might well be that if undeceived at the end of that time her feeling would be, not one of resentment at the fraud upon her, but of thankfulness that she had been deceived into so many years of happiness. But, on the other hand, a case can easily be imagined where the reverse would be true. If in this case the will had been made immediately after marriage, and the testatrix had then died within a few days, the conclusion would be well-nigh irresistible, in the absence of some peculiar circumstance, that the will was founded on the supposed legal relation into which the testatrix had been deceived into believing she was entering. Between these two extreme cases come those wherein it cannot be said that either one conclusion or the other is wholly unreasonable, and in those cases the determination of the fact is for the jury. Of that sort is the present.

[6] We are not unmindful of the fact that the contestants offered no evidence other than that the testatrix had been tricked into the marriage; that in particular they did not offer any direct evidence that the inducing reason in her mind for her bequest to Carson was her belief that he was her legal husband, and that the bequest would not have been made except for that belief. But such direct evidence is not necessary, and not improbably could not possibly be had. It is not an unreasonable inference, from the fact that she had been so recently married when the will was made, that she left the bulk of her estate to Carson because she believed he was her lawful husband, and would not have so left it if she had believed otherwise. Such inference, of course, was subject to being strengthened or weakened by evidence of other circumstances throwing light upon the matter, such as the views of the testatrix upon the sanctity of marriage, her harmonious or other relations with Carson, and the strength of her affection for him. But in the absence of such circumstances the inference mentioned is yet not an unreasonable one from the facts that appear. Our conclusion therefore is that the order of nonsuit should not have been made.

[7, 8] The conclusion so reached requires a consideration of the rulings of the trial judge refusing the contestants leave to file their amended petition and refusing to permit the introduction of certain evidence by them. As to the amended petition, it stated essentially the same matters as the original. The only difference in substance was as to the number of marriages Carson had gone through with prior to the one with the testatrix; the amended petition alleging several instead of one. The reasons for refusing leave to file it do not appear, and the claim of respondent is that the matter was one within the discretion of the court. This is true, but the discretion exercised must be a reasonable one. It has been said time and again in this state that, in the interest of justice, and in order that every case may so far as possible be determined upon its real facts, the amendment of pleadings to accord with the claimed facts should be freely allowed, unless good reason to the contrary appears. No such circumstance as inexcusable delay on the part of the contestants or their taking the adverse party by surprise appears here, and in the absence of some such circumstance we can see no reason whatever why the contestants should not have been permitted to correct or amplify by amendment their allegations as to the previous marriages of Carson.

[9] As to the rulings upon evidence, at the very outset of the trial the contestants sought to introduce testimony of statements made by the testatrix in conversations with others than Carson, evidencing her belief that her marriage to Carson was legal. The evidence was excluded. Later the contestants again sought to introduce such testimony, and it was again excluded, the court announcing that it would admit no evidence of conversations with the testatrix, i. e., of statements by her, except on occasions when Carson was present, the court giving as his reason that statements of a deceased are not competent in a suit for fraud or undue influence, but are competent in a case of unsoundness of mind. The exclusion of the testimony was erroneous.

[10] The rule is without exception so far as occurs to us at the moment, that whenever the intention, feeling, belief, or other mental state of a person at a particular time, including his bodily feeling, is material to an issue under trial, evidence of such person's declarations at the time, indicative of his then mental state, are admissible in evidence. It is wholly immaterial whether such declarations were made in the presence of an adverse party to the litigation or not, or what the character of the litigation is. The sole tests are, Is the intention, belief, or other mental state of the declarant at the time material to the issues under trial, and does the declaration indicate what the declarant's intention, belief, or other mental state at the time was? Est. of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252; Adkins v. Brett, 193 Pac. 251. Of course, if, as is frequently the case, and was the case here, the declarations include or are in the form of statements as to past events, the declarations are not competent as proof of such events, and if that is their only bearing, they are not admissible. This was in fact the only bearing of the declarations excluded in such cases as In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577, and Estate of Gregory, 133 Cal. 131, 65 Pac. 315, referred to by counsel, and those decisions go upon that ground. In the subsequent case of Estate of Arnold, supra, certain declarations which did not bear on the testatrix's mental state were excluded for this reason, and others admitted which did. It is plain here that the belief of the testatrix at all times prior to her death that Carson was free to marry her, and that their marriage was valid, was material to the issues of the case. This being so, evidence of her declarations at any time indicating her then belief to that effect was competent, and should have been admitted.

The trial court did at first admit evidence of statements by the testatrix in Carson's presence that Carson had been married before and had been divorced, saying that the evidence was admissible only as against Carson. Later this evidence was stricken out, and other evidence of similar import refused admission on the theory apparently that it was not competent as against the beneficiaries under the will other than Carson, and, not being competent as against them, was not admissible at all. There are two answers to this. In the first place, as we have said, the other beneficiaries were not in fact interested parties. The cause was one really between Carson alone and the contestants. In the second place, the declarations, while wholly incompetent to prove the matters related and in fact not introduced for that purpose, were indicative of what the testatrix believed the facts were, and were, as we have said, competent to show that belief, both as against Carson and as against anybody else. Nor was it necessary that the declarations be made in the presence of Carson or any other party to the litigation. They were not sought to be introduced as admissions, but as evidence of the testatrix's belief, and for that purpose were clearly competent.

[11] The court also excluded all evidence of statements by Carson to the testatrix as to what his previous matrimonial experiences had been. Some of the evidence so excluded was even as to statements made at the very moment of their marriage. Upon what possible theory such evidence was excluded we are at a loss to understand. The claim of the contestants was essentially that Carson had deceived the testatrix by lying to her. How they could be expected to prove that he had lied to her, except by evidence of lying statements by him, we do not see. Such statements are not hearsay. They are not introduced to prove the truth of the matters stated or narrated in them. On the contrary, the position of the contestants, who were offering the evidence was that the statements were false. The making of false statements by Carson was an essential fact, which the contestants were entitled to prove, just as much as they were entitled to prove any material fact in the case. That it was a verbal fact, an utterance by some one, does not prevent its being proved, and the only way of proving it is by testimony of some one who heard it. It is also immaterial when these false statements by Carson to the testatrix were made, whether before or after the making of the will. The alleged deception by Carson was one extending to the death of the testatrix, and evidence of this deception at all times to the end was material.

[12] Another inexplicable line of rulings was one whereby the contestants were not permitted to examine Carson as to his previous marriages. The court even refused to permit a question of Carson as to whether he did not know when he married the testatrix that a former wife of his was living, and this on the court's own motion and without any objection to the question being made by counsel. The impropriety of such rulings is beyond argument, and we can conceive of no reasonable excuse for them. The court's attention was specifically called to section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 58), which expressly permits of just such an examination of an adverse party. Furthermore, the section is but declaratory of a most elementary rule of daily application in the trial of cases. The rulings were nothing less than a flagrant denial of a common, everyday right of every litigant.

[13] The court also excluded evidence that shortly after her marriage the testatrix transferred her bank account into the joint names of herself and Carson. The rejection of this evidence was not particularly prejudicial, but we think it must be evident that in a case of this sort, where one of the vital questions is whether the bequest to Carson was induced by and based upon the belief of the testatrix that he was her lawful husband, or upon her affection for him independently of that belief, any evidence throwing light upon the relations of the parties, or upon her feelings toward him would have some bearing, and that very considerable latitude of examination should be permitted.

[14] The contestants also make the point that, even if the testatrix knew the actual facts with regard to Carson, but mistakenly believed that he was free to marry, such mistaken belief alone would vitiate the will. This, of course, cannot be true. Mere mistake, which does not in effect show a want of execution of the will, or, what is the same thing, a want of testamentary intent as to a portion of it, is not a ground of contest. Section 1312, Code Civ. Proc.; Est. of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 63 Pac. 775; 40 Cyc. 1143. Furthermore, in Re Will of Donnely, 68 Iowa, 126, 26 N. W. 23, the identical contention under discussion, was presented and denied.

There are no other points which would seem to require consideration.

Judgment reversed.

RHODE v. DOCK-HOP CO. et al.

1. Corporations 🔑232(3)—When capital paid in in property, cash value, and not future value, must be taken as basis.

When the capital of a corporation is paid in in something other than money, the thing accepted must be reasonably near its equivalent, and, while the hopes or prospects for a property affect its immediate cash value, it is that cash value, and not the future value, which must be taken as the basis of capitalization.

2. Corporations 🔑232(1)—Holders of stock issued as fully paid up held not liable as subscribers.

Where an owner of mining claims organized a company to work the property and transferred the claims to it for capital stock and then directed such stock to be issued as fully paid to stockholders of a corporation which previously owned the property but lost it on failure to do assessment work, such stockholders were not subscribers, nor liable as such in a creditor's action based on stockholders' liability.

3. Corporations 🔑268(1)—Complaint in action on stockholders' liability held not to state a cause of action.

In an action by a judgment creditor of a corporation against certain stockholders seeking to collect unpaid balances on the par value of their shares, where it appeared that they were not liable as subscribers, the stock having been issued as fully paid when in fact the value given therefor was not equivalent to the value of the stock, a complaint seeking to hold the stockholders as such, failing to allege circumstances other than the mere fact that they were stockholders, held not sufficient to state a cause of action.

4. Corporations 🔑144—One accepting partially paid stock liable for unpaid balance.

When one accepts partially paid stock which does not purport to be anything else, he does so on the understanding that it is answerable on call for the unpaid balance on it, and that he as its owner must respond to such call, since, when he enters into relationship with the corporation as a stockholder owning stock of that character, he assumes as an incident of the relationship the obligation to respond to calls for further contributions to the capital of the company until such capital is fully paid.

5. Corporations 🔑230—Owners of "watered stock" issued as fully paid up are liable to creditors of corporation.

Where a person accepts ownership of stock which purports to be fully paid, but which is not in fact and is therefore watered stock, he is liable on the principle that one giving credit to a corporation is entitled to rely on its ostensible capitalization as the basis for the credit given the transaction constituting a constructive fraud on the creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Watered Stock.]

6. Corporations 🔑268(5)—Basis of liability of holder of watered stock to creditors of corporation defined.

Liability of a holder of watered stock is based, not on his status as a stockholder, but on a fraudulent transaction, and it is not sufficient in a creditor's action that it be pleaded, proven, and found merely that he is a stockholder owning watered stock.

7. Corporations 🔑244(7)—Transferee of watered stock unaware of character of original issue not liable to creditors.

One who is only a transferee of watered stock, and who did not participate in the transaction whereby it was originally issued, and who took his stock unaware of the character of that transaction, cannot be compelled to make good to a creditor of the corporation the false representation as to the capital of the company which he had no part in making and the responsibility for which he has done nothing to assume.

8. Corporations 🔑244(5) — Innocent transferees of watered stock held not liable to creditor of corporation.

Where a mining company lost its claims for failure to do assessment work, and one interested in the company relocated the claims, organized a new corporation, transferred the claims to it in exchange for stock in excess of the actual value of the claims and directed such stock to be issued to certain stockholders of the former corporation as fully paid up, such stockholders, not being aware of the character of the transaction and being but innocent transferees of the watered stock, held not liable to a creditor of the corporation for the alleged unpaid balance on the par value of their stock.

9. Corporations 🔑268(5) — Creditor seeking to subject interest of holders of watered stock must allege and prove them liable as for constructive fraud.

In a judgment creditor's action to subject alleged unpaid balances of the holders of certain watered stock in a corporation, the burden was on plaintiff to allege and prove that the stockholders acquired their stock under circumstances making them liable on the ground of constructive fraud.

10. Corporations 🔑244(5)—To subject holders of watered stock to claims of a creditor, it is sufficient to show that they had notice or knowledge of its real character.

In order that the holders of watered stock issued as fully paid, when in fact it had been issued in excess of the value of the property transferred to the corporation, may be made liable to a creditor, it is sufficient if it be made to appear that when they accepted their stock they had notice or knowledge of its real character.

11. Corporations 🔑265(5)—Creditor seeking to subject interests of holders of watered stock need not join all such holders.

Where a judgment creditor of a corporation seeks to subject to his claim the alleged unpaid balances owing to the corporation by the holders of watered stock issued as fully paid, it is not necessary to join as defendants all stockholders of that class.

12. Corporations ⚷269(2)—Report of mining engineer as to value of property transferred for stock held admissible in action on stockholder's liability.

Where the owner of certain mining claims transferred them to a newly organized corporation in return for stock issued as fully paid and directed such stock to be issued to certain stockholders without charge, in an action by a judgment creditor of the corporation to subject the interests of such holders of watered stock, a written report of a mining engineer as to the claims transferred to the corporation giving a high opinion of their value, while inadmissible as direct evidence of their value, held competent as to the belief of the directors or the transferor as to the value of the claims.

Wilbur, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by C. D. Rhode against the Dock-Hop Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Ward Chapman, L. M. Chapman, Stahl & Sayles, and McLucas, Mellen & Lawson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Muhleman & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action by the judgment creditor of a corporation against certain of its stockholders, seeking to collect from them what are claimed to be unpaid balances on the par value of their shares. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal.

No contention is made that the plaintiff's claim against the corporation is not valid. The sole point in the case is as to whether or not the defendants are required, because of that claim, to make up any difference which may exist between what was actually paid in on their stock and its par value. Upon this point, the complaint alleged simply that the defendants were subscribers and stockholders of the corporation in amounts specified, and that only 25 cents on the dollar had been paid in on the par value of their shares. The answers of the defendants, in addition to some other defenses, denied that they were either subscribers or stockholders, or that the full par value of their stock had not been paid.

[1] As to the issue presented by the latter denial, the court found in effect that only five-twelfths of the par value had been paid. This finding is attacked as not supported by the evidence, but we think the evidence is ample. The stock had a par value of a dollar a share, and the shares which it was claimed the defendants owned, and which in fact they did own, were part of a lot of 599,995 shares issued as fully paid up, but in consideration for the transfer to the company of certain unpatented mining claims with the improvements upon them. These claims had been previously worked and abandoned by another company, and then relocated by one Knapp, who had been interested in the former company and was one of the promoters of the present debtor company. The history, character, and condition of these claims were such that it is well-nigh incredible that they had an actual immediate value of $600,000, less $5.00, or that the directors of the company believed they had any such value. The directors may have thought that there was a chance of the claims becoming of that value upon development and consequent demonstration of what they actually contained, but there is a very great difference between capitalizing a mining company upon the basis of what it is hoped its ground may be worth when developed, and capitalizing it on the basis of what its ground is actually worth undeveloped. When the capital of a corporation is paid in in something other than money, the thing accepted in lieu of money must be reasonably near its equivalent, and while the hopes or prospects for a property affect its immediate cash value, it is that cash value, and not the future value of the property if the hopes or prospects are realized, which must be taken as the basis of capitalization. Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 674, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265. In this case, the court found that the directors of the company did not believe the claims to exceed in actual value $250,000, and, if any criticism is to be made of the finding, it is that it is too favorable to the defendants, that the figure found is too great, rather than it is too small.

As to the other denial mentioned, namely, that the defendants were neither subscribers nor stockholders of the debtor company, it was admitted at the trial that the defendants were stockholders almost from the inception of the company. It was insisted, however, on the part of the defendants throughout the trial that they were not subscribers. As to the plaintiff, the cause was tried throughout upon the theory that it made no difference whether the defendants were subscribers or not, that the simple facts that they were stockholders and that the shares they held, although issued as fully paid, were in fact issued for property which the directors did not believe was equal in value to the par value of the shares, were enough to warrant judgment against them. Apparently, judging by what took place at the trial, the court itself accepted this theory, and upon it gave judgment for the plaintiff.

It should be said, however, that the court went further than merely finding that the defendants were stockholders, and made a finding as to how they acquired their stock in the first instance. The finding is that the mining claims were transferred to the company by Knapp as the trustee of certain stockholders of the company which had formerly owned them, that the stock to be issued in consideration for such claims was issued to such stockholders upon instructions from Knapp, and that the stock of the defendants was acquired by them in that manner. It is to be noted, however, that such a finding would not make either Knapp or the defendants subscribers to the stock. It does not find that either subscribed to the stock and then transferred the claims in payment of such subscription or subscriptions. At most, the finding is one that Knapp, and through Knapp the defendants, purchased stock from the company in consideration of the transfer of the claims. The difference between subscribing for stock and then paying the subcription either in money or property and a direct purchase of stock without any antecedent obligation, a purchase of treasury stock in other words, is manifest. It is to be said that there was an omnibus finding that all of the allegations of the complaint are true; but, if this finding is not to be disregarded upon the point of the defendants being subscribers because inconsistent with the special finding under discussion, it is as to that point not supported by the evidence, something which will plainly appear when we come to a discussion of the evidence. The case, then, is not one where the defendants are liable as subscribers, but one where, if they are liable at all, it is as stockholders.

[2, 3] It is also to be noted that unless the defendants are to be held liable merely because they were stockholders, and upon the theory that nothing more was necessary to establish their liability, the finding under discussion is not supported by any allegation in the complaint. The complaint alleges only that the defendants were subscribers and stockholders. That they were not subscribers and liable as such is plain. As to their being liable as stockholders, there is no allegation in the complaint other than that they were such. If it be the law that the owner of stock issued as fully paid, but in reality for a consideration known to the directors of the company to be less in value than the par value of the stock, is not liable for the difference in value merely because of his ownership of the stock, but only when there are further circumstances existing in the case, as, for example, that he knowingly participated in the transaction whereby the stock was issued, then there is in the present complaint no allegation of such circumstances, and, it appearing that the allegation that the defendants were subscribers is not true, the complaint does not state a cause of action.

It is also to be noted that there is no finding that either Knapp or the defendants knew or believed that the value of the claim transferred was less than the par value of the stock issued in return for them. The only finding is that the directors of the company so knew and believed, and there is no finding that either Knapp or any of the defendants were directors. There is very serious question as to whether stock issued as fully paid in return for property conveyed to the corporation can be considered as not fully paid, except where it is found that both parties to the transaction, the transferor of the property as well as the company through its directors, knew or believed that the property was not equal in value to the par value of the stock. If the transferor genuinely believes that his property is fully worth the par value of the stock which he is receiving in return for it, it is difficult to see any reason why the transaction should not stand as it is as to him, no matter what the directors may believe, or why he should be compelled at the suit of creditors of the corporation or otherwise to pay more on account of his stock than he agreed to pay. Because of this lack alone in the findings, it is exceedingly doubtful, therefore, if they are sufficient to sustain the judgment. We need not, however, decide the case upon this point.

Finally, in this connection it is to be noted that if the finding that Knapp transferred the claims and received the stock in consideration therefor as trustee for certain stockholders of the former company, among whom were the defendants, is to be taken as a finding that the defendants participated in the transaction, the finding is contrary to the evidence. There is no real dispute as to the facts and no doubt whatever as to what they really are. Knapp had been interested in the former company, and it can fairly be inferred that he was largely responsible for it. He had at one time managed its operations, and had then ceased to do so, undoubtedly because the company was not prospering. A new management succeeded him, and this management finally abandoned operations and something over a year later permitted its claims to lapse by failure to do the necessary assessment work. After this had occurred, Knapp relocated the claims, and, together with one Earl Stuart Rhode, who subsequently married the plaintiff, organized the present company for the purpose of working the property, and transferred the claims to it in consideration for the issue to Knapp of the stock mentioned. Under these circumstances, Knapp directed that the certificates for certain of these shares be made out in the names of certain stockholders of the former company and sent to them. This was done, and with the certificates went a letter from Knapp to each of the recipients of the certificates, reading as follows:

"Dear Sir: When I surrendered control of the affairs of the Hayden Hill Gold Company in October, 1912, to the management which at that time succeeded me, it was with the distinct understanding that the new management would use every effort in their power to put the affairs of the company on a sound business basis and that at least an attempt would be made to raise money from the sale of the treasury stock to the end that something definite might be accomplished in the way of actual development work at the mine.

"However, no work of a beneficial character was ever even attempted by the new management and after wasting nearly a year in costly and useless delays, the board of directors finally met on August 22d last and practically decided to abandon the property without making any effort to preserve the interests of the stockholders. Abandonment was finally consummated despite the protests of Messrs. Rhode and Lemon, constituting a minority of the board of directors and notwithstanding my own repeated appeals that something be done to protect the interests of the stockholders.

"No assessment work was done on the claims held by the company during the year 1913 as required by law and the property lapsed to the government January 1st, 1914. It was at this juncture that I personally assumed the task of protecting my own interests and that of the stockholders who were unable to protect themselves, with full knowledge that the smaller stockholders of the Hayden Hill Gold Company were not even given an opportunity to protect their investment, and actuated by a sense of justice and fair play I have succeeded in making terms with the Lord Stuart Gold Company which enables me to reimburse you for the loss of your holdings in the Hayden Hill Gold Company by having an equal number of shares of the stock of the Lord Stuart Gold Company issued to you without any cost to you whatever. Herewith inclosed you will find certificates covering same. Kindly acknowledge receipt.

"I will say in conclusion that the property now held by the Lord Stuart Gold Company is in my opinion very valuable and under capable management if backed by sufficient funds could be made to pay well. The many delays in the development of the properties have not shaken my faith in their value and if the new management meets with the support from the stockholders that it deserves good results will follow, but it must be borne in mind that it will take money to prosecute the work of development to the point where the concern can be placed on a self sustaining basis, and the funds to begin this work must come from the stockholders. It therefore behooves the stockholders to protect their holdings and contribute to the success of the enterprise by the purchase of the treasury stock now for sale to the end that the affairs of the company may be placed on a sound financial basis. Assuring you that I will put forth every effort within my power to co-operate with the new management to the end that the enterprise may be made a success, I am,

"Very sincerely yours,"

Now, whether the motive actuating Knapp in so distributing the stock was that stated in the next to the last paragraph of his letter, namely, that he desired to protect the investments of certain stockholders in the former company, or whether it was that which might be inferred from the last paragraph, namely, that he desired to interest them so that they would purchase treasury stock and give the company some money of which it very much stood in need, or whether, as may well have been the case, it was a mixture of the two, we need not stop to inquire. In any case, his action in distributing the stock, instead of keeping it all himself, was not due to any legal obligation which he owed the distributees, or to any legal relation existing between him and them. It was a purely voluntary thing done by him for motives of his own, without consultation with the distributees and without knowledge on their part that he had any intention of doing it. He calls himself a trustee for them, to be sure; but it is perfectly evident that he was a wholly self-constituted trustee, so that his actions in relocating the claims, participating in, if not inspiring, the organization of a new company to take them over, transferring the claims to that company in return for its stock, and then distributing the stock, were purely his own and were not done by him in any representative capacity. There is one circumstance which destroys at once any claim of real trusteeship. If he were in any real sense a trustee for stockholders of the former company, he was certainly a trustee for all of them. Unless his relationship or character in that respect was a purely voluntary thing on his part, no reason appears why he should be trustee for some and not for others. But he recognized no relationship to the old stockholders as a class. It is only certain ones whom he selects, who are the recipients of his doubtful bounty in the way of stock. This is wholly inconsistent with any thought except that he was acting entirely on his own responsibility without any obligation or reason except such as he himself was willing to recognize. The final fact, in other words, appearing unmistakably from the evidence, is that the defendants did not participate in the transaction by which the stock was issued, either directly, or indirectly by way of representation through Knapp, but acquired and held their stock merely as transferees of Knapp.

It is also to be noted that while perhaps there is evidence which would justify a finding that the defendants, when they received and accepted their stock, knew that it was issued for a consideration less in value than its par value, there is no such finding, and the evidence is by no means conclusive, so that the fact must be considered as undetermined.

The facts of the case, then, upon the pleadings, findings, and evidence, are: (1) That the defendants were not subscribers; (2) that they did not directly or indirectly participate in the transaction whereby their stock was issued for a consideration less than its par value; (3) that it does not appear that the defendants knew when they accepted their stock that it had been so issued; and (4) that the defendants acquired their stock merely as the transferees of one of the parties of the original transaction by which it was issued. Upon these facts, if the defendants are to be held liable, it must be because it is the law that one owning stock issued as fully paid but in fact for a consideration less than its par value and known to be so issued by those participating in its issuance is liable for the difference between what the corporation did receive and what it should have received, merely because of the ownership of the stock, regardless of anything further, and in particular regardless of the facts that the stock was acquired by transfer, that its present owner did not participate in the transaction by which it was issued, and did not know that it had been issued for a consideration fictitious in part. Whether such be in truth the law is the prime question presented on this appeal, and the answer to it is determinative as to whether the judgment against the defendants shall be affirmed or reversed. To its consideration we pass.

It is to be noted at the outset that there is a marked difference beween the case of one acquiring and accepting stock which is only partially paid and does not purport to be otherwise, and the case of one acquiring and accepting stock which purports to be fully paid, but is not in fact, which is, in other words, what is commonly known as watered stock. The difference between the two kinds of stock is apparent and is thoroughly well recognized, and the liability of the owner in the one case to make good upon call his share of the unpaid balance of the capital of the company and his liability to do so in the other case depend upon entirely different principles. And yet the two cases are much confused, and it is not infrequently sought to apply to one class of cases the principles applicable to the other.

[4] It is apparent that, when one accepts partially paid stock, which does not purport to be anything else, he does so, or must be taken to do so, upon the understanding that it is answerable upon call for the unpaid balance upon it, and that he as its owner must respond to such a call. When he enters into relationship with the corporation as one of its stockholders owning stock of that character, he assumes as an incident of the relationship, the obligation to respond to calls upon him for further contributions to the capital of the company until such capital is fully paid in. See 3 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 564a, and authorities there cited; Perkins v. Cowles, 157 Cal. 625, 108 Pac. 711, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, 137 Am. St. Rep. 158; Union Savings Bank v. Leiter, 145 Cal. 696, 703, 79 Pac. 441; Geary, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, etc., Co., 179 Cal. 46, 175 Pac. 457.

[5] But where a person accepts the ownership of stock which purports to be fully paid, a very different situation is presented. It cannot be said of him for a moment that he accepts the stock and enters upon the relation of stockholder to the corporation upon any understanding that his stock is liable for further calls on capital account, or that he, as an incident of his ownership and consequent relationship, assumes any such obligation. On the contrary, it is evident that he accepts the ownership of the stock and enters upon the relationship of stockholder with just the contrary understanding. What, then, is the principle upon which the holder of watered stock is, under any circumstances, held obligated to supply substance instead of water, to make good what it is pretended the corporation received but did not? The answer to this question is not in doubt. The stockholder is held upon the principle that one giving credit to a corporation is entitled to rely upon its ostensible capitalization as the basis for the credit given, and that, when the corporation issues watered stock and thereby assumes an ostensible capitalization in excess of its real assets, the transaction necessarily involves the misleading of subsequent creditors, and, whether done with that purpose actually in mind or not, is at least a constructive fraud upon such creditors. In other words, the essence of the right of the creditor to brush aside the issuance of the stock as fully paid, and to show that it was not such and to compel the payment of the balance upon it, is that its issuance as fully paid was as to him a fraud. This is now the view generally accepted in this country. 2 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 401a, and authorities there cited.

Such likewise is the view which obtains in this state. It is true that some of our earlier decisions put the right of recovery in such a case upon the so-called trust fund doctrine. See Vermont, etc., Co. v. Declez, etc., Co., 135 Cal. 579, 583, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143. It is doubtful if by this doctrine is meant anything other than that the capital of a corporation constitutes a fund upon which its creditors have a right to rely for the payment of their claims, and that if the corporation, by knowingly issuing stock as fully paid when it is not, represents its capital to be greater than it really is, its action is a fraud upon its creditors. If the trust fund doctrine means this, the gravamen of the creditors' right of action to compel the making good of the representation as to the corporation's capital is still fraud, and the trust fund doctrine is but another way of expressing the same underlying idea. Whether this be or be not the true interpretation of the trust fund doctrine, the later decisions of this court place the right of recovery against the owner of watered stock squarely on the ground of fraud, and in one instance at least are wholly inconsistent with any other view. Thus it is said in Harrison v. Armour, 169 Cal. 787, 790, 147 Pac. 1166, 1167:

> "In such cases the rule is that where the corporation and stockholder have agreed upon a given valuation for the property transferred, such valuation is binding and conclusive unless it is fraudulent in purpose or effect. But if the parties have put upon the property a valuation in excess of what they knew or believed to be its true value, this is a constructive fraud upon the creditors and the stock will be deemed paid only to the extent of the actual value of the property received in exchange for it."

See, also, Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 672, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265.

In Sherman v. Harley, 178 Cal. 584, 174 Pac. 901, 7 A. L. R. 950, following an intimation in Herron Co. v. Shaw, just cited, a recovery was refused a creditor where it appeared that at the time he gave the corporation credit he knew that part of its ostensible capitalization was water. Such a holding is inconsistent with any view other than that essentially the creditor's right of action is based on fraud, and that therefore where he has not been misled by the fictitious capitalization he has no cause of action. In fact, the court makes the following quotation from 4 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 3983, as stating the reason of the decision:

> "On principle and authority, a creditor who deals with the corporation with full knowledge of the manner in which its shares have been paid for is not defrauded by the taking of overvalued property as payment of stock, and is estopped to raise that question."

It must be taken, then, that the right of a creditor of a corporation, which knowingly issues shares as fully paid when they are not, to compel payment on them in full, proceeds upon the ground of fraud. This ground is entirely different from the ground upon which proceeds his right in the case of shares only partially paid up and issued as such, and it follows that a recovery may be had in the latter case when it cannot be in the former. In the case of partially paid shares issued as such, the stockholder, when he accepts his shares and enters upon the relation of stockholder, does so, as we have said, upon the condition that his shares are subject to call for the unpaid balance upon them, and that he, as their owner, will respond to such call. This obligation is an asset of the corporation which it may enforce, and which, if it does not itself do so, its unpaid creditors may themselves enforce if it be necessary for the full discharge of their debts. It makes no difference, therefore, in such a case, whether any particular stockholder against whom a recovery is sought was a party to the original transaction whereby the stock was issued or is only a transferee of some such party. He is liable simply as the owner of the stock and because of the relationship with the corporation which he voluntarily assumed when he accepted such ownership.

[6] Such, however, is not the situation of the stockholder owning shares ostensibly fully paid but not so in fact. He owes the corporation no duty to make good the difference, and there is no obligation on his part which is an asset of the corporation or which the corporation may enforce. Garretson v. Pac. Crude Oil Co., 146 Cal. 184, 188, 79 Pac. 838, and authorities there cited. He is liable only because of the original transaction whereby the stock was issued for a fictitious consideration, and then only to those who were defrauded thereby. His liability, in other words, is not based upon his relationship to the corporation as a stockholder but upon a fraudulent transaction. Upon the plainest principles, therefore, he cannot be held liable unless he was either a party to the transaction in the first instance or has in effect in some manner made himself a party since. It is not sufficient to justify a recovery against him that it be pleaded, proven, and found only that he be a stockholder owning watered stock. Upon those facts alone the full elements necessary to make a cause of action against him do not appear.

[7] The result is that one who is only a transferee of watered stock, and did not participate in the transaction whereby it was originally issued and who took his stock unaware of the character of that transaction, cannot be compelled to make good the false representation as to the capital of the company which he had no part in making and the responsibility for which he has done nothing to assume. This is now the well-nigh universal rule in this country (3 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 564f), and it is a necessary result of the underlying principle upon which a recovery is permitted in the case of watered stock. Nor has any different rule been laid down in this state. While perhaps the distinction between the liability of the owner of partially paid shares and that of the owner of watered shares has not always been clearly made in our decisions, it will be found upon examination that in every case where a recovery has been permitted against one acquiring stock by transfer simply because of his ownership of the stock without anything further, the defendant has been the owner of but partially paid stock, that is, stock which did not purport to be fully paid. The most notable instance wherein such a recovery was permitted is that of Perkins v. Cowles, 157 Cal. 625, 108 Pac. 711, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, 137 Am. St. Rep. 158. This case is in fact strongly urged upon us as decisive of the present case in favor of the plaintiff. There the defendants were transferees of the stock of a corporation, and were held liable to make up the balance unpaid upon their shares at the suit of the corporation's trustee in bankruptcy. But, as plainly stated in the opinion, the stock appeared on the books of the corporation as but partially paid. The defense of the defendants was that the parties from whom they bought had represented to them that the stock was fully paid, and that the corporation had itself so represented to them by issuing them certificates which contained no notation that the shares evidenced by them were not fully paid. As to this defense, it was held (and this holding was the real point of the case) that the representation by some one else than the corporation that its shares were fully paid was not binding on the corporation or its creditors, and that the issuance of certificates without any notation as to whether the shares were fully paid or not was not a representation by the corporation that they were fully paid. Upon this latter point the decision differs apparently from the rule generally followed elsewhere (3 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 564f), but its correctness in this respect is not material here, nor is it of particular importance now because of the subsequent amendment to section 323 of the Civil Code requiring all certificates representing partially paid shares to indicate that fact. For the purposes of our present discussion, the point in connection with Perkins v. Cowles is that the case was one where a fictitious credit by way of payment upon the stock was not given, and where it was held that the defendants must be considered as having acquired their stock upon the basis that it was but partially paid stock. It is also worthy of note that in the case of Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265, involving the liability of the owner of watered stock, and decided very shortly after Perkins v. Cowles, the question as to the liability of such an owner who acquires his stock by transfer is expressly reserved. There was no necessity for such reservation if it had been the intention of the court to decide the question in Perkins v. Cowles. We are free, then, to follow the rule that the transferee of watered stock who takes it in ignorance of its real character is not required, even at the suit of a creditor of the company, to pay in anything more upon it, and we have no hesitation in following it, both as the rule almost universally adopted elsewhere, and as the only one consistent with the principle upon which a recovery is permitted in any case against the owner of stock issued by the corporation as fully paid.

[8, 9] It may be added that any other rule would have the effect of possibly subjecting the innocent purchaser of corporate stock to obligations in large amounts of which he had no conception when he acquired his stock. The injustice of this and the serious hindrance it would be to the free sale and disposal of corporate stocks are strong reasons in addition for the adoption of the rule stated. The conclusion so reached necessitates a reversal of the judgment against the defendants in the present case, since, so far as appears, they were but innocent transferees of the watered stock because of which it is sought to charge them.

It may perhaps be said that the burden was on the defendants to allege and prove as a defense that they did not acquire their stock under such circumstances as would make them liable. The answer to this is that it was an element of any cause of action against them that they be connected in some manner with the fraudulent transaction by reason of which alone they can be charged, and that by the most elementary rules of pleading and proof, the burden rested upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that such element existed. See, also, Finletter v. Appelton, 195 Pa. 349, 45 Atl. 1063; Davies v. Hall, 64 Wash. 292, 296, 116 Pac. 833, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 750.

It may also be said that it clearly appears from the evidence that the defendants gave nothing for their shares and were not purchasers for value. But this is not a case where the doctrine of bona fide purchasers for value has any application. That doctrine is always one applied to protect one who has acquired certain property from some equitable charge against the property. 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 737–743. The present action is not one to enforce some equitable charge upon the defendants' shares. It is essentially one to compel the defendants to make good a false representation in defraud of the plaintiff; a suit to enforce an alleged personal liability, not a suit to enforce a lien or claim against the stock in the hands of the defendants. As an element of such a cause of action against the defendants, they must be shown either to have participated in the making of the representation or in some manner to have assumed responsibility for it. The mere fact that they received their stock as a gratuity does not show either. The fact may still be that they knew nothing about the representation and had no part in it, and cannot justly be held responsible for it in any way.

[10] In view of the necessity for a new trial, there are three further points which should be determined for the guidance of the court and parties. The first of these is as to what is necessary in order to show that the defendants, acquiring, as they did, their stock by way of transfer from Knapp, assumed responsibility for the fraudulent representation involved in the issuance of the shares as fully paid; is it enough to show that they acquired their stock with notice or knowledge that it was issued for a consideration fictitious in part, or must something more be shown? As to this, we think it sufficient that it appear that when the defendants accepted their stock they had notice or knowledge of its real character. We can see no reason why one who accepts stock with notice or knowledge that it is but partially paid, although issued as fully paid, should not be held to assume the same responsibility which he would assume if the stock were issued for what it really is, partially paid stock. He knows, or should know, its real character, and should be charged as if its ostensible character were what it really is. This is also we believe the practically universal rule of the decisions in other jurisdictions. 3 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 564f.

[11] The second point which should be decided for the purposes of a new trial is raised by the fact that it appears that there are other stockholders who stand in exactly the same position as the defendants, and who are liable if the defendants are liable, and yet they have not been made parties to the action. The contention of the defendants is that they should have been made parties defendant with them. But the question presented was carefully considered in Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, and there decided contrary to the defendants' contention, and that decision has been since approved and followed. See, for example, Blood v. La Serena, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 764, 89 Pac. 1090. It would require the strongest reasons to justify us in now overruling it, even if we had serious doubts as to its correctness, which we have not. It is attempted to distinguish Baines v. Babcock from the present case on the ground that the former was one to compel the payment of unpaid balances on stock subscriptions, while the latter is to compel the payment of unpaid balances on watered stock. But so far as the point under immediate consideration is concerned, the distinction is one without a difference.

It should, perhaps, be said that the question whether a creditor can recover in such a case as the present for the benefit of himself alone, or whether he can recover only by a creditors' bill for the benefit of all creditors who choose to join with him, is entirely different from the question as to the necessity of making other stockholders parties defendant. But the question, while possibly suggested by the parties, is not argued by them, and as a matter of first impression would not seem to be free from doubt. See Baines v. West Coast Lumber Co., 104 Cal. 1, 37 Pac. 767; Seymour v. McAvoy, 121 Cal. 438, 53 Pac. 946, 41 L. R. A. 544; Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 522, 55 Pac. 393; Daggett v. Southwest, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 762, 103 Pac. 204; In re La Jolla, etc., Co. (D. C.) 243 Fed. 1004. Under these circumstances, we have no opinion to express concerning it, and make mention of it only that it may not be confused with the question we do decide as to parties defendant.

[12] The third point on which it is advisable that we express an opinion for the purposes of a new trial is presented by the refusal of the trial court to receive in evidence a written report on the mining claims transferred by Knapp, made by one claiming to be a mining engineer and painting the prospects of those claims in sunset colors of a vivid hue. As direct evidence of the value of the claims, the report was, of course, pure hearsay, and inadmissible. If, however, it appeared, or there was sufficient to justify the inference, that it was before the minds of the directors of the company, or the mind of Knapp when the claims were transferred in return for the stock, it was competent evidence as to the belief of the directors or Knapp as to the value of the claims. It was open to both sides to show whatever the directors and Knapp had in mind which would affect their judgment in that respect. How far it can reasonably be considered that the particular report could really affect the judgment of any rational man of any experience whatever, is a question as to its weight.

Judgment reversed, with directions that the parties be granted leave to amend their pleadings, if they so desire.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SLOANE, J.; LENNON, J.

WILBUR, J. I dissent. I think that the finding that Knapp was the agent of the defendants in purchasing the capital stock is sufficiently sustained by the evidence and the inferences properly deducible therefrom. In view of the fact, however, that the finding is a general one and that it is fairly apparent from the record that neither court nor counsel had in mind the difference between the liability of the subscribers and transferee for the unpaid subscription resulting from the overvaluation of the property received in exchange therefor, I am satisfied that a new trial, where that distinction is observed, is desirable. I concur in the main opinion as to the law with reference to the nonliability of transferees of stock, where the stock certificates indicate upon their face that it is fully paid, as the certificates do in this case, by reason of the present requirements of section 323 of the Civil Code, hereinafter quoted. As stated in the main opinion, this court has never before passed upon the rights of transferees under similar conditions. The cases of O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, 154 Cal. 53, 97 Pac. 1, Perkins v. Cowles, supra, and Geary Street Railroad Co. v. Bradbury Estate Co., supra, all dealt with stock certificates issued before the 1907 amendment to section 323 of the Civil Code, which provides as follows:

> "Certificates of Stock, How and When Issued.—All corporations for profit must issue certificates for stock when fully paid up, signed by the president and secretary, and may provide, in their by-laws, for issuing certificates prior to full payment, under such restrictions and for such purposes as their by-laws may provide, but any certificate isued prior to full payment must show on its face what amount has been paid thereon."

I concur in the main opinion that, where a certificate of stock is issued under this law, a bona fide purchaser, without notice, may rely upon this representation by the corporation, and, in such case, is not liable for the deficiency in payment, for the stock resulting from the constructive fraud in its issuance as fully paid up in exchange for overvalued property. It is true, as stated in Herron Co. v. Shaw, supra, 165 Cal. 674, 133 Pac. 490, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265:

> "On principle, we perceive no essential difference between an exchange of full paid stock for property at a known overvaluation and a sale of such stock for money at less than par value, such as was considered in Vermont M. Co. v. Declez."

In either case, as I understand the main opinion, the transferee, if he purchases the stock in reliance upon the representations upon the face of the certificate that it is fully paid up, and without actual or constructive notice to the contrary, is not thereby obligated to make up the deficiency to the creditors of the corporation.

On the other hand, as to stock issued previous to the amendment to section 323 of the Civil Code, the purchaser, without notice that the subscription price was partly unpaid, would nevertheless be liable for the unpaid amount of the subscription therefor, unless there was some affirmative representation by the corporation that the stock was fully paid; and, under the doctrine of Geary Street Railroad Co. v. Bradbury Estate, supra, in the absence of an express representation by the corporation that the stock is fully paid, the purchaser is bound to make inquiry of the officers of the corporation to ascertain whether the stock is fully paid, and unless so informed, is charged with knowledge of the entries in the capital stock account of the corporation with reference to the issuance of the stock. If I have thus correctly interpreted the effect of the main opinion, I concur fully therein. This conclusion is in harmony with our previous decisions and in accord with the general trend of decision throughout the United States.

YUBA INV. CO. v. YUBA CONSOL. GOLD FIELDS. (Sac. 2797.)

1. Deeds 🔑124(3)—Conveyance sufficient in form to convey fee.

Conveyance from the owner of land in the bed and on the banks of the Yuba river, known to contain placer gold, made to the United States government to enable a commission to preserve the navigability of the Sacramento river, held sufficient in form, both in the granting and habendum clauses, to convey the fee to the government; reservation of mining rights in the grantor not being inconsistent with such grant of a fee.

2. Evidence 🔑462—Declarations during negotiations concerning purpose of deeds cannot be considered.

Declarations during the negotiations concerning the purpose of deeds and the rights of the parties with reference to the use of the property cannot properly be considered, for the purpose of modifying or changing the terms of the document itself; the evidence having been ostensibly offered, in view of Civ. Code, § 1625, to place the court in the situation of the parties and enable it to interpret the deed.

3. Easements 🔑1—Declaration of purpose of conveyance would not change conveyance into one of easement.

Though it is apparent, from the negotiations and circumstances surrounding execution of a deed to the United States government, that the purpose of the government in securing the land was to construct certain works to prevent the deposit of mining silt in a river, and to use the particular tract as a settling basin, the fact would have no greater effect than a declaration to the same effect in the deed, and such an express declaration would not convert a deed otherwise conveying a fee into one conveying a mere easement for such use.

4. Easements 🔑14(1)—Provision authorizing deposit on one tract of earth dredged in mining from other, inured to benefit of such other tract.

Provision of contract between owner of land and government, acquiring tract for settling basin, etc., in aid of works to preserve the navigability of a river, authorizing deposit on one tract of 14,000,000 cubic yards of material from the mining operations of the grantor, held to have been to make provision for an overload of 14,900,000 cubic yards to be removed in gold-mining dredging from another tract of the land; such right inuring to the benefit of such other tract, which became the dominant estate, to which the easement appertained.

5. Mines and minerals 🔑55(6)—Successor of mining rights of grantor held entitled to extract metals, though destroying surface.

In view of the principle that the right to precious metals implies the right to mine them, the statutory rule that reservations and exceptions in a conveyance are to be construed in favor of the grantor, and the express reservation and exception by the grantor to the government of gold-bearing lands of the right to use the premises in any manner not inconsistent with the use by the government, and the fact that the premises could still be used by the government as a settling basin, the purpose contemplated, in aid of navigation, if the minerals were extracted with due regard to such use, etc., successor of the grantor's mining rights in a tract of the land, fee in which was conveyed to the government, held entitled to extract the precious metals, though the effect would be to wholly destroy the surface.

6. Deeds ⚷140, 143—Reservations and exceptions to be construed for grantor.

Reservations and exceptions in a deed by the statutory rule are to be construed in favor of the grantor.

7. Mines and minerals ⚷55(6)—Right of remote grantee, as against successor of grantor, to deposit detritus from mining, limited to reasonable necessity.

Where land was conveyed in fee to the government for use in constructing works in aid of navigation, and the government conveyed to a gold-mining corporation, the right of such corporation to deposit detritus on a tract of the land in which another company has succeeded to the original grantor's mineral rights held limited to what was reasonably necessary to enable it to conduct its dredge-mining operations on its own tract, etc.

8. Use and occupation ⚷1—Successor of grantee entitled to recover from grantor only after demand.

Grantee from the United States government of land conveyed to it for use for certain works in aid of navigation, the grantor reserving the use and possession of the premises in so far as not interfering with the use and possession of the United States, can recover from the grantor for the value of the use and occupation of the property by him only after demand was made upon him or his successor for possession, and only for the period subsequent to such demand.

Wilbur, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the Yuba Investment Company against the Yuba Consolidated Gold Fields. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles W. Slack and Chauncey S. Goodrich, both of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, A. F. Jones, of Oroville, and Thos. H. Breeze, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, and J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to quiet title. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals.

Both parties claim under James O'Brien, who on December 6, 1901, made a quitclaim deed of the property to the United States of America, containing certain agreements, reservations, and exceptions. The interpretation of this deed forms the basis of this controversy. The title of the United States was conveyed to the defendant October 30, 1911. Whatever interest in the property remained in the grantor, except as noted near the end of this opinion, was conveyed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff contends, and the trial court held, that the deed to the government merely conveyed an easement; that this easement was abandoned by the government, and consequently its subsequent conveyance to the defendant was of no effect. The defendant, on the other hand, claims that the deed of O'Brien conveyed the fee to the government, and that the proper decision of the case turns on the nature and extent of the rights reserved to O'Brien and conveyed by him to the plaintiff. The pivotal question in the case is whether or not the government acquired a mere easement. Such facts as are necessary to the determination of that preliminary question will now be stated, and later, in considering the other questions involved, such additional facts will be stated as are necessary to an understanding and decision of such points.

At the time of the conveyance O'Brien was the owner of a large amount of land in the bed and on both banks of Yuba river, a tributary to the Sacramento river. Some of this land was known to contain placer gold. The California Débris Commission, in order to preserve the navigability of the Sacramento river, planned to impound the detritus in the Yuba river resulting from mining operations, thus preventing its deposit in the Sacramento river, by constructing certain reclamation works, including dams and levees, to form a settling basin on the land of O'Brien. For that purpose negotiations were entered into with him with a veiw to acquiring the necessary land and rights for such purposes. The deed in question resulted. It covered, not only the parcel of land involved in this suit, but by separate description and different reservations and exceptions certain other large tracts of land. These various parcels of land are separated into three tracts, with different reservations applying to each. These tracts are designated "First," "Second," "Third." Tract "First," the land in controversy, contains over 1,000 acres, and most of it is designated, upon a plat attached to and made a part of the deed, as "South Basin." Tract "Second" in large part lies between the official banks of the Yuba river. Tract "Third" contains 442 acres, and is bounded on the north by the official left bank of the Yuba river, and on the south by the Linda levee, and is marked "Dredging Ground" on such plat. This tract is owned by the defendant and is spoken of throughout the brief as the "442-acre tract." The granting clause of the conveyance is the usual quitclaim, stating that the grantor "has remised, released, and forever quitclaimed," etc., to the United States of America the parcels of land shown upon the attached map and thereinafter more particularly described. The habendum clause is in the usual form, to the grantee and its successors. The reservations and exceptions relate to the precious metals, the right to extract the same, the deposit of detritus, and the use and occupation of the premises.

The Reservation and Exceptions Concerning Use.

The reservation of the use of tract "First" is as follows:

> "But reserving and excepting unto said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, * * * the use and possession of such premises in so far as the same may not interfere with the use and possession of the premises by said party of the second part, its authorized agents, employees or contractors, for any and all purposes that it or they may see fit to use the same, said use and possession so reserved to be subject to all the rules and regulations and orders of the said party of the second part, its agents and employees."

In tract "Second," which was covered by placer mining claims, the reservation with reference to the use is as follows:

> "But reserving and excepting unto said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, the use and possession of said premises in so far as the party of the first part would otherwise be entitled to by virtue of said mining claims."

Then follows a proviso similar to that with reference to tract "First" above quoted, to the effect that such use must not interfere with the use and occupation by the government. But it is also stated that:

> "This reservation shall in no wise be construed as granting, confirming, or conceding to the grantor the validity of said mining claims."

There is no specific reservation of the right to use tract "Third," except that there is also reserved "the right to extract precious metals therefrom."

The Reservation of Precious Metal.

The reservations and exceptions with reference to precious metals are different in the different tracts. In tract "First" the grantor reserves and excepts "all precious metals in or on said premises and the use and possession of said premises," etc. In tract "Second" the grantor merely reserves the right to the use and possession of the same as mining claims. In tract "Third" the grantor reserves and excepts all precious metals in or on said premises, with the right to extract the same.

There is nothing in the granting clause of the deed which in any wise limits the title conveyed, nor do the reservations or exceptions expressly limit it. No right reserved is at all inconsistent with the grant of a fee in tract "First," except the right to the use and occupation of the premises, which, according to the terms of the reservations and exceptions, is at all times subject to the grantee's use, for any and all purposes for which it may see fit to use the same. If, in the reservation of the right to the use and occupation of the premises, such right was merely subordinate to the use of the same premises by the government as a settling basin, or for works erected for the purpose of impounding detritus in the Yuba river, the argument that the deed merely conveyed an easement to the government for that purpose would be much stronger. Before finally determining the proper construction of the deed, it remains to be considered whether the other provisions of the deed, and the facts and circumstances relied upon by respondent in connection with the execution of the instrument, now to be stated, aid in such determination.

Gold mining in this neighborhood is conducted by dredgers, floating on an artificial pond, which handle all the material from the surface to the bedrock. Tract "Third," designated upon the map as "Dredging Grounds," is to be completely surrounded by banks and levees constructed by the grantor. This tract is referred to in the deed as the tract of land "to which said mining privilege applies," and it is provided that the embankments constructed by the grantor surrounding this parcel "shall be sufficiently thick and strong to permit the land surrounding the same to be safely used as a settling basin." Tract "First," in controversy, it is to be remembered, bounds this dredging ground on the south. It is provided that the embankments and levees around tract "Third," as fast as constructed by the grantor, shall become the property of the grantee, and that the grantor shall construct a drainage cut, and that the grantee "shall have the right of constructing outlets to conduct off-flow from its proposed settling basin, both north and south of said premises, into the aforesaid drainage cut to be constructed by said party of the first part (the grantors), the right to use which as a drain is hereby conceded to the said party of the second part (the grantee) free of compensation." These clauses of the deed refer to the mining privilege as applying to tract "Third," and indicate the purpose of the government to use the property north and south thereof as a settling basin.

Provisions are made in the deed with reference to the deposit of material from mining operations which will hereafter be more fully discussed, requiring the redeposit of all material on the premises from which they are taken, with the exception of the right to deposit detritus upon tract "First," in quantities which, under certain conditions, may aggregate 14,000,000 cubic yards.

As further indicating the grantee's intention to use a portion of tract "First" as a settling basin, a right of way was granted across the land of the grantor to the east of tract "Third" "for a canal leading to said south basin from the upper works to be constructed by the said party of the second part along lands on the south side of the Yuba river." Another right of way is granted "to convey water from the southern extremity of said settling basin south of Linda levee, following the natural depression of the land," etc. The deed also provides:

> "That at any time such portions of said premises as shall have been already worked over shall be available for use by the United States as a settling basin on condition that such use shall not interfere with the mining of the remainder of said premises, and provided further that in any case all of said premises shall be available for use as a settling basin without restriction on and after January 1, 1952."

It is clear, from the deed as an entirety, that in the specific provisions with relation to the mining privilege the parties had in mind the mining operations immediately contemplated upon tract "Third" only. Whether there was an implied right to mine other tracts is a question which requires consideration, but that matter will be taken up later.

[1] On the face of the deed, then, it is clear that the conveyance is sufficient in form, both in the granting and habendum clauses, to convey the fee to the government. The reservation of mining rights is not inconsistent with the granting of the fee to the government, nor is the right to the use and possession of the premises, limited as it is by the proviso that such use and occupation must be subject at all times to the wishes of the grantee, inconsistent with the grant of the fee. It is clear from the deed itself that the government intended to use the premises for the construction of certain reclamation works, and certain of the premises, including a portion of tract "First," as a settling basin. There is, however, no express provision of the deed limiting the use of the government to that purpose, nor any right of reversion to the grantor in the event that the government used the premises for some other purpose, or failed to use it for the purposes mentioned. On the contrary, as already stated, it is expressly provided that the premises may be used by the government for any and all purposes. The government no doubt intended to use a portion of the premises in controversy as and for a settling basin. The whole deed clearly shows this purpose, but the question here is whether, failing to use it for that purpose, the title reverts to the grantor. It is not so stated in the deed, and it is conceded, unless the right of the government was a mere easement, the abandonment of the scheme to use the premises as a settling basin would not destroy the title of the government. When the government ascertained that the south settling basin would not be needed, because the dredging operations carried on by the plaintiff had obviated the necessity for that use, it offered tract "First" for sale and sold the same to the defendant.

The plaintiff insisted upon its right to introduce evidence of circumstances, the surroundings, and the negotiations leading up to the execution of the deed, for the purpose of construing it. Such evidence was objected to by the defendant. Its objections were overruled, and in the light of this evidence the court rendered its decree. In considering the admissibility of this testimony, and its effect upon the construction of the deed, we will for a moment lay aside the conclusion already announced that the proper construction of the deed is plain upon its face, and consider somewhat in detail the evidence by which it is sought to establish the contention that the deed created a mere easement in favor of the government.

The Circumstances Connected with the Execution of the Deed.

We will first state some of the facts and surrounding circumstances at the time of the execution of the deed, and will then set forth some of the evidence concerning the negotiations. The report of the California Débris Commission stated that its purpose was to impound mining débris to prevent further injury to the navigable waters of the state; that the commission had selected Yuba river as the site for the first works to be constructed, since this river carried more detritus than all the other tributaries of the Sacramento river combined; that in the vicinity of the Narrows there was a natural site for impounding works. Other portions of the report confirmed the view of the commission that land was to be secured for the purpose of a settling basin to impound the mining detritus. It is clear from the report of the California Débris Commission that the purpose of the commission in securing conveyances from Mr. O'Brien was in furtherance of their declared object of constructing the necessary works to establish a settling basin upon tract "First." It is worthy of note that the report states that the project is novel; that nothing of the kind had theretofore been attempted, and the work was necessarily experimental; but that the various structures contemplated were believed to be safe, practical, and reasonably permanent. It was then stated:

"They can be repaired, if required, and, if abandoned, not maintained, or never completed, cannot leave the river in any worse shape than at present."

It was further reported:

"Before construction work can be commenced, it is necessary to have, first, formal approval of the project by federal and state authorities; second, acquisition of title to the land embraced within the area occupied by the impounding works." "The aggregate amount of land required within the area embraced within the existing project is 2,000 acres, for which about $20,000 is believed to be a fair and reasonable compensation."

It is to be observed that the report speaks of the acquisition of land, and not easements, and a similar reference is contained in another portion of the report.

Negotiations Preceding the Execution of the O'Brien Deed.

Evidence of the negotiations between O'Brien and the agents of the government for the acquisition of his land was introduced, over the objection of the defendant. Without at present passing upon the correctness of this ruling, we will state in general terms the character of that evidence. James K. O'Brien, the son of the grantor, testified that he met Hubert Vischer, assistant engineer of the California Débris Commission, two or three weeks prior to December 6, 1901. Mr. Vischer carried on all the negotiations, during which Mr. Vischer stated that the ground on section 5 and probably section 4 (parts of tract "First") would be used as a settling basin.

"They admitted this land was valuable for farming and might be valuable for dredging. We discussed that it was mineral land, and said that in our opinion the amount of money we were to receive for the land was a mere bagatelle as far as the value of the property was concerned. We said that the land could be dredged by operations such as were being carried on in Oroville."

The purpose of these operations was to extract the gold. The price was fixed at $20 an acre for tract "First" for farming purposes. The witness testified that—

"At the hearing of the California Débris Commission the contemplated use of these lands by the government for settling basin purposes was discussed between my father and Mr. Vischer. Reference was especially made to the land in sections 6, 4, 5, and 8 (including tract 'First') for the south settling basin. It was discussed that my father was to retain the mineral in the settling basin."

The witness was then asked the following question:

"State the substance of what was said by the commissioner, Mr. Vischer, yourself, and your father at these hearings, in addition to what you have already testified to in regard to the particular purpose for which that land was to be used, and to what extent your father would be entitled to the use and possession of the property. A. Simply and solely for settling basin purposes in connection with the project of 1899. My father was to have exclusive use of the properties involved in sections 4, 5, 6, and 8, except as far as the government might need it for settling basin purposes. He could put it to any use he desired. If the project was not carried out, he would have the right to dredge if there was any dredging ground there, and he would have the use of the land for farming or any other purposes it was suitable for."

The witness further testified: That it was stated that it might be four or five years before the government would begin to use the land, and that "after the land had been used as a settling basin, when it was filled up, my father would have an elevated farm there." That the grantor "was to have the use of it, so far as it did not interfere with its use by the government as a settling basin." That the use and possession of the premises by the grantor would have to be under the rules and regulations prescribed by the United States government. That nothing was ever said to the effect that the United States might sell or dispose of these lands at any time. That "we reserved the mineral in the property. If, for any reason, the project might be amended, or the intention to use it as a settling basin should not be carried out, my father had the right to dredge-mine the property, which was the only method then and now supposed by which it could be operated." That the word "easement" was used by members of the commission and Mr. Vischer during the negotiations. "The commission used the word. My father used it, and Mr. Vischer used it—granting of an easement." That Mr. Vischer dictated a letter to accompany the deed to the United States government, which was dated December 6, 1901, and signed by J. O'Brien, the grantor. This contained the following statement: "Gentlemen: I herewith submit to you a deed conveying easements to certain lands," etc. On April 22, 1902, the letter was acknowledged by the California Débris Commission, by letter, stating: "We hereby notify you that in accordance with your letters of submittal, dated December 4 and 6, 1901, the United States has accepted two certain deeds," etc.

[2] In considering these negotiations it is well to remember that according to the testimony of Mr. O'Brien the only thing said as to the result if the government abandoned its proposed "settling basin" was that the property could then be dredge-mined. Both parties to the transaction evidently fully believed that the government would carry out its plan. The mere characterization by Mr. O'Brien, in the letter dictated by Mr. Vischer, of the deed as one conveying an easement, is unimportant. It is clear that these declarations during the negotiations concerning the purposes of the deeds and the rights of the parties with reference to the use of the property cannot properly be considered for the purpose of modifying or changing the terms of the document itself. It is true that the evidence was ostensibly offered, as such evidence always is, in view of the definite statutory rule upon the subject (section 1625, Civ. Code), to place the court in the situation of the parties, and thus to enable it to interpret the terms of the deed.

[3] While it is apparent from the negotiations and surrounding circumstances that the purpose of the government in securing the land was to construct the works in question and to use the particular tract as a settling basin, this would have no greater effect than a declaration to the same effect in the deed, and such an express declaration would not convert a deed, whose terms otherwise conveyed a fee, into one conveying a mere easement for such use. Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 Pac. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229. It is not claimed that in these negotiations it was agreed that the land would revert to the grantor in the event that the property was not used as a settling basin. At most it was said that his reserved right to use the surface of the land would be valuable for agricultural purposes, and this statement must have been made in the light of the fact that both parties in the discussion assumed that the government would retain the property. The negotiations were not directed to the possibility that the government might sell tract "First," so that in determining the effect of the deed upon the subsequent abandonment of the scheme by the government, so far as this land was concerned, we are given no assistance by any of the negotiations between the parties, even if it were proper to consider them. Indeed all that was said points to the conclusion that the government was, in any event, to retain some interest in the premises and that the rights of the grantor were to be subject thereto. We conclude, therefore, that the deed conveyed the fee of tract "First" to the government, and that the deed from the government to the defendant vested the fee in it.

In view of the necessity of a new trial, we will pass to a consideration of the exceptions and reservations in O'Brien's deed to the government. The plaintiff has acquired from O'Brien the reserved and excepted right to the precious metals in said land, and the defendant, through mesne conveyances from O'Brien, has acquired the easement to deposit 14,000,000 (subsequently decreased to 9,000,000) cubic yards of mining debris thereon. Defendant contends that the right to the precious metals does not include the right to extract them, and thus reduce them to possession, where the process of extraction destroys or disturbs the surface, citing in support of this contention the following cases, among others: Williams v. Gibson, 84 Ala. 228, 231, 4 South. 350, 5 Am. St. Rep. 368; Harris v. Ryding, 5 M. & W. 60, 68-76; Hext v. Gill, L. R. 7 Ch. 699, 718; Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 482, 50 Atl. 255, 55 L. R. A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722; Phillips v. Collinsville Granite Co., 123 Ga. 830, 839, 51 S. E. 666; Bibby v. Bunch, 176 Ala. 585, 589, 58 South. 916; and the following text-books: 1 Jones on Real Property, § 538, p. 449; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 566, 567. The plaintiff claims that such a right is involved in the exception and reservation of the grant, by necessary implication, and in support of this contention cite the following text-books and cases: Footnote, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 884; 27 Cyc. 687, 688; Williams v. Gibson, supra; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, pp. 556, 557.

There is no express reservation of the right to extract the gold or precious metals in tract "First," although such right was specially reserved and excepted as to tract "Third." In order to understand the claims of the parties, it will be necessary to state further facts in relation to the method of carrying on mining operations in the vicinity. Mining is carried on wholly by dredging. All the material from surface to bedrock is moved. In tract "Third" bedrock is 60 feet below the surface. At the time the deed was executed by O'Brien to the government, dredgers of the type used for the recovery of gold were only capable of operating to a depth of 40 feet, although they now operate to a depth of from 60 to 80 feet. It was therefore then impossible to operate a dredge from the surface to the bedrock on tract "Third." The overload of 20 feet would have to be removed in order that dredgers might successfully operate.

[4] It is contended by the plaintiff, and the trial court decided, that the purpose of those provisions of the contract authorizing the deposit on tract "First" of 14,000,000 cubic yards of material from the mining operations of the grantor was to make provisions for this overload, which aggregated on tract "Third" 14,900,000 cubic yards, and that such right inured to the benefit of tract "Third," which became the dominant estate to which the easement appertained. In this respect we think that the trial court correctly interpreted the deed. We will next consider the right of the plaintiff to remove the precious metals in tract "First."

Dredge mining absolutely destroys the surface and leaves the land from 12 to 13 feet higher than before the dredging operations were commenced; the upper portions being composed of cobblestones a foot or less in diameter. It follows that, if dredging operations of this type were conducted on tract "First," its value for agricultural purposes will be entirely destroyed. If, on the other hand, the reservation and exception of the precious metals in tract "First" did not authorize the grantor to operate a mining dredge in the customary manner, and thus destroy the surface, the reservation was of no effect and of no value, for no other method of mining was practicable. In this connection it should be observed that the use of the land, so far as not inconsistent with the use by the government, was expressly reserved along with the right to the precious minerals therein. That dredge mining is not wholly inconsistent with the use of the land as a settling basin is also clear from the fact that it is expressly provided in another clause of the deed that "worked-over" portions of tract "Third" "shall be available for use as a settling basin."

[5, 6] The principle that the right to precious metals implies the right to mine the same, fortified by the statutory rule that reservations and exceptions are to be construed in favor of the grantor, and by the express reservation and exception of the right to use the premises, in any manner not inconsistent with the use by the grantee, and by the further fact that the premises could still be used by the grantee as a settling basin, if the minerals were extracted with due regard to that use, and that the only known method of extraction in contemplation by the parties was dredge mining, all lead to the conclusion that the plaintiff, as grantee of O'Brien's mining rights in tract "First," is entitled to extract the precious metals therefrom, even though the effect thereof is to wholly destroy the surface.

Having thus determined that the plaintiff has the right to mine the precious minerals contained in tract "First," and that the defendant has succeeded to the rights of O'Brien to deposit detritus upon tract "First" from the mining operations on tract "Third," it remains to consider the proper relation of these two easements.

It should be stated in this connection that on January 15, 1902, O'Brien conveyed to Evans tract "Third," together with the reserved right to deposit mining detritus on tract "First," and that the conveyance by O'Brien to the plaintiff of all the rights remaining in him was made until April 10, 1912, 10 years after the said conveyance to Evans, and that it did not convey to the plaintiff anything which O'Brien's deed to Evans had conveyed to them. The defendant has succeeded to the rights of Evans to deposit detritus from tract "Third" on tract "First." If, at the time of the conveyance to Evans, O'Brien had owned tract "First" in fee, undoubtedly Evans' easement appurtenant to tract "Third" and the corresponding servitude on tract "First" would have been superior to O'Brien's fee-simple estate, and would carve that much out of said estate. The same result follows with respect to any easement or other interest which O'Brien then had in tract "First." Consequently the servitude was a burden, and a paramount burden to O'Brien's reserved right to mine the precious metals in tract "First." The subsequent conveyance of that right by O'Brien to plaintiff gave it no greater right than O'Brien then possessed, and therefore its mining right in tract "First" is subject to the defendant's right to deposit detritus thereon taken from tract "Third."

[7] As the question as to the exercise of these two rights under the deeds, as we have construed their effect, is not discussed in the briefs, it is only necessary for us to say that the right of the defendant to deposit detritus upon tract "First" is limited to what is reasonably necessary to enable it to conduct its dredge-mining operations upon tract "Third"; that the right is further limited by the maximum of 9,000,000 cubic yards, and that the deposit of this quantity of detritus, or any portion thereof, must be done in a manner reasonably required by the mining operations on tract "Third," and in a manner reasonably consistent with the right of the plaintiff to extract the precious minerals from tract "First" by dredge-mining operations. Whether the right to deposit the difference between 1,500,000 cubic yards of detritus and the balance of the 9,000,000 cubic yards is dependent upon the conditions expressed in the deed that a levee to the west of the settling basin should be elevated one foot for each additional 2,500,000 cubic yards of detritus deposited upon the land, is a matter that is not discussed in the briefs, and which therefore we will not consider. It is also necessary to pass upon the right to the use and occupation of the premises involved in the cross-complaint. The entire court concurs in the views hereinbefore expressed, but as to the right to the rents and profits the court is of opinion on that subject, from which I dissent, as follows, to wit:

"The Right of Possession.

[8] "In O'Brien's deed to the United States he reserved to himself 'the use and possession of said premises in so far as the same may not interfere with the use and possession of said premises by [the United States] its authorized agents, employees, or contractors, for any and all purposes that it or they may see fit to use the same, said use and possession so reserved to be subject to all the rules and regulations and orders of [the United States] its agents and employees.' This gave to O'Brien no right upon the premises, except when his use or occupation thereof did not interfere with the use or occupation of the United States. The deed contains no statement limiting the purposes for which the United States should use the same. The conveyance being of the fee, it had the right to use the same for all purposes, except so far as such use was limited by the reserved servitude in favor of tract 'Third,' above mentioned, now owned by the defendant, and by the other reserved right of 'all precious metals on or in said premises,' which, as we have seen, included the right to mine the same by dredging. For any other purpose O'Brien's right to the use had to yield to the demands of the United States.

"On the other hand, until the United States demanded the use and possession of the property, O'Brien had the right to them and to any profits that might ensue from them. In this condition of affairs, the United States conveyed to the defendant on October 30, 1911, and O'Brien conveyed to the plaintiff on April 10, 1912. O'Brien had remained in the actual possession of the property up to the time of his deed to the plaintiff and then surrendered possession to the latter, which has been in possession ever since. So far as appears, no demand for possession was ever made upon O'Brien by the United States or upon O'Brien or the plaintiff by the defendant. The defendant, nevertheless, seeks by cross-complaint to recover from the plaintiff the value of the use and occupation of the property ever since the plaintiff took possession. But this it cannot do, except for such period as the plaintiff may have wrongfully been in possession, and until demand for possession was made by the United States, or by the defendant as its grantee, either upon O'Brien while he was in possession, or upon the plaintiff after it acquired possession, the possession of O'Brien and the plaintiff was not wrongful, but was under and in accord with the reservation under discussion. The theory of the defendant seems to be that the conveyance by the United States to it ipso facto terminated O'Brien's reserved right to use and possession. But O'Brien was lawfully in possession, and had the right to remain in possession until demand was made upon him, and this right, it seems plain to us, existed as to the grantee of the United States as well as to the United States itself. The defendants can therefore recover for the value of the use and occupation of the property only in case it appear that demand was made upon O'Brien or the plaintiff for possession and then only for the period subsequent to such demand."

HAIGHT v. COSTANICH. (Sac. 2880.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑140—Rights to divert and use waters subject to vested rights.

Defendant's rights to waters to which his land is riparian are subject to those rights to divert and use which had vested and accrued through diversion prior to the vesting of defendant's rights under his grant from the United States government and to such rights as have been subsequently acquired by prescription through adverse and uninterrupted use for five years.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑18—Riparian rights under government patent obtain from date of entry.

The grant of a patent to a settler on public lands relates back to the filing of entry in the United States land office and confers the rights of a riparian owner upon the grantee from the date of entry.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑20—Federal laws recognize local customs as to possessory water rights at time of entry.

Defendant's rights under his government patent are subject to water rights under the California law of possessory right which had vested prior to defendant's entry, since the federal statutes protect such former rights upon the public domain acquired by diversion where they are recognized and acknowledged by local customs, laws, and court decisions. Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2339, 2340 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4647, 4648).

4. Waters and water courses 🔑14—Actual diversion and use sufficient for rights by appropriation.

Compliance with Civ. Code, § 1410 et seq., by posting notice is not essential to the acquisition of water rights by appropriation; actual diversion and use being sufficient.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑24—Amount diverted determined by actual use, and not capacity of ditch.

The quantity of water to which a person becomes entitled by diversion is not determined by the capacity of the diverting ditch, but is limited to the amount applied to a beneficial use; that is, the amount actually used and reasonably necessary for the useful purpose to which water has been applied.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑24—Right to divert more than originally used in accordance with original intent if diligent.

The quantity of water to which a person may become entitled by diversion is not limited to that actually used at time of original diversion, but he may take additional water to meet increasing needs where within the scope of the original intent, if such be done within a reasonable time and by the use of reasonable diligence.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑29—Right to additional water under license from federal government not limited by state statute to five years from original diversion.

Rights acquired by diversion prior to defendant's entry upon government land which were acquired outright under license of the federal government, and not by mere occupancy, embraced the conditional right to take an additional amount of water for future needs within the scope of the original intent within a reasonable time, which is not limited by Civ. Code, § 1411, to a period of five years from the date of original diversion, since such time may or may not be reasonable under the circumstances.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑24—Measure of quantity to which plaintiff had right by diversion.

Plaintiff is entitled by right of diversion to the quantity of water actually used for beneficial purposes at the time of the original diversion which was reasonably necessary, plus any additional quantity intended at time of original diversion to be applied to future needs and actually put to use within a reasonable time, measured by circumstances and reasonably necessary therefor, as against defendant obtaining land from the government over which plaintiff's ditch passed and which was entitled to riparian rights in the same stream.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑29—Right to divert excess water does not relate back to inception as intervening appropriator complying with Code.

The rule that an appropriator's right at a later date to take water in excess of that which he had diverted and put to beneficial use may relate back to the inception of his work, although he has not complied with the Code requirements, does not hold as against an intervening appropriator who has complied therewith, in view of Civ. Code, § 1419.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑143—Title by prescription cannot be obtained to water in excess of needs.

Plaintiff might, after defendant's entry on government lands and diversion of water, increase by prescription the quantity to which he was entitled, but such right is limited to water reasonably necessary for the beneficial purpose for which it is diverted, and no prescriptive title can be acquired to that part of a diversion in excess of needs.

11. Waters and water courses 🔑24 — Judgment based on capacity of ditch as measure of right, irrespective of beneficial use, is erroneous.

A judgment rendered on the assumption that the capacity of plaintiff's ditch over government lands at the time of the original diversion and prior to defendant's entry on such land was the measure of his rights, irrespective of beneficial use, must be reversed for such error.

12. Waters and water courses 🔑33—Burden upon plaintiff alleging subsequent diversion according to intent on original diversion to prove such facts.

Where, at the time defendant became possessed of riparian rights, plaintiff was using only enough water for stock, domestic purposes, and irrigation of six acres, if plaintiff had at time of original diversion planned for additional water to irrigate newly cultivated land, and had not completed preparation thereof at time of defendant's entry on the government land, but continued thereafter with due diligence to use such additional water, the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove such facts.

13. Waters and water courses 🔑152(6)—Burden upon plaintiff to show adverse use for five years.

If plaintiff acquired a right to more water after defendant's entry by adverse use for a period of five years, the burden was upon plaintiff to show such fact.

14. Waters and water courses 🔑152(7) — Where evidence showed no right by prescription or by relation back to original diversion to water for additional land, evidence of water needed therefor was inadmissible.

Where the evidence showed that 15 acres of plaintiff's land, and not the whole 22 acres, were under irrigation continuously for five years before commencing action, and the right to take water for an additional 7 acres could not relate back to the original diversion, because there was no reasonable diligence in its preparation, evidence as to water needed for the 22 acres was incompetent and irrelevant.

15. Waters and water courses 🔑152(8)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding as to quantity of water.

Evidence held to show plaintiff's right only to water to irrigate 6 acres of land and insufficient to support a finding of the use of 48 miner's inches for 35 years, which was the capacity of the ditch and more than necessary to irrigate 6 acres.

16. Waters and water courses 🔑24—Amount put to beneficial use for particular time, and not flow of ditch, determines right as to quantity.

The mere fact that a ditch was full or carried a certain quantity of water throughout the season is of no consequence unless the whole amount of water was put to beneficial use; for, if it ran full all the time, but was used only half the time, there would be a right only to one-half of the water flowing or to all the water for half the time.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; James G. Estey, Judge.

Action by Herbert Haight against Marion C. Costanich. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Carr & Kennedy and Chenoweth & Leininger, all of Redding, for appellant.

Braynard & Kimball, of Redding, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff and defendant, who are the owners of adjoining tracts of land in Shasta county, seek in this action an adjudication of their respective rights in and to the waters of a creek, known as the North fork of Richardson creek, to which defendant's land is riparian. In 1885 plaintiff's predecessor in interest made entry of plaintiff's land, which was then part of the public lands of the United States, in the United States land office, obtaining a patent in 1895. Prior to making entry of his land, the predecessor of plaintiff constructed a ditch which had at that time, and still has, a carrying capacity of 48 miner's inches, by which he diverted water from the North fork of Richardson creek across the land of defendant, which at that time was part of the public domain, to plaintiff's land, where it was used for irrigation, stock, and domestic purposes. At the time defendant made entry of his land, which was in 1886, the ditch above mentioned had been constructed and plaintiff's predecessor had about 6 acres of his land cleared, cultivated, and under irrigation from said ditch. Just when additional acres of plaintiff's land were cultivated does not clearly appear from the testimony, but some time between the years 1886 and 1910 the acreage under irrigation was increased to at least 15. In 1892 defendant constructed a ditch with a capacity of 75 miner's inches, the intake of which was higher up the creek than that of plaintiff. The evidence does not show that either party objected, prior to 1916, to the amount of water diverted by the other; some witnesses testified that there was at all times sufficient water in the creek for the uses of both. From 1892 both plaintiff and defendant diverted water through their respective ditches and used it for irrigation and stock purposes until the year 1916, when defendant dammed up the creek so as to prevent all water from flowing into plaintiff's ditch.

Plaintiff in his complaint asked for an injunction restraining defendant from interfering with his use of the water and for a judgment for damages alleged to have resulted to his crops from defendant's interference with the flow of water in his ditch. The trial court decreed that plaintiff was entitled to 48 miner's inches of the first flow of the waters of the North fork of Richardson creek, and that, subject to said right of plaintiff, defendant was entitled to the remainder thereof, amounting to 52 miner's inches, and gave judgment for damages against defendant for the sum of $613.30. Upon his appeal from the judgment defendant does not question the right of plaintiff to divert water across defendant's land by means of his ditch; the amount of water which plaintiff is entitled to divert is the point of controversy.

[1] Defendant's claims are based upon his ownership of riparian lands. The rights of defendant to the waters to which his land is riparian are subject to those rights to divert and use the waters which had vested and accrued, as the result of diversion, prior to the vesting of defendant's rights as a riparian owner under his grant from the United States government. Osgood v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 571; Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198; Duckworth v. Water Co., 170 Cal. 425, 432, 150 Pac. 58. His rights are also subject to such rights to the waters as have been acquired subsequent to his entry, by purchase and grant or by prescription; "that is, by adverse use for the period of five years without interruption by the real owner." Palmer v. R. R. Com., 167 Cal. 163, 172, 138 Pac. 997; Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 125, 42 Pac. 453; Duckworth v. Water Co., 150 Cal. 520, 530, 89 Pac. 338. The first question to be determined is the extent of plaintiff's rights acquired by diversion prior to the vesting of defendant's rights as a riparian owner.

[2] The granting of a patent to a settler on public lands is held to relate back to the filing of the entry of the land in the United States land office and to confer the rights of a riparian owner upon the grantee of the patent from the date of his entry. Sturr v. Beck, 133 U. S. 541, 10 Sup. Ct. 350, 33 L. Ed. 761; McGuire v. Brown, 106 Cal. 660, 39 Pac. 1060, 30 L. R. A. 384. Therefore, upon the granting to defendant of a patent to his land in 1893, his rights as a riparian owner vested as of the date of his entry, namely, 1886.

[3] Defendant's rights under his patent are subject to water rights which, under the California law of possessory rights, had vested prior to defendant's entry, for the federal statutes provide for the protection of those rights to waters upon the public domain, acquired by diversion, which are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts of the localities where such rights are claimed. U. S. Rev. Stats. §§ 2339, 2340 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4647, 4678); Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, 25 L. Ed. 240; Telluride Power Co. v. Rio Grande, etc., Ry., 175 U. S. 639, 20 Sup. Ct. 245, 44 L. Ed. 308.

[4] Plaintiff's appropriation was not made by posting notice as required by the provisions of the Civil Code (Civ. Code, § 1410 et seq.), but compliance with these provisions is not essential to the acquisition of rights by appropriation; actual diversion and use of the water is recognized as a valid appropriation in this state. De Necochea v. Curtis, supra; Duckworth v. Watsonville Water & Light Co., 158 Cal. 206, 211, 110 Pac. 927.

[5] The quantity of water to which a person becomes entitled by such diversion is not determined by the capacity of the ditch diverting the water; the extent of the right gained by the diversion is limited to the amount of water applied to a beneficial use, which has been interpreted to mean the amount actually used and reasonably necessary for a useful purpose to which the water has been applied. McKinney v. Smith, 21 Cal. 374; Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Cal. 86, 52 Pac. 139; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213; Cal., etc., Co. v. Madera, etc., Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 Pac. 718.

[6] However, the quantity of water to which a person may become entitled by diversion is not necessarily limited to the amount of water actually used at the time of the original diversion. Inasmuch as plaintiff's diversion was not made under the modes prescribed by the California statutes, it is governed solely by the California law of possessory rights as it existed prior to the adoption of such statutory methods. The cases involving water rights acquired under this law—

> "lay down the rule that a right to the use of running water does not vest in possession at common law, until there has been an actual diversion and beneficial use of the water. But they all recognize, and some of them declare, that, before any actual diversion or use of the water, a claimant may acquire an incipient, incomplete, and conditional right to the future use of the water, by beginning the construction of the works necessary for such diversion and use, and in good faith diligently prosecuting the same toward completion. * * * There is no case arising prior to the enactment of the Code which holds that the party who thus in good faith began and diligently prosecuted the work on a dam and ditch for the diversion and use of water could not protect his incipient right to the water against the hostile diversions and claims of others by an appropriate suit for that purpose. It is obvious that this could not be so. Such visible act and avowed intent gave him a conditional right to the future use of the water, prior to its actual use; the condition being that he should thereafter diligently continue the work to completion and then divert the water and apply it to a useful purpose, failing which his right would cease. Upon the performance of these conditions, his title to such use would become complete and perfect. In the meantime, however, he had an existing conditional right, manifested by actual visible possession of the works." Inyo Cons. Water Co. v. Jess, 161 Cal. 516, 519, 119 Pac. 934, 936.

This right to take an additional amount of water reasonably necessary to meet increasing needs is not unrestricted; the new use must have been within the scope of the original intent, and additional water must be taken and put to a beneficial use in keeping with the original intent, "within a reasonable time by the use of reasonable diligence," or the right to the additional water is subject to intervening claims. Senior v. Anderson, 115 Cal. 496, 504, 47 Pac. 454, 456; Inyo Cons. Water Co. v. Jess, supra.

[7] Defendant contends that the period of time within which the right to use an increased amount of water to meet accruing needs must be exercised is limited to a period of five years from the date of the original diversion, basing the contention upon the fact that, by virtue of section 1411 of the Civil Code, as interpreted in the California cases, a right acquired by appropriation ceases upon a failure to make a beneficial use of the appropriation for a period of five years. Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 42 Pac. 453, affirmed 120 Cal. 86, 52 Pac. 139; Lindblom v. Water Co., 178 Cal. 450, 173 Pac. 994. This rule, however, is inapplicable to the facts of the present case. Whatever rights were acquired by plaintiff to take an increased amount of water to meet accruing needs were not within the rule prescribing a definite period for loss by nonuse of rights acquired by prescription or under the provisions of the Civil Code. The rights acquired by diversion prior to defendant's entry were acquired outright under license from the federal government, and not by mere occupancy. This license under which the diversion was made embraced the conditional right to take an additional amount of water to meet future needs, within the scope of the original intent, within a reasonable time. Five years may or may not have been a reasonable time. In this connection it should be noted, as previously indicated, that there was not any clear showing of when the preparation of additional acres of land and the diversion of water for use thereon was commenced and completed. If plaintiff had made his original diversion with the intent to take more water to irrigate additional land, and had planned his diversion works for that purpose, but had not completed the same, or had not completed the preparation of the additional land at the time of defendant's entry, plaintiff could not lose this right to additional water by nonuse for an arbitrary period after defendant's entry, but was entitled, as part of the right itself, to a reasonable time under all the circumstances of the case within which to exercise the right to divert an increased amount of water and use it for beneficial purposes as originally intended.

[9] It perhaps should be said that this rule, whereby the right of an appropriator to take at a later date water in excess of that which he diverted and put to beneficial use in the first instance may relate back to the inception of his work, although he has not complied with the Code requirements, does not hold as against an intervening appropriator who does comply with the Code requirements. As against such an intervening appropriator, the first has, under section 1419 of the Civil Code, only such right as was perfected by diversion and beneficial use at the time the intervening appropriator commences his appropriation by posting his notice. But the Code section by its terms destroys the right of relation back of an appropriator who does not comply with the Code only as to a subsequent appropriator who does. As to all others, his rights are not affected by the Code provisions and are to be determined by the law governing the subject of appropriations as it exists independently of the Code. Wells v. Mantes, 99 Cal. 586, 34 Pac. 324; Senior v. Anderson, supra.

[10] In addition to any rights thus acquired by diversion before defendant's entry, plaintiff, as previously stated, might, of course, after defendant's entry, increase the quantity of water to which he was entitled as against defendant, who was a riparian owner, by prescription; that is, by diverting and using a certain quantity of water "continuously, uninterruptedly, and adversely for a period of at least five years." Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 42 Pac. 453. A right acquired by prescription is likewise limited to the amount of water reasonably necessary for the beneficial purpose for which it is diverted, and no title by prescription can be acquired to that part of a diversion which is excessive of such needs. Cal., etc., Co. v. Madera, etc., Co., supra. Whether plaintiff rests his right to the water upon diversion under the federal statutes, or upon prescription, the quantity of water to which he is entitled is dependent upon the quantity of water reasonably necessary for the beneficial uses to which it was applied, as well as to the amount actually applied to such uses.

[11] Viewed in the light of these principles, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed because of the error, pervasive and perversive of both trial and judgment, in assuming that the capacity of plaintiff's ditch at the time of the original diversion, prior to defendant's entry, was the measure of his rights, irrespective of beneficial use.

That this was the theory of counsel for plaintiff at the trial is indicated by their opening statement:

> "But we shall claim that * * * no question arises in this case as to the beneficial use of water; for instance, That the government of the United States said to George Haight: 'You have constructed this ditch. You own that land. You took this ditch on government land and you have a right to all the water that that ditch will carry, whether you can put it to a beneficial use or not.'"

The following colloquy occurred at the trial:

> "The Court: Is the question of necessary use involved in this case?
> "Attorney for Plaintiff: Well, the other side contends that it is. We contend that it is not."

Doubtless, because of the erroneous assumption that the capacity of the ditch, since it diverted water on government land, determined plaintiff's rights, the testimony offered on behalf of plaintiff merely tended to prove that his ditch had been running full for about 20 or 30 years last past, and that plaintiff's predecessor in interest and plaintiff had irrigated his land with water from the ditch during all of that time.

[12, 13] Defendant's rights as a riparian owner were proved when he showed his entry upon land riparian to the stream. At the time when defendant became possessed of riparian rights, when he made entry in 1886, plaintiff was, as the record shows, using only enough water for stock and domestic purposes and for the irrigation of 6 acres of land, and defendant's riparian rights were subject to plaintiff's right to take such an amount of water. If plaintiff had, at the time of his original diversion, planned to take additional water to irrigate newly cultivated land, had planned his diversion works for that purpose, had not completed the works or the preparation of his land at the time of defendant's entry, and continued thereafter with due diligence to prepare such land and use the additional water, the burden was upon him to prove these facts. Gardner v. Wright, 49 Or. 609, 91 Pac. 286; 3 Kinney on Irrigation (2d Ed.) p. 2802. Likewise, if plaintiff acquired a right to more water after defendant's entry by adverse use for a period of five years, the burden was upon plaintiff to show that fact. Gurnsey v. Water Co., 6 Cal. App. 387, 392, 92 Pac. 326.

[14] There is no evidence of due diligence, or any diligence, in perfecting a previously initiated diversion for a larger amount than he was using at the time of defendant's entry; nor was there any evidence showing an acquisition of an additional right by adverse user. When asked how much of the water from the ditch was needed for the irrigation of his 22 acres of land since January, 1910, plaintiff replied: "All that was in it." This evidence was introduced at the close of the trial upon permission to reopen the case obtained after oral argument. It is to be noted that plaintiff himself testified that in the irrigating season his ditch ran about two-thirds full. Taken as a whole, therefore, plaintiff's testimony can only mean that, since January, 1910, 32 miner's inches of water were needed (not actually used) for the irrigation of 22 acres. Furthermore, the evidence shows that in 1915 only 15 acres were under irrigation, so the whole 22 acres could not have been under irrigation continuously for 5 years before the commencement of this action, in 1916, nor could the right to take water for the irrigation of the additional 7 acres relate back to the original diversion, for there was clearly no reasonable diligence in the preparation of this additional land. Therefore, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the evidence as to the amount of water needed for the irrigation of 22 acres was incompetent and irrelevant.

[15] It is obvious that plaintiff did not show a right to more than enough water to irrigate 6 acres. The finding that for more than 35 years plaintiff has diverted and used 48 miner's inches, which is the capacity of the ditch and far more than is necessary for the irrigation of 6 acres, is wholly unsupported by the evidence, and the judgment awarding plaintiff 48 miner's inches cannot be sustained.

[16] It is important, in the event of a new trial, that the parties be advised that the mere fact that the ditch was full or carried a certain quantity of water throughout the season is of no consequence unless all of the water so carried was put to a beneficial use all of the time; that is to say, the amount of water beneficially used during the entire season is determinative of the quantity to which plaintiff is entitled. If, for example, the plaintiff kept the ditch running full for 4 months continuously, but used the water only 2 months in the aggregate, he would gain a right to receive only one-half of the water flowing in the ditch, or to all of it for one-half of the time.

The judgment of the court was also erroneous in proceeding upon the theory that the flow of the North Fork is 100 miner's inches during the irrigating season, whereas, according to the undisputed testimony, the flow is only 80 miner's inches.

The amount of damages to be awarded plaintiff will have to be ascertained after the number of acres which plaintiff is entitled to have irrigated with the water from his ditch is definitely determined in accordance with the principles above set forth.

The judgment is reversed.

NORTHWESTERN REDWOOD CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 9393.)

1. Master and servant 🔑347 — Workmen's Compensation Act, allowing wife of injured employé to prosecute proceedings, held valid.

Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 24(b) subd. 5, allowing living expenses to the wife or minor children of an injured employé who has deserted or is neglecting his family, is not unconstitutional in permitting a wife to proceed in behalf of the community to secure the compensation, which is community property, particularly where the husband has deserted the wife.

2. Master and servant 🔑398—Change in title of wife's petition for compensation held not a new proceeding barred by limitation.

Where an injured employee deserted his wife, and she instituted proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, §§ 17(a), 24(b), 55(a), for compensation, entitling them in her husband's name, signing the application herself, but later amended the application so as to bring the proceedings in her own name, the fact that such amendment was made after the expiration of the six months fixed by law for the bringing of the proceedings had expired held not to bar her claim; the mere change in the title being merely a correction of an informality within section 60(a), and not the commencement of a new proceeding.

3. Master and servant 🔑398—Constructive notice held binding on injured employee deserting wife petitioning for compensation.

Where an injured employee deserted his wife, who later instituted proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act to enforce her rights in the community property, constructive notice to the husband by publication held sufficient as to him, as the proceeding may be characterized as one quasi in rem.

4. Master and servant 🔑405(1) — Evidence held to show injured employee had deserted wife applying for compensation.

In a proceeding by a wife under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act to recover for injuries to her husband, evidence held to show that he had deserted her and was living.

In Bank.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mary A. Schaefer, opposed by the Northwestern Redwood Company, employer, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, insurance carrier, to recover compensation for injuries sustained by her huband, Jack Schaefer. An award of compensation was made by the Industrial Accident Commission, and employer and insurance carrier apply for certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco (Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Petitioners seek to review and annul an award of the respondent commission which was made because of an accident suffered by Jack Schaefer, husband of respondent Mary Schaefer, February 14, 1918, while he was employed by the Northwestern Redwood Company, resulting in the amputation of one finger and the crippling of the other fingers of the hand. No question is raised as to the amount or as to the obligation to make compensation for said injuries under the Workmen's Compensation Law. The contention of the petitioners is that the award could not properly be made upon the petition of the wife. The injured employee had married the respondent Mary A. Schaefer about a week before the accident. Two months after the marriage he left his wife, taking with him $500 of her money, came to San Francisco, wrote her that he would return on the next Sunday, and has not been heard of since.

The respondent, Mary Schaefer, based her right to the award upon the provision of section 24, subd. 5, of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 852), which is as follows:

> "(b) The commission may fix and determine and allow as a lien against any amount to be paid as compensation: * * * (5) The reasonable living expenses of the wife or minor children of the injured employee, or both, subsequent to the date of the injury, where such employee has deserted or is neglecting his family, to be allowed in such proportion as the commission shall deem proper, upon application of the wife or guardian of the minor children."

Petitioner claims, however, that the application for compensation must be made by the injured employee, and that the application by the wife as a lien claimant is not authorized by the law. The statute expressly authorizes the application by any party in interest. The provision is in sections 17 and 55, as follows:

> "Sec. 17. (a) Upon the filing with the commission by any party in interest, * * * concerning any right or liability arising out of, or incidental thereto, jurisdiction over which is vested by this act in the commission, a time and place shall be fixed for the hearing thereof. * * *"
> "Sec. 55. (a) All proceedings for the recovery of compensation, or concerning any right or liability arising out of or incidental thereto, or for the enforcement against the employer or an insurance carrier of any liability for compensation imposed upon him by this act in favor of the injured employee, his dependents or any third person, or for the determination of any question as to the distribution of compensation among dependents or other persons * * * or for obtaining any order which by this act the commission is authorized to make, or for the determination of any other matter, jurisdiction over which is vested by this act in the commission, shall be instituted before the commission, and not elsewhere, except as otherwise in this act provided, and the commission is hereby vested with full power, authority and jurisdiction to try and finally determine all such matters, subject only to the review by the courts in this act specified and in the manner and within the time in this act provided."

[1] In dealing with the right of the wife to maintain a proceeding, it is well to remember that the compensation inuring to the husband by reason of his disability is community property. Although the interest of the wife in such property is inchoate, there is no constitutional objection to a law which permits her to proceed in behalf of the community to secure the property belonging to the community, particularly where the husband has deserted the wife and defaulted in his obligations to the marital partnership. Moreover, it is quite as consistent with the whole theory of the Workmen's Compensation Act to allow the wife or children of an injured employee, who is neglecting his obligation to his family by desertion or otherwise, to prosecute the proceedings for the recovery of compensation as it is to allow the dependents of a deceased husband to prosecute a similar proceeding. The latter course has been sustained as a constitutional exercise of authority (Western Metal Supply Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390), and for the same reasons the provisions of the act relied upon by the respondent Mary Schaefer must be sustained as constitutional.

With these preliminary observations we return to a consideration of the points raised by the petitioner with reference to the procedure adopted in this case for the enforcement of the claim or lien of the wife against the compensation due to her husband because of the injuries received by him in the course of his employment.

On May 22, 1918, the wife filed an informal request with the commission asking that she be granted a lien upon the compensation alleged to be due her husband on account of this injury. On June 5, 1918, the commission filed and served an order upon the petitioners to show cause why such a lien should not be granted. A return was made denying that any compensation was due the husband. On June 17, 1918, Mary A. Schaefer signed and filed a formal application with the Industrial Accident Commission requesting an adjustment of the claim of her husband and the enforcement of her lien thereon. This application, although made by the wife in her own name, was entitled, "Jack Schaefer, applicant, v. Northwestern Redwood Company, a Corporation, defendant." Notice of the hearing of the application was given for July 17, 1918. The petitioners appeared and resisted the application. At the hearing the petitioner testified that she had no authority from her husband to file the application on his behalf, that she did not know where he was, and that he had disappeared, and related the circumstances of his disappearance. On September 20, 1918, the commission denied the application of petitioner herein to dismiss the application, and on September 26, 1918, more than six months after the injury, an order was made amending the title of the application by substituting Mary A. Schaefer as the applicant instead of Jack Schaefer, and that Jack Schaefer, the injured employee, be made a defendant with the petitioner herein, and that the proceedings be continued under the new title. It was further ordered that notice of the time and place of hearing of the application should be published. On October 17, 1918, a notice of hearing was served upon the petitioners herein, and the hearing was set for January 17, 1919. It appeared on that date that the notice had not been properly published, and on February 11, 1919, the commission again set the hearing in the case and ordered publication of notice to the defendant husband. The hearing was fixed for April 30, 1919. At that time, it appearing to the commission that proper notice had been published, a hearing was had and an award made that the employee had received an injury in the course of his employment, and that by reason thereof he was entitled to $2,314.35, payable at $16.67 per week for 139 weeks; that the amount of compensation accrued and payable to December 29, 1919, equaled the sum of $1,598.40. The commission further found that Mary A. Schaefer was the deserted wife of Jack Schaefer; that she was entitled to $60 a month as a lien on his compensation from and after the 16th day of April, 1918; and that the amount accrued to the 16th day of December, 1919, a period of 20 months, was $1,200. This amount was ordered payable forthwith to Mary A. Schaefer, with an award to her of $60 a month beginning December 16, 1919, and continuing until the exhaustion of the disability indemnity of $2,314.35 due Jack Schaefer. It is claimed by the petitioners that substitution of the respondent wife as a petitioner before the commission was in legal effect the beginning of a new proceeding on her behalf after the period of 6 months fixed by law for the bringing of such proceedings had expired, and that therefore her claim is barred. This claim is based upon the assumption that the first petition was a wholly unauthorized application by the wife as agent for the husband, and, hence, ineffective to toll the statute of limitations.

[2] However, it is clear from the entire procedure that the wife from the first was seeking to enforce the obligation which the statute authorized her to enforce, namely, a claim or lien upon the compensation due her husband. The fact that the first petition was entitled as if brought by the husband is immaterial. The face of the petition showed the nature of the claim asserted and that the petitioner signed the petition in her own right. The Workmen's Compensation Act and the Constitution both expressly require the commission to proceed without formality, and the act (section 60a) directs that the awards of the commission shall not be set aside because of any informalities in the procedure. The commission is directed by the provisions of section 60(a) to "make inquiry in such manner, through oral testimony and written and printed records, as is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and carry out justly the spirit and provisions of this act. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission." In view of the nature and character of the proceeding, we hold that the mere change in the title of the petition and of the proceedings had no effect upon the substantial matters submitted to the commission for adjudication, and that they had jurisdiction under the petition as filed, with or without amendment, to determine the rights of the deserted wife to the compensation allowed to her husband and herself by law.

[3] Petitioners also claim that the award is improper because of the fact that no notice other than by publication was served upon the husband, for the reason that he is thus deprived of his property without due process of law. Respondent maintains that this constitutional question cannot properly be raised by the employer, who, in any event, is bound to make compensation. Without passing upon respondent's contention, it is sufficient to say that the purpose of this proceeding is to enforce the rights of the wife in community property located in this state, and that constructive notice to the husband is, therefore, sufficient to give jurisdiction to pass upon the questions so involved.

The proceeding may be characterized as one quasi in rem. In such proceeding notice by publication is a sufficient compliance with the federal Constitution. The distinction between this type of action and an action in personam is pointed out in L. R. A. 1918F, 609, 610. It is unnecessary to discuss this matter at length, as the right to subject this claim within the state of California to the lien of the wife is sufficiently clear from the authority just cited. The rule in such matters is stated in the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565:

> "The state, having within it certain property of a nonresident, may hold and appropriate it to satisfy the claims of her citizens against him, and her tribunals may inquire into his obligation to the extent necessary to control the disposition of that property. If he has no property within the state, there is nothing upon which her tribunal can adjudicate."

[4] The petitioners next contend that there is a presumption that the husband is dead, and that, therefore, the award is improper. It is argued that the presumption that the husband is innocent of crime overcomes the presumption of the continuance of life, and that, therefore, the presumption of innocence required the commission to find that the husband was dead. This contention is based upon the fact that under section 270a of the Penal Code it is a felony for a husband to willfully abandon his wife in a destitute condition, or to refuse or neglect to provide such wife with necessary food, clothing, etc. It appears, however, that the commission were amply justified in finding that the injured employee was still living. The wife has never heard from him since his arrival in San Francisco. Either he left home intending to desert his wife or afterward formed that intention, or suddenly died without sufficient warning to notify his wife of his condition. He was in good health when he left home. There was no reason, other than his sudden death or an intention to desert, why he should not have written his bride of two months, if, for any reason he had changed his plan to come home the next Sunday. If he had died suddenly, no doubt the wife would have been notified. She received no such notice. There were other facts and circumstances, which need not be stated, which also supported the conclusion of the commission that Jack Schaefer was living.

HORTON et al. v. GOODENOUGH et al.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑115, 118 — "Surface waters" means waters falling by precipitation or arising in springs; obstruction of flow of surface waters not within right of owner.

One has no right to obstruct the flow onto his land of what are technically known as "surface waters," but the term does not include all waters which may be on or moving across the surface of the land without being collected into a natural water course, being confined to waters falling on the land by precipitation or arising thereon in springs.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Surface Water.]

2. Waters and water courses 🔑54 — Owner may protect against "flood waters" though obstruction causes water to flow on another's land.

One has the right to protect himself and his land against "flood waters," that is, waters escaping from a natural water course in time of flood or overflow, and for such purpose may obstruct the flow onto his land, even though such obstruction causes them to flow onto land of another.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Flood Water.]

3. Waters and water courses 🔑38, 51, 78 — "Water course" is stream with definite channel; flow of natural water course may not be obstructed or diverted.

One may not obstruct or divert the flow of a natural water course, "water course" not meaning the gathering of errant waters while passing through a low depression, swale, or gulley, but a real stream, with a definite channel, with bed and banks, within which they flow at the times when the streams of the region habitually flow.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Water Course.]

4. Waters and water courses 🔑54—Waters breaking from channel are "flood waters" against which threatened property owner can protect himself; "surface waters."

Where a stream coming out of the mouth of a canyon has left a cone of detritus and flows down one side thereof, but in a time of high water it breaks out of its channel to flow down the other slope of the cone, such waters are flood waters running wild, and any property owner threatened thereby has the right to protect himself against them as best he can, the waters not being "surface waters" in the technical sense, it being immaterial that the escaping waters have made for themselves a channel or follow some natural channel, gulley, or depression to come to defendant property owner, who has protected himself against them, as a stream, instead of spreading out over the ground.

5. Pleading 🔑280—Leave to file supplemental answer pleading former judgment properly refused in absence of allegation that particular issue in present case was determined.

In an action for damages to plaintiffs from the acts of defendants in interfering with the course of flood waters, diverting them from their own lands upon plaintiff's, the trial court properly refused to a defendant leave to file supplemental answer pleading judgment against a plaintiff in another action brought by him against such defendant; such supplemental answer not alleging that the issue in the present case was in fact determined by the former judgment adversely to plaintiff, and not making any equivalent allegation to show any estoppel on plaintiff.

6. Judgment 🔑713(1)—Determination works estoppel when issue is one necessarily determined by jury in order to reach verdict.

If the issue as to which estoppel by former judgment is claimed was one which had to be determined by the jury to reach their verdict, the verdict and consequent judgment are a final determination of the issue binding on the parties in all subsequent litigation; but, if the issue was not one which the jury had to decide to reach verdict, the determination does not work an estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by J. M. Horton and another against Edgar D. Goodenough and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. [1-3] This as an action wherein the plaintiffs seek to enjoin the continued maintenance by the defendants of certain small structures which the latter have built for the purpose of preventing water from flowing onto their lands. There is no question but that the defendants built the structures complained of or that the structures, or one of them, had the effect of diverting the water from the course it otherwise would have followed into a course which finally led some of it to the plaintiffs' land. The only question is as to the right of the defendants to maintain the structures. The primary rules of law governing such a case are simple enough and well settled, and are three in number. First, one has no right to obstruct the flow onto his land of what are technically known as surface waters. Heier v. Krull, 160 Cal. 441, and authorities therein cited at page 444, 117 Pac. 530. But by "surface waters" are not meant any waters which may be on or moving across the surface of the land without being collected into a natural water course. They are confined to waters falling on the land by precipitation or rising thereon in springs. Putting it conversely, they do not include waters flowing out of a natural water course, but which yet were once a part of a stream and have escaped from it, "flood waters" in other words. McDaniels v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Farnham on Waters, § 278. Second, one has the right to protect himself against "flood waters," that is, waters of the character last described, and for that purpose to obstruct their flow onto his land, and this even though such obstruction causes the water to flow onto the land of another. Barnes v. Marshall, 68 Cal. 569, 10 Pac. 115; Lamb v. Reclamation District, 73 Cal. 126, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237; Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169. Third, one may not obstruct or divert the flow of a natural water course. But by a "water course" is not meant the gathering of errant water while passing through a low depression, swale, or gully, but a stream in the real sense, with a definite channel with bed and banks, within which it flows at those times when the streams of the region habitually flow. Los Angeles, etc., Ass'n v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 466, 37 Pac. 375; Sanguinetti v. Pock, supra; San Gabriel Country Club v. Los Angeles, 188 Pac. 554; Simmons v. Winters, 21 Or. 35, 27 Pac. 7, 28 Am. St. Rep. 727.

Such being the law, the complaint and findings are quite uncertain as to the character of the waters whose diversion by the defendants' obstructions is complained of. They are alleged and found to be "surface or flood waters." But if these words are used in their technical senses, surface waters and flood waters are not the same, and the defendants have not the right to obstruct them in the one case and have the right in the other. Nor is the uncertainty removed by assuming that the words were not used in a strictly technical sense, but that what was meant was that the waters were errant waters flowing over the surface of the ground without being gathered into the channel of a water course. If that be the meaning, then the character of the waters as surface or flood waters in the technical sense is not stated, and yet according as they are one or the other the plaintiffs are or are not entitled to recover. Nor is this uncertainty cured by the further statement in the complaint and findings that the obstructions were of waters "in natural channels." It is quite evident from the context that the channels so spoken of were channels only for flood and surface waters, and were not the channels for water courses or streams in the real sense. Apparently the cause was tried and decided upon the theory that the defendants had no right in any case to obstruct the flow of water onto their lands. Such is not the law. If the water was flood water, the defendants had the right to divert it from their lands even though such diversion injured the plaintiffs. It may perhaps be that even in such a case the defendants could not divert the water in a manner which would unnecessarily injure the plaintiffs, but that question is not presented and does not require consideration.

But we need not decide the case upon any insufficiency of the complaint and findings. The evidence, while perhaps somewhat obscure on certain points, is without substantial conflict, and we believe the material facts appear with reasonable certainty. The water whose diversion is complained of came from a cañon known as Jepson Cañon, which opens off the west side of the Sespe valley in Ventura county. This valley extends north and south, draining to the south, and the lands of all the parties are within it. Through approximately the middle of the valley runs the county road, which is its main highway. The lands of the defendants Hiller and Birss lie side by side on the west side of this road, and fronting upon it; that of Hiller being the more northerly of the two tracts. At their rear or westerly ends these tracts are almost immediately against the mouth of the Jepson Cañon. Directly to the east and across the main road from them lies the land of the defendant Goodenough. It fronts on the road at its westerly end, and extends easterly to the Arroyo Sespe, or Sespe creek, which flows to the south approximately parallel with the county road and drains the valley. The land of the plaintiffs is some distance to the south from Goodenough's land, and, like it, lies on the east of the county road, fronting upon it and extending from it to the Arroyo Sespe. The plaintiff Turner holds the legal title to the land, while the plaintiff Horton is the equitable owner. For the purposes of discussion we may treat them as a single plaintiff.

In January of 1914, at a time of extreme high water, some of the water of Jepson Cañon on emerging from it took a course which it had not previously followed, at least not since the region was settled up, and came in a stream against the west fence of Hiller's land near its southwest corner. There it turned southerly along the fence to the northerly end of Birss' west fence, and continued southerly along the latter. When it approached the southwest corner of Birss' land, it cut across it to the east and followed easterly along his south line to the main county road. It then flowed across this road and against the land of Goodenough at its southwest corner. It there went through or over his fence and followed along his southerly line until it lost itself in the Arroyo Sespe. In the years following the first invasion of the lands of the defendants in this manner, some of the water from the cañon continued to escape in similar fashion in times of high water and to follow the same course, and each of the defendants endeavored to protect his land against it. The obstructions erected for that purpose are those which the plaintiff seeks to have abated in this action. Those of Hiller and Birss were to keep the water outside their west fence instead of permitting it to come through and flow along the fence on the inside, and did not otherwise change the course of the stream. After reaching the south end of Birss' fence, it turned east as before, along his south line and came to the main county road, which it crossed to Goodenough's land. Goodenough's obstruction was to prevent the water coming through his fence at this point, and it had the effect of changing the course of the stream and turning the water south along the county road, where it distributed itself upon Goodenough's neighbors, including the plaintiff.

Upon the foregoing facts we are unable to see upon what possible theory it can be said that the plaintiff is injured by the obstructions of Hiller and Birss; and, unless he is injured, he has no cause of action against them, regardless of whether they had the legal right to maintain the obstructions or not. Their obstructions, as we have in effect said, did not in the slightest change the point at which the water reached the county road, crossed it, and ran against the fence of Goodenough. It was the latter's obstruction alone that turned the water south along the county road so that is finally came to the plaintiff. This is sufficient for a disposition of the case as to Hiller and Birss. This conclusion is possibly not true as to Hiller. There is a hint in the evidence—it is hardly more than that—that before Hiller put in her obstruction, the water when it came through her fence, instead of following along it to the south, as the plaintiff himself testifies, went northeasterly across her land to the channel of the main stream from the cañon. If this were the fact, then her obstruction did have the effect of turning the water south so that it finally reached the plaintiff's land when otherwise it would not have done so, and her position is the same as that of Goodenough. As to Birss, however, we have been unable to find even a hint in the evidence that his obstruction had any such effect.

The situation as to Goodenough is, of course, different. His obstruction undoubtedly had the direct effect of turning the course of the water so as to make it come to and upon the plaintiff's land. Before discussing the situation so presented, we cannot, however, avoid the observation that if the neighboring landowners about the mouth of Jepson Cañon, all of whom are threatened by flood waters from it, had done the only rational thing of uniting upon some plan to take care of those waters, instead of litigating about their respective rights when the waters are upon them, the cost in all probability would have been less than the final expense of this litigation to either side; and in the meantime presumably the waters are still not taken care of. But the parties have not seen fit to do this and it is necessary to determine just what their legal rights are.

The physical situation at the mouth of Jepson Cañon is a not uncommon one in this state. At the mouth of the cañon there is a cone of detritus washed down the cañon during the centuries, with its apex in the cañon and extending out fan-like over the valley lands. In all probability, the stream on coming to the cone has in times past shifted from one side to the other of it as the channel has from time to time filled up or been obstructed. It is probably apt again to shift its channel in the same manner unless prevented by artificial means. But at the present time, and for many years now, the channel of the stream has been on the northeasterly slope of the cone, coming down to the northerly portion of Hiller's land and thence across it and the northerly portion of Goodenough's land to the Arroyo Sespe. For years prior to 1914 no water, even in times of high water, broke out of this channel to flow down the southeast slope of the cone. In the extreme high water of January of that year, however, some of the water of the stream did break out and flow to the southeast, and it is this water which came to Hiller's land at its southwest corner and ultimately caused this litigation. In breaking out it evidently made something of a channel so that since that time some water has taken the same course in times of high water, even though the water was not as high as in 1914 when the break was first made. The legal question presented is: Has a landowner below such a break the right to protect his land against the water coming through it even though his doing so has the effect of causing the water to seek an outlet over the land of a neighbor?

[4] To this question we can see but one answer, and that is that he has such right. The waters are plainly flood waters breaking out of their channel and running wild, and as such each property owner threatened has the right to protect himself against them as best he can, under the authority of the decisions we have already cited, the most notable of which is Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra. The waters are not surface waters in the technical sense, for they have already been gathered into a stream whence they have escaped.

The plaintiff relies upon the authority of Ventura, etc., Co. v. Meiners, 136 Cal. 284, 68 Pac. 818, 89 Am. St. Rep. 128, but we are unable to see its applicability. The final question there involved was as to whether one of the parties was or was not a riparian owner, and this in turn depended on whether the banks of the stream were those of its channel in times of usual flow or were the high banks further back which included between them river bottom land over which the stream habitually flowed in high water but not at other times. It was held that the latter were the true banks. Now it may well be that the floor of Jepson Cañon is of the same character, that is, bottom land over which the stream flows in high water with a smaller channel or channels in it to which the stream is confined at other times. But the question here is not as to what were the banks of the stream in Jepson Cañon, but did the water whose course the defendant diverted escape from that stream on its emerging from the cañon, no matter what its banks were. That the water was from the stream seems to be assumed without question and is plainly shown by the plat introduced in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff. That it escaped from the stream would seem to be perfectly plain from the fact that it left the main body of the stream and took a course which it had not previously followed.

Nor is the fact material that the waters have made for themselves a channel or follow some natural channel, gully or depression, and now come to the defendants' lands as a stream instead of spreading out over the ground. The waters do not come as the stream of a natural water course following its accustomed channel, but as a stream which has escaped from such a channel and is following a new and unaccustomed course. The fact that in their course they make a channel or perhaps follow some natural runway made by surface waters does not change their character or give to the course which they follow the character of a natural water course. A natural water course is, as we have said, only the course of a permanent stream, that is, permanent in the sense that it habitually flows when the streams of the region are accustomed to flow and not merely in times of storm when surface water is running off.

The case, it seems to us, is plainly controlled by the authorities we have mentioned. But even if it were one of first impression, we do not see how any other rule could reasonably be adopted in such a situation as that presented at the mouth of Jepson Cañon. There is, and has been for years, a definite channel for the stream emerging from the cañon and crossing the valley to the arroyo. The lands about the mouth of the cañon have been settled and improved upon the assumption that the stream would continue to follow this channel. The channel being there, it is to the interest of every one that it should remain there, with the possible exception of the landowners through whose lands it runs. They, perhaps, might be benefited by the shifting of the stream, but their lands are subject to the legal burden of the channel as it is, and there is no reason why this burden should be shifted to lands of others. The other landowners have the legal right to have the stream continue in this channel, and could object to its diversion to another course by artificial means. It is, however, possible that it may be diverted by natural means. The danger of this happening is one common to all the lands immediately below, and, if the threat becomes a reality and the stream or a part of it does shift, it would be both unjust and unpractical not to permit the particular landowner whose property is invaded to protect himself as best he may. There is no reason why he should bear the entire burden of what is a common danger. Every reason which induced the adoption of the rule as to flood waters in the first instance applies here. Any other rule would be a hindrance and not a help to settlement and improvement. In particular, there would be little inducement for any united effort to keep the stream where it both properly and legally belongs, and yet such effort is the only practical means of ending or minimizing the common danger. Our conclusion, therefore, is that both upon authority and reason the defendants had the right to protect themselves against the water in question, and that the judgment against them is without support.

[5] Since a new trial is necessary, there is a further point which should be determined. At the trial, the defendant Goodenough asked leave to file a supplemental answer pleading a judgment against the plaintiff in another action brought by him against Goodenough. The court refused leave to file the answer, and this ruling is complained of. The ruling was correct. The answer was wholly insufficient to show any estoppel of the plaintiff. It alleges merely that the complaint in the first action alleged that the defendant therein had obstructed natural water channels and had thereby caused water to flow upon and across the plaintiff's land, that the defendant had answered denying this allegation, that the action had been tried and evidence presented upon the issue so made, and that judgment had been given that the plaintiff take nothing by his action. But it does not follow that, merely because the issue was made and judgment then had (and this, in effect, is all that is alleged), the issue was determined by the judgment. The judgment may have been based upon other issues entirely, for example, upon issues raised by some plea in abatement. It is not even alleged what the action was for. It may have been that the diversion alleged and as to which issue was made was not the gravamen of the plaintiff's supposed cause of action, and that the issue was really not material, and that the action was determined without regard to it. In the absence of an allegation that the issue was in fact determined by the judgment adversely to the plaintiff, or some equivalent allegation, the answer did not show any estoppel upon the plaintiff.

[6] We learn from the briefs that the action was in fact one for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's diversion, that a jury trial was had and a general verdict returned in favor of the defendant, and that upon this verdict judgment was entered. Inasmuch as the defendant may offer a more complete pleading before a new trial is had, and the question is discussed as if these further facts were before us, it may be well to discuss them now. The case, then, is one of a judgment given upon a general verdict. The rule in regard to it is a simple one. If the issue, as to which estoppel is claimed, is one which had to be determined by the jury in order to arrive at the verdict they reached, the verdict and consequent judgment are a final determination of the issue binding upon the parties in all subsequent litigation. On the other hand, if the issue were not one which the jury had to decide to arrive at their verdict, as, for example, if in the other action there were other issues presented by the defendant's answer which made out a good defense even though this particular issue were determined favorably to the plaintiff's contention, then it is not possible to say that this issue has in fact been determined one way or the other, and there is no estoppel with regard to it. The pleadings are not before us, and we do not know just what the issues were, but presumably the defendant denied any injury to the plaintiff by the diversion, and, if he did, the jury, as plaintiff's counsel well say, may have reached their verdict upon that issue alone. The following statement from Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 608 (24 L. Ed. 214), covers the case exactly:

> "It is undoubtedly settled law that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties. But to this operation of the judgment it must appear, either upon the face of the record or be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record—as, for example, if it appear that several distinct matters may have been litigated, upon one or more of which the judgment may have passed, without indicating which of them was thus litigated, and upon which the judgment was rendered—the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large, and open to a new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined."

See, also, 1 Freeman on Judgments, §§ 276 and 276a; 23 Cyc. 1536, 15 R. C. L. 980.

We should, perhaps, in this connection call attention to the distinction between a judgment operating by way of estoppel in a later action upon a different cause of action and one operating by way of bar against a second action upon the same cause of action. If in this case the other action had been upon the same cause of action as the present, that is, had been an action to abate the defendant's obstructions, a judgment for the defendant upon the merits would have been a bar to a second action for the same purpose, regardless of what different or various issues may or may not have been presented. But, as we are given to understand, the other action was not the same as the present. The judgment in it can therefore not operate as a bar to the present action, but at most only as a judicial determination binding upon the parties of issues again involved between them. In order that it may so operate, it must of necessity appear that it did in fact determine those issues. This, of course, we cannot determine, as the judgment roll is not before us.

ROBINSON et al. v. WESTERN STATES GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

1. Electricity 🔑19(5)—Evidence sufficient to show that deceased was killed by shock.

Evidence held sufficient to show that death was the result of electric shock, notwithstanding the statement of the coroner in the record of the certificate of death issued pursuant to St. 1907, p. 296, declaring that the cause was acute dilatation of the heart, and although such certificate is by section 15 made prima facie evidence; it appearing that the statement was based on hearsay, and there was no medical attendance at the time of the death.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

The decision of the jury on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

3. Electricity 🔑16(4) — Act of electric company in so maintaining line that current passed into windmill negligence.

Where an electric company prepared a branch line for the purpose of operating a motor at a windmill, it was negligence for the company to allow poles which had sagged so as to come near the windmill to remain in a position where current might be transmitted into the structure, wires and chains leading from the top, for it is the duty of an electric company to use all reasonable care necessary under the circumstances.

4. Evidence 🔑318(1)—Trial 🔑110—Claim by physician for services at inquest inadmissible as hearsay, and it was misconduct to read it.

Where an electric company contended that death was due to heart dilatation, and not shock, and offered a death certificate so stating, a claim presented to the county by a physician who was at the inquest was inadmissible, being hearsay, and it was improper for counsel, in offering the same, to read the contents.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1170(6)—Error in attempting to get certain matters before jury harmless.

Where an electric company contended that death was the result of heart dilatation, and not shock, and plaintiff's counsel, in attempting to contradict the recital of the death certificate that heart dilatation was the cause, read part of the contents of a claim by a physician at the inquest against the county, which was for only $5, and the court, after excluding such claim, charged that plaintiff's failure to produce the physician warranted a presumption he would testify in accordance with the recitals of the certificate, any error was harmless, and should, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1, be disregarded.

6. Electricity 🔑19(4)—Evidence that another received a shock under similar circumstances admissible.

In an action for death, asserted to be the result of shock, evidence that some three months after, and under similar circumstances, another person received a shock, was admissible.

7. Evidence 🔑493—As to physical effects of electric shock admissible.

Where an electric company contended that death was the result of heart dilatation, and not shock, testimony by a lay witness, who had observed people receiving fatal shocks of high voltage, that skin discolorations similar to those on deceased were found, etc., was admissible.

8. Witnesses 🔑380(5)—Evidence of record at coroner's inquest inadmissible on ground of surprise.

Where defendant offered a witness, who testified to deceased's complaints of pains in his heart, defendant cannot, on the theory that it was surprised, read in evidence the witness' testimony at the coroner's inquest, where it was similar to that given at the trial.

9. Trial 🔑296(3)—Instruction on duty of electric company not erroneous, when considered with others.

In an action for death resulting from electric shock, an instruction that it was not only the duty of defendant electric company to construct its power line in a safe and substantial manner, but to keep it in such condition, when considered with other instructions that the duty had been discharged when due care had been used to make the line safe from injury, was not objectionable as declaring defendant liable unless the line was absolutely safe.

10. Death 🔑105—Separate awards to heirs unauthorized.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, heirs of a decedent cannot maintain separate actions for his death, and separate awards of damages in favor of each heir are improper.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1070(1) — Separate damages for two heirs harmless, where the appeal of one heir was dismissed.

A verdict in a death action, which awarded damages separately to each with heirs, though erroneous, was harmless, where the appeal of one of the heirs was dismissed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Lyda Robinson and another against the Western States Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs sue as heirs of William S. Robinson, deceased, to recover damages accrued to them from his death, which it is alleged was caused by the negligence of the defendant. Lyda Robinson is the widow, and Eliza J. Robinson the mother, of the decedent. Both of them were at the time of his death dependent upon him for support and maintenance.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Evan Williams and Donald Y. Lamont, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Elliott & Atkinson and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant was operating power wires by means of which it was in the business of transmitting electricity from its power plant to consumers. Robinson owned a farm on which he maintained a windmill. The upper part of the windmill was made of metal, and was so arranged that the fans could be turned in any direction by means of a chain and a small wire attached to the metal parts at the top of the mill and hanging down to within 3 feet of the ground. A branch of the power line maintained by the defendants, consisting of three transmission wires, ran to said windmill. It is alleged that the defendant negligently constructed said power line, so that by the natural operation of the wind, water, and gravity, its wires carrying electricity would be likely to come in contact with the metal parts of said windmill, and that as a consequence said wires did come in contact with the same; that the soil about the mill was damp, and the electric current would readily turn from said wires and flow down said small wire and chain to the ground, when ever any one standing on the ground should take hold of or touch said chain to turn said windmill; that it was necessary in the course of his farming operations for said Robinson to turn said windmill into or out of the wind by grasping and pulling said chain and wire; that all this was known to the defendant; that while said Robinson was manipulating said windmill in the course of his farming operations he grasped said chain for that purpose, while the metal part of said mill was in contact with one of said wires, he being unaware of any danger therefrom; and that by reason of the carelessness aforesaid the electricity then being carried over said wires of the defendant was transmitted to and through the body of said Robinson into the ground, greatly injuring him and causing his death.

The main power line of the defendant ran along the road in front of the Robinson farm. In May, 1913, a branch line running to his house for lighting purposes was extended about 600 feet to the windmill to carry power to run the pump. Robinson proposed to substitute an electric motor for the windmill. He had not procured the motor at the time of his death, but an electric current of 11,000 volts had been turned on the wires of the branch line. The windmill was constructed in the usual manner upon a wooden frame of four uprights, forming a square about 8 feet in size at the bottom and converging toward the top. When first built, one of the wires of the branch line was about 12 inches from the vane of the mill when it was turned toward the wire. In the fall of 1913 transformers weighing 600 pounds were placed near the top of the two poles nearest the mill. From the weight of these, the force of the wind, and the softness of the ground in which the poles were set, they began to lean toward the mill. Ten days before his death there was a heavy windstorm, which blew down several poles of the main line and threw the other poles out of plumb.

There was no eyewitness to the death of Robinson. He left his house a little before 10 o'clock in the forenoon of February 19, 1915, and some time after 10 o'clock his body was found under the windmill, lying within the square formed by the uprights of the frame, close to the chain used for turning the mill.

[1, 2] The claim that the evidence is insufficient to prove that the deceased was killed by a shock of electricity from the defendant's wires cannot be upheld. The evidence is wholly circumstantial, but it is sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that such electricity was the cause of his death. As above stated, the top of the windmill and the nearest wire were only 12 inches apart when the line was constructed. Afterwards the poles were seen to be leaning towards the mill. It was extremely probable that the vibration of the two under the influence of a strong wind would bring them into contact. The power wire was carrying 11,000 volts. If it came into contact with the vane of the mill, the current would be likely to pass therefrom down the wire and chain, and to the hand of the person grasping the chain. If the ground was wet, as the evidence showed, this would close the circuit from the power line to the ground through the body of such person. When Robinson's body was found his lips were swollen, the lower lip was split open, there was a clot of blood at his nose and the right side of his face and chin, his right ear, and the right side of the neck was discolored, and his neck swollen and enlarged. There is evidence that these symptoms would not be caused by heart disease, which the defendant claimed was the cause of his death. No such appearances were on his body when he left the house for the mill. Evidence was given by a person, not a physician, but who had had the experience of seeing a number of persons injured by electric charges, to the effect that a swelling of the neck and discoloration of the skin or flesh appeared upon such persons immediately after the shock. It was shown that some three months afterwards, with conditions substantially as they were at the time of his death, a young man who was manipulating the windmill by the chain received a severe shock of electricity, which caused his lip to swell and crack and become discolored.

The only evidence of any other cause of death was testimony to the effect that he had shortly before his death complained of pain about his heart, and a certified copy of the record of the death of Robinson, issued by the state registrar under the act of March 18, 1905, as amended in 1907 (Stats. 1905, p. 115; Stats. 1907, p. 296), showing the record of facts required to be kept by that act relating to the death of persons, and among other things that the cause of his death was "acute dilatation of heart." It also contains this statement: "I hereby certify post mortem Feb. 20, 1915." This statement appears to have been made by A. D. Fenton, the coroner of Sacramento county, and by him reported to the state registrar. It also appears to have been signed by J. Milton Ward, M. D. Section 15 of the act (Stats. 1907, p. 300) provides that a copy of the record of the death made under the act, when certified by the state registrar or the local registrar to be a true copy thereof, shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of the facts therein stated. Section 6 of the act requires that the certificate of death shall state, among other things, the cause of the death. In this case the death occurred "without medical attendance." In such cases section 7 provides that the coroner shall within three days after the inquest furnish the local registrar a certificate as required by the act, containing as many of the facts required as can be ascertained, and that the local registrar shall then transmit such certificate to the state registrar. It is obvious, therefore, that the statements in the certificate must have been founded upon hearsay, and that, although made prima facie evidence by the act, it is not entitled to a very high degree of credence, in the face of other evidence on the subject tending to show another cause of death. But, however this may be, this evidence relating to heart disease as the cause of death had no effect further than to produce a conflict in the evidence, upon which the decision of the jury is final.

[3] It is not seriously contended that the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence proximately causing the death, if we assume electricity as the cause. It was the duty of the defendant, in placing wires for the transmission of electricity, to use all reasonable care necessary under the circumstances to prevent the electricity from escaping from the line in such a manner as to be dangerous to persons or property. It was negligence to allow the poles to remain so placed that the vibration of the poles and the windmill from the wind, coupled with the settling and leaning of the poles, might bring the wires and the vane in contact. A violent windstorm occurred a few days before the accident, which blew down a number of the poles of its main line. A day or two after, and before the accident, the defendant repaired this line; but there is no claim that it even inspected the branch line, while at the same time maintaining therein a current of 11,000 volts. There being evidence that the death was caused by electricity, it is only reasonable to conclude that the wires and the vane did come in contact at that moment, thus establishing the negligence in placing the two so near together as the cause of death.

Appellant further contends that there was prejudicial misconduct, both by the court and by the attorneys for the plaintiff; also that the court erred in its rulings on evidence and in giving an instruction to the jury.

[4, 5] The principal assignment of misconduct is that the plaintiff's attorney, during the trial, when offering papers in evidence, attempted to read the contents of the incompetent documents in the presence of the jury, and that the court failed to use sufficient promptness in preventing him from doing so. In order to controvert the effect of the death certificate as evidence that acute dilatation of the heart was the cause of the death, the plaintiffs offered in evidence a claim presented to Sacramento county by Dr. Ward for his services at the inquest upon the body, showing a charge of only $5, and solely for examining the body. The evidence was hearsay and incompetent. It was not necessary for the plaintiff, in making the offer, to read the document or state any portion of the contents thereof, and the court, under the circumstances of the case, should have prevented him from doing so. He proceeded, however, to read enough to show that the claim was only $5, and that it had been allowed and paid. An objection to its admission was sustained, and the document rejected as evidence. After the close of the evidence the jury was instructed that, by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to produce Dr. Ward as a witness to contradict the recitals of the death certificate concerning the cause of death, a presumption was raised that, if produced, he would testify in accord with said recitals. We think the ruling rejecting the evidence and this instruction, taken together, so far lessened the injurious effect of the misconduct aforesaid that it cannot be deemed sufficient to justify a reversal of the case. Misconduct is not cause for reversal or a new trial, unless it has the effect of preventing the complaining party from having a fair trial. Code Civ.

Proc. § 657, subd. 1. The other assignments of misconduct are too trivial to be worthy of discussion.

[6] The defendant insists that the court erred in admitting evidence that the witness Brugler received a shock of electricity some 3 months after the death of Robinson when he was grasping the chain at the windmill. We think the evidence was properly admitted. There was evidence to show that the circumstances at the time he received the injury were substantially the same as those existing when Robinson came to his death. Under these circumstances, it is proper to prove the effects of the conditions so existing, upon the principle that, if an electric shock was produced upon Brugler, it would be probable that it might have been produced upon Robinson under the same circumstances. Proof of other manifestations of electric contact between the wires and the windmill about the same time was admissible for the same reason.

[7] The evidence that the shock received by Brugler caused his lip to swell and crack and his chin to become discolored was properly admitted. It showed that the effect of the shock was to create those appearances and that they were almost identical with those found on the body of Robinson. Evidence to prove the effects of such shocks may be given in other ways than by the testimony of experts. Actual occurrences under the same conditions, showing the effects, is competent proof thereof. It tended to prove that Robinson also received an electric shock.

The same rule applies to the admission of testimony of the witness Cannon. He testified that he was engaged in electrical work, and had been for about 14 years; that he had received electric shocks himself, and that he had seen other people receive electric shocks of fairly high voltage about a dozen times. He described the effects of electric shocks upon the body of a man at the moment of receiving it, and also testified that one of the results was a swelling of the neck and of the tongue, and that afterwards a discoloration of the skin appeared. The testimony was revelant, and although the witness was not a physician, and had received no special academic education concerning the results of electric shocks, he had had many years of experience and observation, and was competent to testify as to the results of his experience and observation on that subject.

[8] The defendant called Mrs. Stevens, a sister of the deceased, to testify concerning the heart trouble. She testified to several complaints by deceased at different times of pain in his heart. Claiming to be surprised at the testimony of the witness, the defendant's attorney offered to ask her about her testimony at the coroner's inquest on the same subject. Objection was made that the answer was not impeaching and did not tend to explain the surprise. The objection was sustained. There was no error in this ruling. Her testimony at the coroner's inquest was a more condensed statement than her testimony on the trial, but was not essentially different therefrom.

[9] The court gave the following instruction:

> "It was not only the duty of the defendant to construct its power line leading to the mill on the Robinson premises in a safe, substantial manner, but also to keep it in such condition by constant oversight and repair."

The defendant urges that under this instruction the jury would be required to find the defendant guilty of negligence, unless the power line was built and maintained so that it would be absolutely safe against injury from the escape of electricity. If the instruction had been standing alone, it possibly might have been so understood. But the court instructed the jury very elaborately to the effect that the defendant's duty was discharged when it had used due care to make the line safe from injury to others, and that due care required that the wires be so placed with reference to other conducting agencies that dangerous contact would not be probable. These charges were repeated several times, and the jury could not have failed to understand that the care required of the defendant was the reasonable care required by the circumstances and the character of the agency under its control.

The defendant complains of many rulings of the court in addition to those above noticed. We do not think any of them are of sufficient importance to justify us in mentioning them.

[10, 11] At the direction of the court the jury returned a verdict for separate damages to each plaintiff, giving $2,000 to each of them. The defendant excepted to the instruction which directed the verdict in that form, but the record does not show that any objection was made when the verdict was returned, or at any time afterward in the court below, except by the specification that the verdict was against law, in the notice of intention to move for a new trial. The specifications in the bill of exceptions, stating the particular reasons for the claim that the verdict was against law, do not mention this cause as one of them. There is no specification, and no claim, that the evidence is insufficient to justify a verdict for $4,000 or $2,000 to each or either of the plaintiffs, nor any claim that the damages are excessive. The law does not authorize a verdict in this form. The action by the heirs of a person to recover damages for his death is authorized only by section 377 of the code. That section does not authorize separate actions by the several heirs.

> "So far as the heirs are concerned, a single joint cause of action is given. The language of our statute permits no other construction." Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 294, 92 Pac. 733.

So it is held that in computing the damages—

> "the loss of each and all must be considered. The statute does not provide for a distribution among the members of the family who take as the beneficiaries of the statute. * * * It is not intended that the amount recovered shall be divided into integral or proportional parts. The persons entitled do not take as heirs or by succession, but as beneficiaries of the statute; 'the statute being framed upon the theory that the heirs will always constitute the family of the deceased.'" Simoneau v. Pac., etc., Co., 159 Cal. 494, 508, 115 Pac. 320, 327.

See, also, Daubert v. Western Meat Co., 139 Cal. 480, 69 Pac. 297, 73 Pac. 244, 96 Am. St. Rep. 154.

The verdict should have been given for a lump sum to all the plaintiffs, including, of course, the damages to each of them. But we are unable to perceive that any injury has been suffered by the defendant on account of the verdict having been rendered in this form. It is said that the plaintiff, Lyda Robinson, took an appeal from the judgment. It is also said that this appeal was dismissed by her without any decision on appeal. Neither of these statements is denied by the other party. It is possible that complications arising from an appeal by one of the plaintiffs in such a case would require a reversal of the case because of the separation of the damages by the verdict and judgment; but, as it is conceded that the appeal has been dismissed, no injury could arise therefrom. The defendant has no interest in the division which the plaintiffs may make among themselves, or which may be made for them, of the damages recovered. The statute contemplates a single recovery for the benefit of the family of the deceased, or those of his heirs who are dependent upon him for support. Whether it is divided among them after recovery or not, or how it is divided, are matters of no concern to the defendant. If the damages are not excessive, as is in effect admitted by the failure to object on that account, the defendant has no reason to complain, or at least his reason is not sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, because of this defect in the form of the judgment.

PEOPLE v. HASKINS. (Cr. 938.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 22, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1920.)

1. False pretenses ⚷30 — Information held sufficient.

In prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, information alleging that defendants fraudulently represented to complaining witness that they had positions of employment for a number of men at specified wages, that such a position would be given to complaining witness on his payment of specified amount to defendants, that complaining witness, being induced by the false and fraudulent representations and relying thereon, delivered to defendants the specified sum "for one of said reported and pretended positions and immediate employment," which the defendants did not, and which they knew they did not have the power to give, held sufficient without specific allegation that defendants did not give complaining witness immediate employment.

2. False pretenses ⚷5—Intention with which complaining witness parted with money immaterial.

Defendants, who falsely pretended to be in a position to give complaining witness employment, and by reason of such pretense fraudulently obtained his money, were guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses; the intention with which complaining witness parted with his money being immaterial.

3. False pretenses ⚷9—Reliance on false representations an element of the crime.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, the state was required to prove, as an element of the crime, that the false representations made by defendants did in fact induce the complaining witness to part with his money.

4. False pretenses ⚷49(1)—Evidence of corroborating circumstances held sufficient to prove defendants' connection with crime.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses by inducing complaining witness to part with a specified amount in reliance on defendants' false representations that they could furnish him employment, evidence of circumstances in corroboration of testimony of witness that one of the defendants was connected with the transaction held sufficient to sustain such defendant's conviction, under Pen. Code, § 1110, requiring testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances in such cases.

5. Criminal law ⚷423(3)—Advertisement and correspondence admissible against a defendant not named therein, but who participated in crime.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, newspaper advertisements and correspondence between complaining witness and defendants held admissible as against a defendant not mentioned therein, where it clearly appeared that such defendant, with another defendant, was associated in a joint enterprise and equally interested in its fraudulent schemes, and together they participated in furthering its plans.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Amon J. Haskins was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses, and from judgment of conviction and from order denying motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, he appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer and Frank J. Golden, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant and Grant Todd were charged with obtaining money under false pretenses. The defendant Haskins' demurrer to the information was overruled. He was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying said motions.

It is first urged that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense. It is alleged that the defendants devised and intended by unlawful ways and means and by false and fraudulent pretenses and representations to obtain money of the complaining witness, M. E. Hart. To that end they pretended and represented to Hart that they "had positions of employment and immediate employment for a number of men at a salary of $6.40 per day, and that for the sum of $100 paid to them by the said M. E. Hart they the said Grant Todd and Amon J. Haskins would then and there give to said M. E. Hart one of said positions, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said Grant Todd and Amon J. Haskins did not then and there have positions and immediate employment for a number of men or any positions or any immediate employment for a number of men or for any man or at all for a salary of $6.40 per day or at any salary per day or at all, as they the said Grant Todd and Amon J. Haskins then and there well knew." Believing and relying upon these representations, Hart paid Todd and Haskins the sum of $100 for one of the purported positions, The pretenses and representations were in all respects false and untrue.

[1] Because the information nowhere alleges that the defendants did not give the complaining witness, Hart, a position, or immediate employment, appellant contends that it fails to state a cause of action. He relies upon the rule that it is essential that more than the conclusion that the representations were false and fraudulent be alleged; it being necessary to set out the facts upon which it may be determined whether or not the conclusion that there was a fraudulent and false representation is correct. He cites a number of instances in which the rule has been invoked. People v. Carpenter, 6 Cal. App. 231, 233, 91 Pac. 809; People v. Mahony, 145 Cal. 106, 78 Pac. 354; Ex parte Gillett, 190 Pac. 210, 211; People v. Haas, 28 Cal. App. 184, 151 Pac. 672; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488; People v. Bliss, 190 Pac. 1046, 32 Cal. App. 249. The facts there passed upon differentiate those decisions from the case at bar. For instance, in People v. Bliss, the court held that the representations alleged to have been false were representations totally disconnected with the purpose for which Lansdale parted with his money. To the like effect is People v. Kahler, 26 Cal. App. 449, 147 Pac. 228, in which the information did not disclose the purpose for which the money was paid to the makers of the alleged false and fraudulent representations. But in the case at bar the allegation is that the complaining witness, being induced by the false and fraudulent representations, and relying thereon, delivered to Todd and Haskins the sum of $100, "for one of said purported and pretended positions and immediate employment," which the defendants did not, and which they knew they did not, have the power to give.

[2] By falsely pretending to be in a position to give Hart employment, and by reason of such pretense fraudulently obtaining his money, they were guilty of obtaining that property by false pretenses. People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 595, 597, 51 Pac. 960. The intention with which Hart parted with his money was immaterial. People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 563, 36 Pac. 952; People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 272, 55 Pac. 898.

Appellant urges the insufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction. It appears that the complaining witness saw an advertisement in the San Francisco Examiner reading as follows: "Wanted, handy man for machine shop; good wages. $100 req. Box S7158, Examiner." He answered in writing, addressed as directed, and received a reply signed by Todd directing him to call at his earliest convenience. He did so, and was taken by Todd directly to defendant Haskins. He was told by Todd and by Haskins that they had immediate employment for men at $6.40 per day, and would employ him, but that in order to obtain this work he would have to give $100 for the purpose of investing in a boatbuilding corporation the defendants intended to incorporate. Hart paid $100 to the defendants and received a certain document in writing indicating an investment of $100 in the stock of the corporation, the International Aero-Marine Locomotion Company, which had not, and which has never been organized. The writing was signed by the defendant Haskins. Hart was told to report at a designated place, which he did, but, not finding any one to direct him to any work, remained there for some time, when the brother of the defendant Haskins appeared and told him to go to another place, where he found a number of men engaged in tearing down some buildings. He was assigned to this work, and after working some hours was told by the defendant Haskins that "that is all that is necessary; when we want you again we will send for you." Hart ceased work, was not sent for again, and received nothing for the work he did. There is other testimony indicating that the purported engagement of Hart was part of a scheme to fraudulently obtain possession of his $100.

[3] Whether the representations made by Haskins and Todd did in fact induce Hart to part with his money was an element of the charge to be established by the people. When the jury was convinced that he was so induced, and the representation was shown to have been false and fraudulent, and made by Haskins and Todd knowingly and designedly, the jury had the right to find that Hart was defrauded of his money by the defendant by means of such representation. People v. Bryant, supra.

[4] Appellant argues that there was no corroboration of the evidence tending to connect him with the fraudulent scheme. In this he is mistaken. The testimony of "one witness and corroborating circumstances" is sufficient in cases of this nature. Pen. Code, § 1110. The testimony of the complaining witness directly connected the defendant with the transaction. The entire conduct of the defendant as testified to by H. D. Haskins, a witness for the defense, the receipt for the $100 signed by the defendant, the advertisement in the newspaper—all these matters were corroborating circumstances when related together, sufficient in our opinion to meet the requirement of the statute. People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 564, 36 Pac. 952.

[5] It was not error to admit in evidence the advertisement in the newspaper, and the correspondence passing between Hart and the defendants. Although the defendant Haskins is not mentioned in either, his connection with the entire matter was sufficiently established by other evidence to warrant their introduction. It clearly appears that Todd and he were associates in a joint enterprise, were equally interested in its fraudulent schemes, and together participated in furthering its plans.

One of the instructions given the jury reads:

"The court further instructs you that the employment referred to in the information is employment at $6.40 a day. The information is silent upon the subject of whether such employment should be temporary or permanent. But if you find from the evidence in this case that such representation was made, that is, that upon the payment of $100 M. E. Hart would be entitled to a position at $6.40 a day, and that the defendant knew at the time he made such statement, if he did make such statement, that he could not give to the said M. E. Hart a position at $6.40 a day, and if you find all of these facts and the other essential facts to constitute the crime as you have been heretofore instructed to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt and in addition thereto that the defendant did not give a position of $6.40 a day to the said M. E. Hart, it will be your duty to return a verdict of guilty as charged in the information."

Appellant argues:

That "this instruction was a declaration of a negative pregnant; that if the defendant did not give a position of employment to Hart at $6.40 per day, but did give him employment at $7 per day, or any other sum greater or less than $6.40 per day, it was the duty of the jury, under such instruction, to have returned a verdict of guilty."

The appellant is hypercritical. The instruction is only a part of a charge, which, as a whole, fairly presented the case to the jury.

The court was justified in refusing to give defendant's requested instructions 17 and 18. Their effect, if given, would have been to virtually instruct the jury to acquit, in the first instance, and in the next to eliminate from the consideration of the jury all questions of fraudulent intent.

The orders denying a new trial and in arrest of judgment and the judgment are affirmed.

BYRON JACKSON IRON WORKS v. HOGE et al. (Civ. 2180.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 29, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 27, 1920.)

1. Fixtures 🔑14—Property sold under conditional sale to lessee remains personal property in hands of lessor.

Where owners of mining premises leased them with the right given, and under the expectation that the lessee would install machinery thereon and operate the same, and the lessee purchased machinery under a conditional sales contract, title to remain in the seller until paid for, and failed to pay for the same and vacated the premises, the machinery, although affixed to the property, remained personalty in the hands of the owners of the mining property the same as while in the possession of the lessee.

2. Sales 🔑464—Conditional sales valid.

Conditional sales under which title remains in the seller until the property is paid for are valid.

3. New trial 🔑16—Irregularities in issuance of execution not ground.

Irregularities in relation to an issuance of execution after the entry of judgment are not grounds for new trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Failure to sufficiently allege corporate character held not reversible error.

Error of the court in holding that complaint sufficiently alleged corporate character of plaintiff was not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where the complaint showed the existence of plaintiff as a corporation at the time of beginning of action, and evidence showed plaintiff was doing business as a corporation at time of the matters involved, and the answer did not deny the existence of the corporation, and the case was tried upon the theory of the plaintiff being a corporation during all times involved.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Omission of finding, which would necessarily be against appellant if made, not reversible error.

Where a finding is omitted upon an issue, which necessarily would be against the appellant if any finding was made thereon, the appellant is not injured thereby, and cannot complain thereof.

6. Limitation of actions 🔑45—Title of lessor in personalty left on land begins at date of taking possession of land.

Where lessee affixed to land machinery purchased under a conditional contract, and failed to pay for it, and vacated the land title to the property in lessor, as founded upon Code Civ. Proc. § 338, would begin at the date of his taking possession of the land; the conditional vendor having three years after such date within which to remove the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the Byron Jackson Iron Works against A. W. Hoge and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, for appellants.

Wm. B. White and L. P. Larue, both of Grass Valley, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. The defendants and appellants are, and were during all the times mentioned in this opinion, owners of a certain mining claim situate in Nevada county. During the year 1915 the defendants leased said mining premises to the Willow Valley Mining Company, and thereafter the said Willow Valley Mining Company entered into a contract for the purchase from the plaintiff of a certain pump and electric motor to be used upon the mining premises herein referred to. The pump and motor were delivered by the plaintiff to the Willow Valley Mining Company on or about the 15th of September, 1915. The agreement of sale entered into between the Willow Valley Mining Company and the plaintiff provided that the title to the pump and motor should not pass from the plaintiff to the Willow Valley Mining Company until the full purchase price thereof had been fully paid. The Willow Valley Mining Company continued operations upon the mining premises under its lease from the defendants until on or about the 6th day of March, 1916, but, according to the testimony of some of the witnesses, did not abandon its work entirely upon the leased premises until some time during the year 1917. The Willow Valley Mining Company never completed its purchase of the pump and motor herein referred to, and left said property upon the mining premises belonging to the defendants at the time it finally gave up its lease thereto. Some time after the discontinuance of operations by the Willow Valley Mining Company, and its surrender of the mining premises to the defendants, the plaintiff in this action demanded of the defendants the return of the pump and motor, which return not being made, suit was begun for the recovery of the same in the month of October, 1918. Judgment went for the plaintiff for the return of the property or the value thereof.

The appellants contend that by virtue of the provisions of section 661 of the Civil Code, the pump and motor became real estate immediately upon being brought upon the mining premises.

The testimony in this case does not clearly show whether the pump and motor were, at the time of the beginning of this action, either in place for operation or affixed to any portion of the premises, but it does show that at the time of their use they were affixed, and as the case appears to have been tried upon the theory of their having been affixed, we will so consider the same.

Section 661 was enacted in 1872, and was therefore in force at the time of the rendition of the decision in the case of Hendy v. Dinkerhoff et al., 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107, where a similar question as presented in this case appears to have first been considered by the Supreme Court of this state. In that case, Hendy had leased a steam engine and boiler to one Lampson, with the right of purchase, Lampson to become the owner upon the full payment of the purchase price, title to remain in Hendy until the purchase price was so paid. The engine and boiler were permanently affixed to a quartz mill on the mining claim, which mining claim and mill belonged to the defendant Dinkerhoff. An agreement of sale existed between Dinkerhoff and Lampson. Lampson failed to make purchase, and Dinkerhoff took possession of the mining premises and the quartz mill, including the engine and boiler purchased by Lampson from Hendy under the agreement as stated above, Lampson failing to make payment. After the premises had been restored to the possession of Dinkerhoff, Hendy began action against Dinkerhoff for the recovery of the engine and boiler, or the value thereof.

The court held in that case that, as between Hendy and Lampson, the engine and boiler remained personal property, notwithstanding the fact of their having been attached to the mill, and then asked the following question:

> "Can they be so regarded in the hands of the defendants?"

—and then used the following language:

> "How this would be if the latter occupied the position of bona fide purchasers, without notice, of the real estate to which the chattels were attached, need not be determined, for they are not in that position. They were all the time the owners of the property to which the engine and boiler were attached; and as such owners, placed Lampson in possession of the mill and mine, with authority to work them, and under an agreement on his part to purchase, and with a stipulation that, in the event he failed to do so, 'any and all machinery and tools put upon or used in said mill or mine' should become the property of the defendants. Under these circumstances, the latter must be held to stand in the shoes of Lampson, and the property in question treated as personalty in their hands as in his."

While in a proper case it would be held, under section 661, Civil Code, that the kind of property therein described would be treated as real estate, the holding of this case is clearly to the effect that it does not operate independently as a transfer of title.

In the case at bar, the defendants placed the Willow Valley Mining Company in possession of the mining premises owned by them under a lease, providing that the Willow Mining Company should operate the same, and also might exercise an option of purchase. Under these circumstances, the defendants were acting just as the defendant in the Dinkerhoff Case. They knew, or they must have known, that in order to operate the mining premises their lessee would have to purchase mining machinery and the necessary equipment.

In the case of Jordan v. Myres et al., 126 Cal. 565, 58 Pac. 1061, it appears that the Joshua Hendy Machine Works leased an engine and other machinery to one Berry, who was operating a mine belonging to the defendant, Berry obtaining the machinery from the Joshua Hendy Machine Works under a conditional sale, title not to pass until the purchase price had been paid. The machinery was attached to the mine. Payment of the purchase price was not made. Thereafter, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, it was held that the character of the property had not changed from personalty to realty so as to render the rights of the Joshua Hendy Machine Works to recover the same subject to the rights of the lienholders.

In the case of Oakland Bank of Savings v. California Pressed Brick Co. (Sup.) 191 Pac. 524, the Supreme Court reviews the various questions involved in this action, and holds substantially as follows: Notwithstanding personalty is converted into realty and is afterwards affixed to the land, it will, as between the buyer and seller, be treated as personalty. That so long as the personalty retains its character as such, the title of the conditional vendor will be good as against a subsequent mortgagee or purchaser, but that when it changes its character by reason of being affixed to real estate, a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee, without notice, will be held to have acquired the title to the personal property so affixed as against the conditional vendor.

[1, 2] The overwhelming weight of authority unquestionably is, as contended by appellant, that where personal property is sold under a contract reserving the title, to be affixed to real estate, the title of such seller becomes subject to the rights of mortgagees and purchasers in good faith and without notice of the reserved title. But that is not this case. The defendants are neither mortgagees nor purchasers. They are simply the owners of certain mining premises, which they have leased to the Willow Mining Company with the right given and under the expectation that the Willow Mining Company would install machinery thereon and operate the same.

Under such a state of facts, and under the long-established rule of decision in this state that conditional sales are valid, it must be held in this case, as in the Dinkerhoff Case, that the pump and motor were personal property in the hands of the defendants the same as while in the possession of their lessees.

[3] Other points for reversal are made by appellant, which we will now consider: First, that a new trial should have been granted for irregularities in relation to the issuance of an execution after the entry of judgment in the court below. A reference to section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, shows clearly that such contention is untenable, as no such grounds for a new trial are therein provided for.

It is also contended that the trial court erred in holding that the complaint sufficiently alleged the corporate character of the plaintiff. The complaint alleges:

> "That plaintiff is a corporation duly organized, existing and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of California."

Reliance for reversal upon this point is placed upon the decision in the case of Consolidated Concessions Co. v. McConnell, 180 Pac. 842. In that case the plaintiff alleges that it was incorporated on or about July 15, 1913. There was no averment that it continued to be a corporation, or that it was a corporation at the date of the institution of the action.

[4] In the instant case, the complaint shows the existence of the plaintiff as a corporation at the time of beginning the action. The evidence introduced shows that the plaintiff was doing business as an incorporation at the time of the conditional sale of the property involved herein. The answer does not deny the existence of the corporation alleged in the plaintiff's complaint. The whole case was tried upon the theory of the plaintiff being a corporation during all the times involved in the various transactions, and under such circumstances it would seem that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution applies, and that the error of the court in not sustaining the defendants' demurrer upon this point, if error it be, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, but that, on the other hand, it would be a miscarriage of justice to send the case back for another trial upon a point involving no substantial rights.

It is further insisted that the court below should have found upon the defendants' allegation that the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, was barred by the provisions of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[5] The authorities are, without substantial conflict, that where a finding is omitted upon an issue which necessarily would be against the appellant, if any finding were made thereon, that the appellant has not been injured by such failure.

[6] The basis for the claim that the statute has run in this case is that the defendants became the owners of the property on the 15th day of September, 1915, when it was delivered to their lessee. There being nothing in this claim, as we have heretofore shown, their title to the property as founded upon the statute of limitations would begin at the date of their taking possession of the same, which did not occur until well within the period of three years preceding the institution of this action. Hence, when the court below found that the property had not become realty, and that the title thereto did not pass by reason of its being attached to the mining premises, it disposed of all rights that were asserted to have been acquired by reason of the statute of limitations, and the finding would necessarily have been against the defendants, if any finding were made, which we must hold, under the circumstances, not to be necessary to support the judgment.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment and order of the trial court must be, and the same are, hereby affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. MALLEY. (Cr. 891.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 18, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1920.)

1. Indictment and information ⚷117—Indictment in language of statute construed in same sense as statute.

Where the language of a statute and of an indictment are the same, the indictment must be understood in the same sense as the statute.

2. Criminal law ⚷5—Legislature may repress anything deemed hurtful subject to constitutional limitations.

The Legislature has power to repress whatever it deems hurtful to the general good, the only limitations being those prescribed in the Constitution.

3. Insurrection ⚷2—Criminal Syndicalism Law not unconstitutional.

The Criminal Syndicalism Act held constitutional so far as its provisions were material in a prosecution for circulating and displaying books and other printed and written matter prohibited by that act.

4. Indictment and information ⚷71—Defendant entitled to be apprised of nature of crime.

A defendant is entitled to be apprised with reasonable, but not with absolute, certainty of the nature and particulars of the crime charged, that he may prepare his defense and plead his jeopardy against further prosecution.

5. Indictment and information ⚷110(3)—Indictment for syndicalism held sufficient in language of statute.

Under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 1, defining criminal syndicalism, and section 2, subd. 3, prescribing the punishment for circulating or displaying any book or written or printed matter advocating, teaching, aiding, abetting, or advising criminal syndicalism, an indictment following substantially the language of the statute was sufficient under Pen. Code, §§ 948, 950, 952, 957–959.

6. Indictment and information ⚷70, 71, 93—Indictment must be direct and certain and set forth facts.

No more is required than that an indictment be direct and certain and allege all the acts and facts which the Legislature has said shall constitute the offense.

7. Indictment and information ⚷110(3)—Indictment for syndicalism held sufficient though printed matter not identified.

An indictment for circulating and displaying books and printed matter prohibited by the Criminal Syndicalism Act held sufficient, though it did not identify the particular books and printed matter circulated and displayed and no copies thereof were attached, as no further statement of facts was required beyond the language employed in the statute.

8. Criminal law ⚷1186(4)—Defect in indictment not resulting in miscarriage of justice not ground for reversal.

Though an indictment for circulating and displaying books and printed matter prohibited by the Criminal Syndicalism Act was defective in not identifying the matter circulated and displayed, it was but an error in pleading not ground for reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, unless it resulted in a miscarriage of justice, especially in view of Pen. Code, § 960, relative to defects not tending to prejudice a substantial right on the merits.

9. Criminal law ⚷295—Person prosecuted a second time may establish identity of offenses by evidence.

Where an indictment for circulating and displaying books and printed matter in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act did not identify the books, etc., defendant if again prosecuted for the same offense may establish the identity of the cases by evidence; the burden being on him.

10. Insurrection ⚷2—Pamphlets and printed matter held within Criminal Syndicalism Act.

Pamphlets and printed matter displayed and exposed for sale at the headquarters of a branch of the I. W. W. of which defendant was secretary held to support a conviction for circulating and displaying matter advocating, teaching, and advising the commission of crime, sabotage, etc., in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act.

11. Insurrection ⚷2—"Sabotage" defined.

"Sabotage" in its ordinary sense means the malicious waste or destruction of an employer's property by workmen during labor troubles, but, as used in the Criminal Syndicalism Act, is defined by the act itself as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property.

12. Insurrection ⚷2—Distribution of prohibited literature held to support finding of wrongful intent.

Where defendant, the secretary of a branch of the I. W. W., distributed literature under his control and in his possession which violated the Criminal Syndicalism Act with full understanding of its nature, a finding that he intended and was attempting to bring about such consequences as might be reasonably anticipated from its distribution is warranted.

13. Insurrection ⚷5—Probable effect of literature and defendant's motives held questions for jury.

In a prosecution for circulating and displaying literature prohibited by the Criminal Syndicalism Act, the interpretation to be placed on the matters circulated and displayed, the probable effect of the circulation in the mode adopted and defendant's motives in distributing them were questions for the jury.

14. Criminal law ⚷1163(3)—Absence of prejudice presumed when not affirmatively shown.

Where there is no affirmative showing of prejudice from the court's action in admitting exhibits which were subsequently withdrawn, it will be presumed that no prejudice resulted.

15. Criminal law ⚷772(3)—Instructions held to sufficiently limit statute read to jury to allegations of indictment.

Though the court read all of sections 1 and 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act to the jury on a trial for violating subdivision 3 of section 2, where he read the indictment in full and told the jury to find defendant guilty of the crime set forth therein or not at all, there was a sufficient express limitation of the act to the allegations of the indictment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

J. P. Malley was convicted of violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and, from the judgment and orders denying motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, he appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco (R. M. Royce, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant was indicted for violating chapter 188 of the Statutes of 1919, commonly known as the Criminal Syndicalism Act. He was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. This appeal is from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, and from the judgment of conviction and sentence. The appellant contends that the indictment does not charge a public offense with the degree of certainty required, and that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction. He alleges that error was committed in the introduction of certain exhibits which were subsequently withdrawn, and complains of the action of the trial court in reading the entire statute in its charge to the jury.

The indictment charges that the defendant circulated and publicly displayed certain books, papers, pamphlets, documents, and other printed and written matter, in his possession and custody, and under his control, containing and carrying written advocacy, teaching, and advising of criminal syndicalism. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the indictment which was overruled. It is contended, on this appeal, that the ruling of the lower court was erroneous, appellant claiming that the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and that it does not contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense charged, in ordinary and concise language, in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and further that it is faulty in neither setting out, nor identifying the books, papers, pamphlets, documents, and other printed and written matter, the defendant is charged with circulating and publicly displaying.

Section 1 of the act defining criminal syndicalism, and sabotage, and prescribing what acts and methods in connection therewith amount to a violation of its provisions (Stats. 1919, p. 281), defines the term "criminal syndicalism" to be "any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change." It is declared in section 2, subd. 3, that any person who "(3) prints, publishes, edits, issues or circulates or publicly displays any book, paper, pamphlet, document, poster or written or printed matter in any other form, containing or carrying written or printed advocacy, teaching, or aid in abetment of, or advising, criminal syndicalism, * * * is guilty of a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison." Other acts constituting separate offenses under the statute are set forth in section 2, under appropriate groupings. Subdivision 1 relates to any person who by spoken or written words, or personal conduct, advocates criminal syndicalism. Subdivision 2 deals with those who in like manner justify, or attempt to justify, such doctrines. Subdivision 4 refers to those who organize or become members of societies formed for the purpose of teaching criminal syndicalism. Subdivision 5 relates to those persons who advocate criminal syndicalism for the purpose of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership, or control, or for effecting political changes.

Omitting the necessary formal parts, the indictment charges that the defendant did "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously circulate and publicly display, certain books, papers, pamphlets, documents, and other printed and written matter, then and there in the possession, custody, and under the control of him, the said James P. Malley, containing and carrying written advocacy, teaching, and advising of criminal syndicalism, to wit, advocating, teaching, and advising the commission of crime, sabotage, and other willful and malicious damage and injury to property, and unlawful acts of force and violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and effecting political changes." This averment, it will be noted, substantially follows the languages of section 1 and section 2, subdivision 3, of the statute, by the terms of which the commission of the acts, alleged in the indictment, is made a criminal offense. In support of the sufficiency of the indictment the Attorney General cites In re McDermott, 183 Pac. 437, wherein, on an application for a writ of habeas corpus, the Supreme Court said that the complaint, or deposition, in almost the exact language of the pleading in this case, stated an offense under the provisions of the "act defining criminal syndicalism." But, in the later case of Whitney v. Superior Court (Sup.) 187 Pac. 12, the court said that the objections to the sufficiency of the information to state a public offense fell within the rule announced in Re Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605, in which it was held that where an indictment purports, or attempts, to state an offense, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient will not be examined into on habeas corpus. Therefore the McDermott decision may not be relied upon to support the indictment in this case.

[1, 2] To hold that the indictment does not state a public offense would be to say that the statute defines none, for, as we shall presently show, the former follows and employs almost the precise language of certain sections of the act. The language of the statute and of the indictment being the same, the latter must be understood in the same sense as the former. People v. White, 34 Cal. 183, 186. In enacting the Criminal Syndicalism Act the Legislature declared in one of its provisions that it concerns, and is necessary to the immediate preservation of, the public peace and safety. It has power to repress whatever it deems hurtful to the general good, the only limitations being those prescribed in the Constitution. Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 679, 682. This precise question was very recently considered by the Supreme Court of the state of Minnesota. Every objection, we think, urged against this indictment, was made there in an attack upon the constitutionality of a statute, so similar as to be almost identical in many respects with ours. It was there squarely held that no right granted, or secured to the citizen, by either the federal or state Constitution, was taken away or in any way impaired by the act. The opinion aptly disposes of much of appellant's argument here as is shown by the following quotation:

> "The design and purpose of the Legislature in the enactment of the statute was the suppression of what was deemed by the lawmakers a growing menace to law and order in the state, arising from the practice of sabotage and other unlawful methods of terrorism employed * * * in furtherance of industrial ends and in adjustment of alleged grievances against employers. The facts surrounding the practice of sabotage, and like in terrorem methods of self-adjudication of alleged wrongs, are matters of common knowledge and general public notoriety of which the courts will take notice. That they are unlawful and within the restrictive power of the Legislature is clear. Sabotage as practiced by those advocating it as an appropriate and proper method of adjusting labor troubles embraces, among other lesser offensive acts, the willful and intentional injury to or destruction of the property of the employer in retaliation for his failure or refusal to comply with wage or other kindred labor demands. It amounts to malicious mischief and is a crime at common law as well as by statute. The methods of terrorism referred to in the statute have close relation to sabotage, and are practiced for the purpose of intimidation, and to coerce employers into a compliance with labor demands. Methods of that sort are equally unlawful and open to legislative condemnation.

"It is the exclusive province of the Legislature to declare what acts, deemed by the lawmakers inimical to the public welfare shall constitute a crime, to prohibit the same and impose appropriate penalties for a violation thereof. With the wisdom and propriety thereof the courts are not concerned. State v. Shevlin-Carpenter Co., 99 Minn. 158, 108 N. W. 935, 9 Ann. Cas. 634; Clark & Marshall, Crimes, § 41. Judicial consideration of enactments of the kind is limited to the inquiry whether the constitutional rights of the citizen have been invaded or violated. If such rights be in no wise infringed or abridged, the statute must stand however harsh it may seem to those who run counter to its commands. It requires no argument to demonstrate that the subject-matter of this statute was and is within legislative cognizance, vesting in that body the clear right to prohibit the advocacy or teaching of the iniquitous and unlawful doctrines which it condemns." State v. Moilen (Minn.) 167 N. W. 345, 346.

[3] The Supreme Court of California has said that no reason for holding the act beyond legislative power is obvious to it. In re McDermott, 183 Pac. 437. None is made to appear to us, in so far as its provisions are material in this case.

The rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings in criminal actions is to be determined are those prescribed by the Penal Code of this state.

Under its provisions an indictment or information is only required to contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense, with which a defendant is charged, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. If the particular circumstances of the offense charged are necessary to constitute a complete statement of the crime, the pleading must be direct, and certain in that regard. The words used are to be construed in their usual acceptance in common language, except such words and phrases as are defined by law, which are to be construed according to their legal meaning. Words used in a statute to define a public offense need not be strictly followed, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used. The degree of certainty must be such as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, upon a conviction, according to the right of the case. When these simple requirements have been complied with, the indictment, or information, is sufficient as to the statement of the act, or omission, charged as the offense. Penal Code, §§ 948, 950, 952, 957, 958, 959. These sections were taken almost verbatim from the first "act to regulate proceedings in criminal cases," passed by the Legislature in 1850 (Stats. 1850, pp. 275, 293, 294), under which it was almost immediately held that the "subtle distinctions and nice technicalities usually observed in an indictment at common law" had been abolished, and that only the substantial facts necessary to constitute the crime charged must appear. People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 238, 239. Not long afterwards it was held that while the substantial facts, necessary to constitute the crime charged, must appear in the indictment with sufficient certainty to enable the court to pronounce a proper judgment, and the party to defend the charge, it was not necessary that they be stated with the particularity which was required at common law; it being sufficient if a man of ordinary intelligence could understand that under such circumstances an offense had been committed. People v. Dolan, 9 Cal. 576, 582. The modern disposition to relax much of the ancient strictness in criminal proceedings, followed by the Legislature in substituting "in the place of the old, a new system of practice and pleading, which retains all the elements of the former so far as they are made necessary by a due regard for the substantial rights of a defendant, but discards all such elements as serve to no good purpose, but tend to embarrass and defeat the administration of justice," was approvingly referred to in People v. King, 27 Cal. 507, 510–511 (87 Am. Dec. 95), where the court said:

> "If the defendant is guilty, he stands in need of no information to be derived from a perusal of the indictment, as to the means used by him in committing the act or the manner in which it was done, for as to both his own knowledge is quite as reliable as any statements contained in the indictment. If he is not guilty, the information could not aid in the preparation of his defense."

In keeping with the broad construction placed by it upon the action of the Legislature, in establishing the more liberal method of pleading in criminal cases, the Supreme Court, from the start uniformly held, in respect to indictments generally, that they were sufficient, in matter of averments, if they contained allegations of all the acts, or facts used by the Legislature in defining the particular offense charged. People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191, 208; People v. Murray, 67 Cal. 103, 7 Pac. 178; People v. Rozelle, 78

Cal. 84, 90, 20 Pac. 36. Shortly after the Penal Code was adopted, the court held that none of its sections changed the rules of pleading so as to require a more specific allegation of the means employed in the commission of an offense, than was necessary under the former statute. People v. Weaver, 47 Cal. 106, 108.

[4] As corollary to these rules of construction, and ever mindful of the lack of care on the part of prosecuting officers, in the preparation of pleadings in criminal matters, to which Chief Justice Murray called attention in the early case of People v. Thompson, supra, the court has as consistently held that, while it is a fact that the rules of the common law with respect to criminal pleading have been greatly relaxed in this state by legislation and judicial decision, and many of the formalities and particulars formerly deemed necessary are not now required, there are certain fundamental principles which have neither been abrogated nor modified. A defendant is still entitled to be apprised with reasonable certainty of the nature and particulars of the crime charged against him, that he may prepare his defense, and, upon acquittal or conviction, plead his jeopardy against further prosecution. A defendant is entitled, under any statute, to a clear statement of the offense with which he is charged. People v. Lee, 107 Cal. 477, 480, 40 Pac. 754; People v. Webber, 138 Cal. 145, 149, 70 Pac. 1089; People v. Bergotini, 172 Cal. 717, 720, 158 Pac. 198.

[5, 6] Several separate, different, and distinct acts are enumerated in the Criminal Syndicalism Act, the commission of each, or any of which, constitutes a specific offense, though the same crime, and the defendant in order to make his defense was entitled to know what wrong he was charged with. The indictment, as already pointed out, follows substantially the language of section 1, and section 2, subd. 3, of the act, by the terms of which the commission of the acts, there enumerated, is made a criminal offense. As the statute defines, and describes, the acts constituting the particular offense, it was sufficient to describe those acts in the indictment in the language employed in the statute, applying them, of course, concretely to the defendant. People v. Ward, 110 Cal. 369, 372, 42 Pac. 894. No more was required than that the indictment be direct and certain, and allege all the acts and facts which the Legislature has said shall constitute the offense. People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 136, 138, 25 Pac. 1110. The defendant was only entitled to be apprised with reasonable certainty of the nature and particulars of the crime charged against him. People v. Lee, supra. Absolute certainty is not guaranteed to him by either legislative or judicial decision.

Had this defendant been charged with merely committing an act of criminal syndicalism in general terms, his objections would be well taken; but he was charged with the commission of a public offense by an indictment, the words of which he, and all others, were bound to construe in their usual acceptance in common language, except the word "sabotage" which carried with it the definition and legal meaning given to it by the statute. Pen. Code, § 957. He was informed in ordinary and concise language of the acts constituting the alleged crime. No other circumstances were necessary to constitute a complete offense. Bound, as we are, by the unbroken line of authorities in this state to the effect that only in exceptional cases, of which this is not one, is it necessary to do more than set out the offense in the language of the statute, we must hold this indictment sufficient. It contains, in a clear and concise statement, allegations of all the acts, and facts, used by the Legislature in defining the particular offense with which the defendant is charged. According to the established rules of pleading, the defendant was informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him. Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 372, 26 Sup. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 362.

[7] The indictment did not specify, or identify the books, papers, pamphlets, documents, and other printed matter which it is alleged the defendant circulated and publicly displayed, and no copies are attached. Appellant therefore urges the contention that the allegations that the defendant circulated and publicly displayed books and other matter "containing and carrying written advocacy, teaching and advising of criminal syndicalism," states but a conclusion of law, and also that unless the books and other matter so circulated and displayed be identified, or particularly described, the defendant is without means of knowledge sufficient to enable him to prepare a defense. We are not wholly satisfied with the indictment in this respect. We have examined a number of the decisions dealing with prosecutions similar to the one at bar. In nearly every instance, so far as we have gone, some means of identification of the documents in question was adopted. In some cases copies of publications, circulars, and pamphlets were attached to the indictment. Abrams v. United States, 250 U. S. 616, 40 Sup. Ct. 17, 63 L. Ed. 1173. In another photographic copies of posters were attached. State v. Moilen, supra. In others the book, or publication, is described by name or other designation. Pierce v. United States, 252 U. S. 239, 40 Sup. Ct. 205, 64 L. Ed. 542. While this procedure was followed in the other jurisdictions, and we highly commend its adoption in a spirit of fairness towards defendants charged with the particular offenses described by the criminal syndicalism statute, we are not prepared to hold that the omission to do so will prove fatal to a conviction under the circumstances of this and similar cases. We have already announced our conclusion that the defendant was apprised of the nature of the offense, with which he was charged, with that reasonable certainty to which he was entitled. This is not one of those cases in which any further statement of acts, or facts, is required to allege a complete offense, beyond the language employed in the statute. It was not necessary, therefore, to aver the means by which the defendant devoted himself to the dissemination of the propaganda of criminal syndicalism, which is the evil the statute strikes at. He was sufficiently charged with doing certain acts which the law forbids, the doing of which is made a criminal offense. Ex parte Foley, 62 Cal. 508; People v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 281, 52 Pac. 658.

[8] Even though the indictment was defective, in not identifying the matter circulated and displayed by the defendant, which we do not in the least admit, it was but an error in pleading, and following the mandatory direction of the Constitution (section 4½ of article 6), the judgment should not be reversed unless the error of pleading has, in the opinion of this court, formed after an examination of the entire case, resulted in a miscarriage of justice. People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 49, 167 Pac. 521; People v. Bonfanti, 181 Pac. 80. No indictment is insufficient, in this state, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits. Pen. Code, § 960; People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 90, 20 Pac. 36; People v. Ah Sing, 95 Cal. 654, 656, 30 Pac. 796. That phase of the case we shall presently consider.

[9] It was not necessary to specify the books, papers, pamphlets, or documents alleged to have been circulated and displayed by the defendant, in order to protect him from a second prosecution for the offense. If he should be again prosecuted for the offense, he may plead his conviction in the manner provided by the Code, and establish the identity of the cases by evidence; the burden being upon him. People v. Faust, 113 Cal. 172, 176, 45 Pac. 261; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 80, 122 Pac. 435.

[10] The appellant contends that the evidence in this case is insufficient to warrant his conviction. He was shown to be a member and the secretary of the San Francisco branch of the Industrial Workers of the World, an international organization, or movement, commonly known and designated as the "I. W. W." As such secretary he was in charge of its headquarters and the place of assemblage of the members of the organization. On tables, and in bookcases in the rooms were openly displayed, and exposed for sale, large quantities of pamphlets, and other printed matter, in order to purchase any of which it was necessary to consult the defendant, who stated to a number of persons previous to his arrest that it was "for sale." There were introduced in evidence as being part of the printed matter thus offered for sale by the defendant: A copy of "The One Big Union Monthly," a magazine published by the General Executive Board of the Industrial Workers of the World, and devoted to the dissemination of the preamble and doctrines of the organization, and manifestly devoted to advancing the "triumph of the one big union"; "The Liberator—a Journal of Revolutionary Progress," a considerable portion of which publication appears to be devoted to extolling Eugene V. Debs and "the invincible I. W. W."; a pamphlet entitled "The Revolutionary I. W. W.," by Grover H. Perry, from which it appears, according to its author, that "the I. W. W. is fast approaching the stage where it can accomplish its mission"; "The Red Dawn—The Bolsheviki and the I. W. W.," in which "the lesson of the Bolsheviki and the road to power of the I. W. W." are offered as a means of advancement to industrial freedom; a leaflet entitled "Poison Gas and Violence"; two books of songs, one entitled "I. W. W. Songs—To Fan the Flames of Discontent," and the other bearing a frontispiece depicting a female figure bearing a shield on which are the words "Solidarity, Class Consciousness," holding aloft a blazing torch, and standing on a platform upon which are the words "I Will Win"; a pamphlet entitled "I. W. W., One Big Union of all the Workers, The Greatest Thing on Earth"; a Russian revolutionary pamphlet, entitled "Lessons of the Revolution, by Vladimir Oulianow (N. Lenin), translated from the Russian original and published by the Bureau of International Revolutionary Propaganda attached to the commissariat for foreign affairs of the Provisional Workmen's and Peasants' Government of the Russian Republic." This pamphlet, which bears a rubber stamp indorsement "I. W. W. Hall, 1135 Mission St.," accords "all power to the Soviets," which "means a complete surrender of the administration of the country and of control over its economic resources to the workmen and peasants, whom no one would dare to resist, and who would soon learn by experience, from their own practice, justly to distribute the bread, the land, and the necessities."

We do not think it is necessary to make long quotations from these various publications, which were introduced in evidence, in order to illustrate the nature of their contents. One excerpt from the pamphlet "The Revolutionary I. W. W.," by Grover H. Perry, will suffice. The pamphlet defines the I.

W. W. organization as a "labor union that aspires to be the future society," sets forth the "interests in common" of all workers and the power that the I. W. W. would have if, when a strike is called, a whole industry could be paralyzed, and thus an employer "would be forced to accede to the demands of the workers. That is the way the I. W. W. proposes to organize." Further along we find this language:

> "The Industrial Workers of the World is an international movement; not merely an American movement. We are 'patriotic' for our class, the working class. We realize that as workers we have no country. The flags and symbols that once meant great things to us have been seized by our employers. To-day they mean naught to us but oppression and tyranny. As long as we quarrel among ourselves over differences of nationality, we weaken our cause; we defeat our own purpose. The practice of some craft unions is to bar men because of nationality or race. * * *
> "Organizing a New Social System.—The I. W W. is fast approaching the stage where it can accomplish its mission. This mission is revolutionary in character. The preamble of the I. W. W. constitution says in part: 'By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.' That is the crux of the I. W. W. position. We are not satisfied with a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. Such a thing is impossible. Labor produces all wealth. Labor is therefore entitled to all wealth. We are going to do away with capitalism, by taking possession of the land and the machinery of production. We don't intend to buy them, either."

As was well said by the writer of the opinion in Kumpula v. United States, 261 Fed. 49, 52, 171 C. C. A. 645, 648, in commenting upon this identical language:

> "If the preamble and constitution of the organization are correctly expounded by the Perry pamphlet, the flag of the nation means only 'oppression' and 'tyranny,' and the 'mission' and purposes of the I. W. W. organization are to be accomplished by force, violence, and other unlawful means."

[11] We have already alluded to the design and purpose of the Legislature in the enactment of the statute. "Sabotage," in the ordinary sense of the word, means the "malicious waste or destruction of an employer's property by workmen during labor troubles." Webster's New International Dictionary. Its legal meaning, as applied by the Legislature, is found in the statute which defines criminal syndicalism as "any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change." The circulation or display of printed matter, in any form, containing "advocacy, teaching, or aid in abetment of, or advising criminal syndicalism," is prohibited by the act, the incentive for the adoption of which, as stated in one of its sections, was the fact that large numbers of persons were then going from place to place in this state, advocating, teaching, and practicing the doctrine of sabotage, and other unlawful acts of force, violence and unlawful means of terrorism, employed in furtherance of industrial demands, and in settlement of alleged grievances against their employers. So insistent was the danger that the Legislature departed from its usual course, and provided that the act, destined to put a stop to the practices therein made unlawful, should have immediate effect. It was the "unlawful" acts of force and "unlawful" methods of terrorism that the Legislature struck at, not acts which are permissible and within the law. In re Hartman (Sup.) 188 Pac. 548.

[12] Appellant's arrest, and subsequent conviction, followed not long after the enactment of the law. When arrested, the defendant declared that he was not a citizen of the United States, and that he had no desire to be one. A copy of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, under which this prosecution is lodged, was posted conspicuously upon the wall in the headquarters. We are satisfied from the record that the defendant distributed the literature under his control, and in his possession, with full understanding of its nature; and this, of itself, furnished a ground of attributing to him an intent to bring about, and for finding that he was thereby attempting to bring about, any and all such consequences as might reasonably be anticipated from its distribution. Pierce v. United States, 252 U. S. 239, 40 Sup. Ct. 205, 209, 64 L. Ed. 542.

[13] The question presented in this case is whether the printed matter was circulated under such circumstances, and is of such nature as to create a clear and present danger, or to bring about an evil, that the Legislature had a right to prevent; or, stated in another way: Does this case so made show an advocacy and teaching of the form of sabotage, or the other methods of terrorism designed to effect industrial and political ends which the statute condemns? It was held in State v. Moilen, supra, 167 N. W. 348, that the question was one for the jury. What interpretation ought to be placed upon the printed matter circulated and displayed by the defendant, what would be the probable effect of its circulation in the mode adopted, and what were defendant's motives in so doing, were questions for the jury to decide, in view of all the circumstances of the time and manner of its distribution. Pierce v. United States, supra; Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S.

47, 52, 39 Sup. Ct. 247, 63 L. Ed. 470. Its decision, on evidence which we deem sufficient, is against the defendant. We do not think it necessary to dwell longer upon this phase of the question, important as it is, for the reason that the eminent authorities already cited seem to conclusively set the matter at rest, both as to the nature of the evidence, and the power of the jury to make the ultimate decision in the matter.

[14] During the trial the court admitted in evidence on behalf of the prosecution certain translations from Russian writings, and a copy of "I. W. W., Its History, Structure and Methods, by Vincent St. John," which were found in the desk of the defendant. Later, upon the suggestion of the district attorney, they were withdrawn. The court thereupon ordered the exhibits stricken out, and instructed the jury to disregard them. Defendant contends that prejudicial error resulted from the admission of these exhibits, which was not cured by their subsequent withdrawal, and the instructions of the court. He fails to point out, however, where any error resulted, relying merely upon People v. Derbert, 138 Cal. 470, 71 Pac. 564, which deals with alleged misconduct on the part of the district attorney, in persisting, against the ruling of the court, in asking improper questions. The decision has no bearing on the facts of the case at bar. In the absence of any affirmative showing, it will be presumed that no prejudice resulted from the act of the court in this regard. People v. Lapara, 183 Pac. 545.

[15] Appellant's last contention is that the court erred in reading all of sections 1 and 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act in its charge, instead of instructing the jury that the defendant was only charged with violating subdivision 3 of said section 2, which specifically relates to the printing, publishing, and displaying, of certain printed matter. The court, however, read the indictment in full, and charged the jury that it must find the defendant guilty "of the crime as set forth in the indictment beyond all reasonable doubt," or not at all. This was a sufficient express limitation of the terms of the act to the allegations contained in the indictment. Hargrave v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 30 S. W. 444; Simons v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 34 S. W. 619, 620; People v. Young, 186 Pac. 383.

The defendant was charged with a public offense in an indictment which was sufficient for that purpose. His guilt was established to the satisfaction of the jury upon evidence of sufficient probative force to warrant the conviction. No miscarriage of justice resulted from any matter occurring in connection with the overruling of the demurrer, or rulings of the court during the trial.

The orders denying defendant's motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and the judgment, are, and each is, affirmed.

JONES v. KEHRLEIN et al. (Civ. 3286.)

1. Master and servant 🔑302(1)—Theater usher held acting within authority in excluding negro from particular section.

A theater usher who had general orders to seat all members of the so-called dark races in a particular section of the theater was acting within his authority in refusing plaintiff, a negro, a seat in a different section.

2. Civil rights 🔑2—Statute held valid.

Civ. Code, § 51, requiring all persons to be awarded equal accommodations and privileges in theaters, etc., and section 52, making persons denying any such rights except for reasons applicable alike to every race and color liable in damages, are valid.

3. Civil rights 🔑6—Refusal of theater seat except in section set apart for members of plaintiff's race held violation of statute.

It was a violation of Civ. Code, §§ 51, 52, for the management of a moving picture theater to refuse plaintiff, a negro, a seat except in a section set apart for the so-called dark races, solely on account of plaintiff's color and race.

4. Civil rights 🔑6—Provision of theater ticket invalid so far as authorizing seating in particular section solely because of race.

While a theater ticket by which the holder was to be admitted to such seat as might be assigned by the management gave the management a right to adjust the seating of the audience and to select, within legal bounds and for legal reasons, the seats of its various patrons, it was invalid so far as it authorized the management to require a negro to sit in a particular section solely because of his race and color.

5. Civil rights 🔑6—Purchase of theater ticket held not contract to submit to discrimination so as to prevent recovery.

A negro, by purchasing a theater ticket authorizing the management to assign him a seat, did not contract to submit to a violation of his legal rights so as to prevent recovery for refusing him a seat in a particular part of the theater because of his race and color.

6. Civil rights 🔑6—Minor held entitled to recover for discrimination.

Civ. Code, § 53, making it unlawful to refuse admittance to any theater, etc., to any person over 21 presenting a ticket of admission, does not prevent a minor from recovering under sections 51 and 52 for refusal to allow him to sit anywhere except in a particular section, where he was not discriminated against because of his minority, but because he was a negro.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Errol Jones, a minor, etc., against Oliver Kehrlein, Jr., and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, and J. R. Fitch, of Oakland, for appellants.

BEASLY, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment obtained by plaintiff against the defendants.

The plaintiff is a minor, a citizen of the United States and a negro. The defendants conduct a moving picture show at Fresno, and on June 20, 1918, sold to plaintiff two tickets to the show, upon presentation of which plaintiff and his young woman friend were admitted to the showroom. He was thereupon directed by an usher, acting under general orders from the management to seats on the right side of the house, which were set apart by the management for the use of what the defendants termed "the dark races." The boy declined to follow the direction of the usher, and requested a seat in a part of the house not so set aside, namely, in the rear of the center section, where, incidently there were plenty of vacant and unsold chairs. The ticket was of the kind which in the hands of one not of the "dark races" admitted the holder to seats in this latter section of the house. This request on his part was refused, and he and his companion thereupon left the theater. He subsequently brought this action to recover $5,000 as damages because of the incident, and was awarded judgment for $100. The defendants appeal from this judgment.

In response to allegations of the complaint the trial court found that the plaintiff was refused a seat in the center section of the lower floor of the theater solely because he was a negro, and that he was thereby denied the full accommodation and privileges of the theater because of his race and color and without any other cause applicable to all citizens of every race and color, to his humiliation and damage in the sum of $100.

These findings are supported by the following facts in evidence: Each of the tickets purchased by plaintiff provided for admission of one person to such seat as might be assigned its holder by the management. It was of the class of tickets which were honored by giving to those presenting them seats in the rear of the center section of the theater. When the young man was told that he could not sit in the center section of the house, he asked the reason for this distinction, and the significant answer was, "You know the reason why," and further, "Because you people can't sit there," and again, "Because it is the orders of the management." The defendant Kehrlein subsequently stated in conversation with the father of the plaintiff that the management put all of the dark races (with whom he included colored persons, Japanese, Chinese, and Mexicans) on the left side, not, as he claimed, because of any prejudice of his own against them, but for the reason that doing otherwise would hurt his business. There is, then, no question that young Jones was refused a seat among those for which his ticket called, and ordered into the section set apart for colored people, Japanese, Chinese, and Mexicans, solely because he was a negro.

[1] The first point made for reversal is that the usher who endeavored to seat Jones in the "dark" section of the theater acted without authority of the management. It was admitted by defendants' counsel at the trial that the usher was acting under the authority of the management. It is now claimed, however, that this stipulation was general in its nature, and did not include acting under authority of the management in doing the specific and tortious act complained of by the plaintiff. The testimony of the plaintiff's father as to Kehrlein's declarations above referred to, accepted as it was by the court, shows that the ushers acted under sweeping general orders of the management to seat all so-called "dark" races in the section to which young Jones was directed. This was authority to discriminate against the plaintiff sufficient to bind the defendant Kehrlein.

The statutory law governing this case is embodied in part 2 of the Civil Code, embracing, among others, the four sections numbered 51 to 54, inclusive. Section 51, as it existed at the time of the incident out of which this case grows and before it was amended in 1919, provided that all persons within this state are entitled to the full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of theaters and all other places of public amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to all citizens; and at the same time and before its amendment in 1919 section 52 provided that whoever should violate the provisions of section 51 by denying to any citizen, except for reasons applicable alike to every race and color, the rights enumerated in that section, or whoever should make any discrimination on account of color or race, or except for good cause applicable alike to all citizens of every color or race whatever, in respect to the admission to or treatment in any theater or other place of public amusement, or should aid or incite thereto, should be liable in damages in a sum not less that $50, which might be recovered in an action at law brought for that purpose.

It is contended that the facts in the record, while showing segregation of the plaintiff, do not establish a discrimination against him. This is another way of saying that the plaintiff's personal rights under part 2 of the Civil Code were not violated by the act complained of. In support of this contention the appellants cite Younger v. Judah, 111 Mo. 303, 19 S. W. 1109, 16 L. R. A. 558, 33 Am. St. Rep. 527, a Missouri case. In that case the Court of Appeals of the state of Missouri held that segregating the negro patrons of a theater in the gallery, and refusing them seats in the orchestra, did not violate the rights of colored citizens under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; but it is distinctly said even there that "a discrimination against colored persons by permitting them to sit only in the balcony of a theater is not unlawful, in the absence of any statute to the contrary." The fact that there was no civil rights act in Missouri at the time that case arose distinguishes it from the case now before us, and the distinction is clearly pointed out in the Missouri case, where it is said:

> "This state has enacted no law having any application to the present case. It does not undertake to say how theaters and other places of amusement shall be managed. As the state does not by itself or through the city of Kansas undertake to regulate theaters, and as the clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment before noted are prohibitory of state action only, they have nothing to do with the question at hand. There is nothing upon which the prohibitions can operate. Many of the states have enacted laws known as 'civil rights statutes,' and we are cited to cases upholding and giving effect to such laws. Under them it has been held that the proprietor of a theater will be liable in damages for a refusal to admit a colored person (Joseph v. Bidwell, 28 La. Ann. 382; Donnell v. State, 48 Miss. 661), and for a refusal to admit a colored person to the several circles or grades of seats in a theater (Baylies v. Curry, 128 Ill. 287)."

So that even this case recognizes the force of such statutes as ours.

The appellants also, in support of this contention, cite Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 16 Sup. Ct. 1138, 41 L. Ed. 256. This case arose out of a statute of Louisiana which provided that railroads operating in that state should furnish different coaches for white and negro passengers, and that neither race should be permitted to occupy the coaches designed for the other. It was there held that such a statute was not in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment; but here the question is not the constitutionality of such a statute segregating the races and providing equal accommodation for each. There is no such statute in California nor any similar statute here applicable to theaters.

[2, 3] On the contrary, in a case entitled People of the State of New York v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 18 N. E. 245, 1 L. R. A. 293, 6 Am. Rep. 389, both the policy and constitutionality of a statute of the state of New York almost identical with the provisions of our Code were strongly upheld; and in Ferguson v. Gies, 82 Mich. 358, 46 N. W. 718, 9 L. R. A. 589, 21 Am. St. Rep. 576, the Supreme Court of Michigan upheld a statute similar to our own Code provisions. There is no doubt as to where the weight of authority lies on this point. It upholds such statutes, and also holds that conduct such as that of the defendants toward plaintiff constitutes a discrimination against the negro on account of his color and race in violation of his rights under such civil rights bills. The construction placed upon the acts of defendant Kehrlein by the trial court is that the refusal to seat Jones in any other portion of the house than that set apart for the so-called colored races constituted an illegal discrimination against him under sections 51 and 52 of the Civil Code.

[4] A further point is made to the effect that the provisions of the ticket by which the holder was to be admitted to such seat as might be assigned by the management gave the management the absolute right to assign to the holder any seat which they might designate, including a seat in what might be called the segregated section. It is true that the management had the right to adjust the seating of its audience, as the manager claimed on the witness stand, and to select within legal bounds and for legal reasons the seats of its various patrons holding this form of ticket; but, if this provision of the ticket is to be interpreted as giving them the right to seat young Jones and his girl friend in the segregated section because of his race or color, the provision of the ticket is to that extent illegal and void; for the right to full and equal treatment, as prescribed in section 51 of the Civil Code, is subject only to conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to all citizens. This provision in the ticket, if meant to give the management the right to discriminate against plaintiff in seating him on account of his race and color, is to that extent illegal and void.

[5] It is also contended that in purchasing the tickets with the provision permitting the management to assign him a seat Jones did so with his eyes open, and that if he did not like the conditions he need not buy. But it is clear that in purchasing the ticket Jones made no contract that bound him to submit to being seated in violation of his legal rights. The language of the ticket conferred and could confer no such right upon the management to discriminate against him in violation of the rights guaranteed him by part 2 of the Civil Code. The truth is, as found by the court, that the whole transaction with young Jones was tainted from the beginning with illegality arising out of the intent of the management from the start to deprive him of his civil rights under the statute by discriminating against him in the matter of seating accommodation solely on account of his race. The intent was illegally conceived and illegally carried out by the management of the theater.

[6] The next contention is that the plaintiff does not come within the classes of citizens protected in their civil rights by sections 51 and 52 of the Civil Code because he was a minor. Say the appellants:

> "The words 'all citizens,' taken in connection with section 53 of the same Code, would mean all citizens over the age of 21. Plaintiff being a minor, the guaranty of the statute does not extend to him because it expressly excludes minors by particular reference to persons over the age of 21. The complaint therefore does not state a cause of action."

In support of this appellants cite Greenberg v. Western Turf Ass'n, 140 Cal. 362, 73 Pac. 1051, in which the right of admission to a place of public amusement is said to have been guaranteed to the plaintiff in that case by law "in common with all other inhabitants of the state over the age of twenty-one." The quoted sentence from the case is the only portion thereof stressed by the appellants in their argument. Other than the inference which can be drawn from these quoted words, there is nothing in the case bearing upon the question before us, but the provisions of section 53 of the Civil Code are intended to guarantee admission of all citizens to places of amusement, and the restriction therein as to minors, if the language imports such restrictions, is intended only to permit the exclusion of minors from certain classes of public amusements, and this is all that is intended thereby. There is neither pleading nor evidence that young Jones was segregated because he was a minor nor that minors generally were excluded from Kehrlein's show, but, on the contrary, the court finds from convincing evidence that the sole reason for discrimination against the plaintiff was his race and color. Further than this, it may be said that the defendants took the young man's money, and they cannot now be heard to say in court that because the plaintiff was a minor he shall not be permitted to recover for the wrong done him. The plaintiff was not refused the seat he desired because he was a minor, but because he was a negro, and section 53, Civil Code, was never intended to form a defense to an action by one whose rights under sections 51 and 52 have been violated.

This seems to dispose of all of the contentions of the appellants in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

TURNER v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND. (Civ. 3215.)*

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 29, 1920.)

1. Attachment 🔑333—Surety liable on bond to release where condition on which recovery is made to depend happened.

Where the condition on which, by the express agreement of a surety on bond for the release of an attachment, plaintiff's right of recovery on the bond is made to depend, that is, the recovery by plaintiff of a judgment in the action, has come to pass, defendant surety is liable under the letter of its undertaking, unless it can successfully contend that the bond was merely a substitute for the property attached, and that, because the death of defendant in the former action dissolved the attachment, its liability on the undertaking has been discharged.

2. Attachment 🔑272, 337 — Surety on common-law bond to release attachment not released by death of defendant pending appeal, which did not dissolve attachment.

Where the bond given to release an attachment was not a statutory delivery or forthcoming bond, and was not of such a character that the release of the property from the attachment must follow by compulsion of law, being merely a common-law bond to pay plaintiff whatever judgment he might recover in the action, the surety unconditionally obligated itself thereon, and, plaintiff having recovered judgment, must satisfy the same, though defendant in the action wherein the attachment issued, its principal, died pending appeal, which did not dissolve the attachment.

3. Attachment 🔑277 — Statutory bond alone takes place of property attached to be dissolved by whatever would have dissolved attachment lien.

If in any case an undertaking to release an attachment may be deemed to take the place of the property attached, so that whatever would have worked dissolution of the attachment lien shall have a like effect on the undertaking, it is only when the bond is a statutory bond, and is conditioned for the redelivery of the property.

4. Pleading 🔑248(4) — Amendment detailing character and extent of breaches and enlarging damages permissible.

In an action on a contract between plaintiff and defendant wherein defendant, among other things, agreed to subdivide certain property, amendment of the complaint to set forth more in detail the character and extent of breaches, and enlarging somewhat the amount claimed as damages therefor, was permissible, stating no new and different cause of action.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to recover on a bond alleged to have been given for the release of an attachment.

It appears from the complaint that during the year 1911 this same plaintiff brought an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against one John Howze, and that at about the same time, and before June 1, 1911, writs of attachment were issued from said court to the sheriffs of the counties of Los Angeles and Riverside, respectively, and certain real and personal properties belonging to said Howze levied upon by such sheriffs in said counties. On June 1, 1911, this plaintiff, who was also, as we have seen, the plaintiff there, released all of the property so attached from said attachment liens, and the defendant here, in consideration of such releases, executed and delivered to plaintiff a certain paper, alleged to be a bond, a copy of which, omitting the formal parts, is as follows:

> "Whereas, the above-named plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, against the above-named defendant [John Howze], claiming that there was due to said plaintiff from said defendant the sum of twenty-three thousand four hundred one and 76/100 ($23,401.76) dollars, or thereabouts, and thereupon an attachment issued against the property of said defendant as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that might be recovered therein; and certain property and effects of the said defendant have been attached and seized by the sheriff of the said Los Angeles county, under and by virtue of said writ; and whereas, the said defendant is desirous of having said property released from said attachment: Now, therefore, the undersigned, Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation duly organized and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Maryland, and duly licensed for the purpose of making, guaranteeing or becoming a surety upon bonds or undertakings required or authorized by the law of the state of California, in consideration of the premises, and also in consideration of the release from said attachment of the property attached, as above mentioned, does hereby undertake in the sum of twenty-four thousand ($24,000.00) dollars, and promise that in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand, pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action, together with the interest and costs; the same to be paid in United States gold coin, if so required by the terms of the judgment."

The case was thereafter tried, and judgment went for plaintiff, who, not being satisfied therewith, appealed and secured a reversal thereof. While the appeal was pending, however, Howze died, a resident of Los Angeles county, leaving both real and personal property therein. In due time and by proper proceedings, according to the record, the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, and A. C. Howze were appointed administrators of the estate of John Howze, deceased, and letters of administration duly issued to them accordingly. Thereupon such administrators were substituted as parties defendant in the action then pending, for and in the place of the said John Howze, deceased. Upon a retrial of the action the court again found for the plaintiff, but in a much larger sum than previously had been determined to be due him, the judgment reciting, among other things, that—

> "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendants [said administrators] the sum of $30,813.51, * * * to be paid by the said defendants out of the assets of the said estate of John Howze, deceased, in the due course of administration."

There was a motion for a new trial, which was denied. Whereupon the said administrators filed their notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the order denying said motion, and from the judgment so entered, which appeal, because of failure to file the transcript in time, was in due time dismissed. Written demand was thereafter made by the plaintiff upon the administrators for the payment of this judgment, with which demand the latter have not complied, and, accordingly, the present action is brought.

The principal defense set up in the action before us is that the bond sued on here was and is a common-law obligation, and that since it was given two amended complaints were filed, thus exonerating the defendant from liability thereunder. The action was tried on the second amended complaint, and the court found for the plaintiff as claimed by him. The appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

Two points only are urged for a reversal of the judgment: (1) That the complaint does not state a cause of action; and (2) that the amendment of the complaint after the execution of the undertaking varied the contract and exonerated the appellant. It is urged in support of the first point that the complaint discloses no breach of appellant's obligation under the bond, and hence states no cause of action.

The complaint and findings here show that the defendant in the former action—John Howze—died after the attachment therein was released, and before the judgment obtained in that action became final.

[1] The most cursory perusal of the bond sued upon will disclose that it is not the statutory undertaking, but is a common-law bond. The condition upon which, by the express agreement of the surety, plaintiff's right of recovery on the bond is made to depend, namely, the recovery by the plaintiff of a judgment in the action, has come to pass. Under the letter of the defendant's undertaking it is liable, unless it can successfully be contended that the bond was but a substitute for the property attached, and that, because the death of the defendant in the former action dissolved the attachment (Myers v. Mott, 29 Cal. 359, 89 Am. Dec. 49), its liability on the undertaking has been discharged.

[2, 3] Where the bond is a statutory bond, i. e., where it is in the form prescribed by the statute, there may be good reason for holding that such a bond is a substitute for the attachment lien, and that whatever occurrence would have effected a dissolution of the attachment lien, had the bond not been given, has a like effect upon the undertaking, regarded as a statutory substitute for the attached property or for the attachment lien thereon.

The statutory bond is one whereby the surety undertakes that—

> "In case the plaintiff recovers judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand, redeliver the attached property so released to the proper officer, to be applied to the payment of the judgment, or, in default thereof, that the defendant and sureties will, on demand, pay to the plaintiff the full value of the property released, not exceeding the amount of such judgment." Section 555, Code Civ. Proc.

Such a bond is known as a delivery or forthcoming bond; whereas the common-law bond which was given in this action is that which sometimes is described as a bail bond.

Where the statutory undertaking is entered into there is an element of legal compulsion, i. e., the plaintiff in the attachment action and the officer who has levied the attachment, by compulsion of law, and nolens volens, must acquiesce in a release of the property from the attachment lien. Such an undertaking is not an unconditional undertaking for the payment of the judgment, in the event that the plaintiff in the action recover a judgment, but is an undertaking for the redelivery of the attached property, i. e., for its redelivery if the plaintiff recovers a judgment in the action, or, in default of such redelivery, payment to the plaintiff of the full value of the property released.

Where a delivery bond is given, i. e., a bond to return to the officer, upon request, the goods attached, in case final judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, it can readily be seen that there is then some basis for a claim that whatever operates to dissolve an attachment lien should be deemed to have the same effect upon the bond given for the redelivery of the property. For, manifestly, if the undertaking is for the redelivery of the property, and if, for any legal reason, such, for example, as the death of the defendant in the action, an attachment lien upon the property so to be redelivered would have been dissolved if the bond had not been given, then redelivery of the property to the attaching officer would be of no benefit to the plaintiff in the attachment action. It is obvious, therefore, that where a delivery or forthcoming bond has been given—a bond that, by compulsion of law, necessarily releases the property from the custody of the attaching officer—there is some reason why the bond may be deemed to be a substitute for the attached property, and to be discharged by any event that would have worked a dissolution of the attachment lien had the property not been released from attachment by giving the statutory undertaking. Such, however, is not the case where, as here, the bond was not a delivery or forthcoming bond, and was not of such a character that a release of the property from the attachment must follow by compulsion of law. Mr. Drake, in his work on Attachment, seems to recognize the fact that, with respect to the effect upon the liability of the surety of an event that would have worked a dissolution of the attachment had the property not been released, there is a distinction between a delivery bond and a bail bond, such as was given in this action. Mr. Drake says that—

> "A dissolution of the attachment discharges the obligation of the surety on a delivery bond." Drake on Attachment, § 341b.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that if, in any case, an undertaking may be deemed to take the place of the property attached, so that whatever would have worked a dissolution of the attachment lien shall have a like effect upon the undertaking, it is when and only when the bond is a statutory bond, and is conditioned for the redelivery of the property. Here the surety has unconditionally obligated itself that in case the paintiff recover judgment in the action the defendant, on demand, will pay the plaintiff the amount of such judgment. The judgment has been recovered, and, under the letter of its obligation, the surety is liable. In principle the case does not seem to be distinguishable from Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 241, 55 Pac. 804, San Francisco Sulphur Co. v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 11 Cal. App. 695, 106 Pac. 111, and McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 114.

[4] As to the second point urged, we think no extended discussion necessary. The amendment of the complaint in the Howze Case was made as a matter of right, and before the hearing of the demurrer to the original complaint in that action. There was a demurrer to the amended complaint, which was sustained. Thereupon a second amended complaint was filed. Upon the issues formed the case was tried and went to judgment.

The subject-matter of that action was two contracts between Turner and Howze, in which the latter, among other things, agreed to subdivide certain property. There was, in the amendment, no change whatever in the contracts themselves, but there was a change in the allegations of the complaint setting forth more in detail the character and extent of the breaches, and enlarging somewhat the amount claimed as damages therefor. There is no new and different cause of action stated. Such an amendment is permissible. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53; Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 Pac. 330; Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 Pac. 305; Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Leffingwell, 11 Cal. App. 494, 105 Pac. 427; Born v. COONEY v. GRAY et al. (Civ. 3608.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐907(3)—Evidence presumed sufficient in absence of transcript or bill of exceptions.

In the absence of any transcript of the testimony or bill of exceptions, it is assumed on appeal that the evidence presented in support of the findings was competent and material to the issues, was as received without objection, and was sufficient to sustain the facts found.

2. Pleading ⇐409(1) — Objection to insufficiency of answer should be raised before trial.

Objection to insufficiency of answer should be interposed before going to trial by a demurrer or by a timely motion for a judgment on the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by M. Cooney against F. Gray and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Brand, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leo H. Susman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action, seeking to recover the sum of $2,000 which she alleges she was fraudulently induced to loan to the defendants in July, 1908, and to have the amount decreed to be a lien upon property of defendants. The trial court found specifically in favor of the defendants. Judgment was entered accordingly, and plaintiff has appealed on the judgment roll alone, claiming that, because of the failure of the defendants to deny certain allegations of the complaint, the answer became a negative pregnant, entitling plaintiff to judgment. No motion for judgment on the pleadings appears to have been made.

According to the allegations of the complaint, in July, 1904, respondents, one of whom is the daughter of the plaintiff, represented to her that they were married, in which belief the plaintiff remained until September, 1918. In June, 1908, so it is alleged, the respondents, learning that plaintiff had on deposit in a savings bank the sum of $2,000 conspired to obtain the money from her. Accordingly, by means of undue influence obtained over plaintiff by reason of her trust and confidence in them, due to the supposed family relationship which she believed the defendant F. Gray bore to her, the defendants induced the plaintiff to let them have the use of the money, upon the promise that they would repay the same at the end of nine years, together with interest at the savings bank rate. This money, it is alleged, the defendants invested in a dwelling house and lot of land in San Francisco, of which they are still the owners, and upon which it is alleged they have declared a homestead. This alleged loan has never been repaid.

In 1918 the plaintiff learned that in 1903, and for a long time theretofore, the defendant F. Gray had been married to a woman other than her daughter, and that in that year he had commenced an action against his said wife for a divorce. After due hearing the superior court awarded said Gray, and there was entered, an absolute decree of divorce in his favor, although sections 131 and 132 of the Civil Code, requiring the entry of interlocutory decrees of divorce in such actions, were in force and effect. The further allegation is that, by reason of the refusal and failure of Gray to obtain an interlocutory decree of divorce from his said wife, he never has been divorced, and that the defendants did not marry in July, 1904, but only pretended to be married, and thereby deceived the plaintiff, in order to obtain an undue influence over her for the purpose of defrauding her out of the $2,000.

The defendants denied specifically every allegation of the complaint, other than the averment as to the divorce action. As to that they denied that defendant Gray failed or refused to obtain an interlocutory decree of divorce, and alleged that defendants are husband and wife. As an affirmative defense, the defendants alleged that the money was a gift to them, which the plaintiff is now seeking to convert into a loan.

Because the defendants do not specifically deny that they were not married at the time when the alleged undue influence was practiced upon the plaintiff and the money obtained, appellant now argues that the answer is a negative pregnant, and admits all the essential facts alleged in the complaint. Her theory, as stated by her, is that the action is not to recover a loan, but to establish a trust, and it is immaterial whether the money paid to the respondents under the circumstances described in the complaint, which payment is not denied, was intended as a gift, or a loan, for it would be a trust in either case. A gift to a supposed son-in-law, and a daughter supposed to be lawfully married, to establish a home, she contends, would become a trust if the representation of marriage were false and fraudulent. Assuming appellant's contention to be a correct statement of law so far as it goes, the trial court found that the plaintiff gave the money to the defendants, and that by this action she is attempting to convert that gift into a loan. It further found that the defendants are now husband and wife, that the plaintiff did not place either confidence or trust in them, and that they did not, nor did either of them, use any deception to obtain an undue influence over plaintiff to secure her trust or confidence, for the purpose of defrauding her, and that they did not defraud her.

[1] In the absence of any transcript of the testimony or bill of exceptions, it will be assumed on this appeal that the evidence presented in support of the findings was competent and material to the issues, was received without objection, and was sufficient to sustain the facts found. Damon v. Quinn, 143 Cal. 75, 77, 76 Pac. 818; Cutting Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 695, 75 Pac. 564; California Canneries Co. v. Great Western Lumber Co., 185 Pac. 1008; Brett v. Vanomar Producers, 187 Pac. 758.

[2] If the appellant wished to rely upon the alleged insufficiency of the answer of the defendants, she should have interposed a demurrer, or made a timely motion for judgment on the pleadings. Tibbets v. Blade, 60 Cal. 428, 430. The parties went to trial without objection, upon the theory that the issues were well defined. The ultimate finding was against the appellant. The evidence given at the trial furnished the reason for the finding, and if the reason was not sufficient, the evidence should have been brought here, and the finding challenged. Brett v. Vanomar Producers, supra; Weidenmueller v. Stearns, 128 Cal. 623, 626, 61 Pac. 374.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA HARDWOOD & MFG. CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1920.)

Taxation ⚷537—Taxpayer cannot acquiesce in assessment and recover taxes on ground that they were erroneously collected.

Where a taxpayer made a tentative statement of assets to the taxing officials, which they altered so as to show that it had considerable taxable assets it could not acquiesce in that assessment, and, then having paid it, recover from the county under Pol. Code, § 3804, declaring that any taxes erroneously or illegally collected may be recovered, because its property was of a value less than the amount assessed, but the taxpayer's sole remedy was, under section 3673, to apply to the board of equalization for a revaluation of its property; for, as the assessment was in accordance with laws, the taxes were not erroneously or illegally collected regardless of overvaluation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Hardwood & Manufacturing Company against the County of Los Angeles to recover taxes alleged to have been erroneously and illegally collected. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill and Gordon Boller, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $781.27, claimed to have been received by the defendant through the collection of taxes assessed against the plaintiff's properties and which taxes the plaintiff asserts to have been erroneously and illegally collected.

The facts are practically undisputed, and are embodied in the findings of the court, which may be briefly summarized as follows: The plaintiff in the year 1914 was a lumber manufacturing corporation with its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles. In the spring of that year and during the period when assessments of property for purposes of public taxation are made the plaintiff prepared a statement of its properties subject to taxation and of the deductions to which it claimed to be entitled, and handed the same to a deputy county assessor, who called at its place of business for the purpose of receiving said statement. The statement thus prepared placed a valuation of $294,835 upon the unsecured credits and solvent debts due from others, including bank deposits, and also placed a valuation of $294,835 upon the plaintiff's unsecured debts due bona fide residents of the state, for which it was entitled under the law to a deduction. It thus appeared that there was no assessable balance upon which the defendant would be entitled to levy or collect taxes. With respect to this statement the trial court finds that its figures were incorrect, but that they were placed therein with the intention that they should be merely tentative and without any intent on the part of plaintiff to mislead or defraud the county assessor. At the time such statement was presented to the deputy assessor the latter, in the presence of the plaintiff's officials and with their knowledge, made certain alterations in the figures contained in said statement, the effect of which was to show that the total assessable assets of the plaintiff amounted to $220,240; that its unsecured debts, due to bona fide residents of this state, to which it was entitled to a deduction, amounted to $169,835, leaving a balance of assessable property in the sum of $50,405. These latter figures made by the deputy county assessor would also seem to have been tentative, and to have been subject to such subsequent changes as the assessor or his said deputy might make after some further investigation as to whether a particular indebtedness of the plaintiff was of such a character as to entitle it to have the same deducted in determining the net amount of its taxable assets. The figures thus made up by the deputy county assessor were not, however, changed as the result of any such subsequent investigation, and in consequence the balance of the plaintiff's assessable assets was fixed by the assessor at the sum of $50,405.

Under the provisions of chapter 3 of title 9 of the Political Code, county assessors are required to make and complete their assessments of property between the first Monday of March and the first Monday of July of each year, and to embody the same in the assessment roll, whereupon the board of supervisors of the county is required, under the provisions of chapter 4 of said title of the Political Code, to meet and sit between the first Monday and the third Monday in July of each year as a board of equalization, and as such board, and under the provisions of section 3673 of said Code, "to equalize the assessment of the property contained in said roll and make the assessment conform to the true value of such property in money." Having thus acted, it then becomes the duty of the board of supervisors, at a time not later than the first Tuesday after the first Monday of September in each year, to make the tax levy.

The above procedure was followed in the instant case. The plaintiff, however, did not appear before the board of supervisors sitting as a board of equalization to object to its assessment or to apply for a revaluation of its property, in consequence of which there was levied against its aforesaid assessable assets a tax amounting to the sum of $781.27, which in due course the plaintiff was required to pay, and which sum it has instituted the present action to recover.

The trial court further found that the changes which were made by the deputy county assessor in the plaintiff's statement as to the amount of its unsecured debts were made in the mistaken belief on the part of said official that plaintiff was not entitled to the deduction claimed by it on account of the particular item of indebtedness above referred to; and that in consequence of this mistake the plaintiff's assessable properties were overvalued to the full extent of such assessment, and that in fact there was no balance of assessable asset upon which a tax could be levied. Upon the foregoing fact the trial court directed a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from such judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The sole contention which the appellant urges is that it is entitled to maintain this action under the provisions of section 3804 of the Political Code, which reads as follows:

> "Any taxes, penalties or costs thereon heretofore or hereafter paid more than once, or heretofore or hereafter erroneously or illegally collected, or any taxes heretofore or hereafter paid upon an assessment in excess of the actual cash value of the property so assessed by reason of a clerical error of the assessor as to the excess in such cases, or any taxes heretofore or hereafter paid upon an erroneous assessment of improvements on real estate not in fact in existence when said taxes became a lien, may, by order of the board of supervisors, be refunded by the county treasurer."

Appellant having made a demand under this section upon the board of supervisors for an order directing the county treasurer to refund the amount of its taxes collected as aforesaid, and said demand having been refused, it insists that it is entitled to maintain this action.

In order to sustain this contention on the part of the appellant it would be necessary to hold that the taxes for the return of which it sues herein were taxes which had been either "erroneously or illegally collected" or "paid upon an assessment in excess of the actual cash value of the property so assessed by reason of a clerical error of the assessor." It is conceded by the appellant that its assessment in excess of the actual cash value of its assessable properties was not caused by an "clerical error of the assessor," but that its alleged right to recover the same rests solely upon its contention that such taxes were "erroneously or illegally collected." We are unable to sustain the appellant's contention in this regard. We are directed to no action on the part of the officials of the county of Los Angeles which would render the assessment of the plaintiff's property or the collection of the taxes claimed to be due thereon illegal. The plaintiff's said properties were subject to assessment, and the procedure pursued by the county assessor and by the board of supervisors in making said assessment and in levying said tax were admittedly in accord with the provisions of the Political Code relating to taxation. Neither do we think that the assessment and levy and the taxes in question was "erroneous" within the meaning of the term as used in section 3804 of the Political Code. It is true, as found by the trial court, that the county assessor was mistaken in his conclusion as to the net amount of the plaintiff's properties subject to assessment and taxation: but it does not follow that merely by reason of said mistake the assessment and taxation of said property was erroneously made. The result of this mistake amounted merely to an overvaluation of the plaintiff's properties, or—which amounted to the same thing in effect—an undervaluation of the appellant's deductible debts; and we are cited to no case which goes to the extent of holding that an overvaluation of assessable properties on the part of the assessor is such an "error" as would entitle the owner of such properties to the remedy provided in section 3804 of the Political Code; but, on the contrary, our attention has been called to a consistent line of decisions by the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal of this state, holding that the remedy of the property owner in the event of an overvaluation of his property by the assessor is by application to the board of supervisors of the county sitting as a board of equalization for a revaluation of his property.

In the case of Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, the trial court declared it to be the settled rule—

> "That the conclusion of assessing officers as to the value of property for purposes of taxation, when honestly arrived at, and when not made in pursuance of some fixed rule or general system the result of which is necessarily discriminatory and inequitable, is conclusive on the courts, however erroneous the conclusion of those officers may be."

In the case of Clunie v. Siebe, 112 Cal. 593, 44 Pac. 1064, the same court held that—

> "The assessment of property for the purpose of taxation is a function of the executive department of the government, and the judiciary has no power * * * to inquire as to the actual value of property for the purpose of taxation, in order to determine whether there had been a misrepresentation of its value."

And in San Jose Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614, said court held that—

> "If an assessor errs in his judgment in determining the value of property, the remedy is by application to the board of equalization, and courts will not revise the judgments of assessors upon such questions."

In City of Los Angeles v. Glassell, 4 Cal. App. 43, 87 Pac. 241, wherein the question directly arose as to whether the remedy of the taxpayer, in the event of an overvaluation of his property (or, which amounted to the same thing, an undervaluation of his deductible debts) was by an appeal to the board of equalization for the reduction of the amount of his assessment, or whether he could raise the question by way of defense to an action to recover the tax, the court held that an appeal to the board of equalization was the proper remedy, and that, failing to make such appeal, the property owner was not entitled to urge such defense in an action to recover the tax.

The authorities cited by the appellant as sustaining its contention do not run counter to the foregoing line of cases, but, on the contrary, show that in every instance wherein the property owner was held entitled to relief under section 3804 of the Political Code the tax levied against his property was an illegal tax. In the case of Otis v. San Francisco, 170 Cal. 98, 148 Pac. 933, the tax sought to be recovered was illegal because in excess of the limit of taxation fixed by the San Francisco charter. In the case of Connelly v. San Francisco, 164 Cal. 101, 127 Pac. 834, the tax attempted to be assessed and collected was also one which was not authorized by the terms of said charter. In the case of Slade v. County of Butte, 14 Cal. App. 453, 112 Pac. 485, the tax in question was illegal because it was a tax upon land belonging to the United States which was not subject to local taxation. In the case of Stewart Law & Collection Co. v. County of Alameda, 142 Cal. 660, 76 Pac. 481, the tax in question was a county road tax levied upon property situated within the limits of a city, and hence clearly illegal and void; while in the case of Pacific Coast Co. v. Wells, 134 Cal. 471, 66 Pac. 657, upon which the appellant seems to chiefly rely, the mistake in the assessment arose "by reason of a clerical error of the assessor."

None of the foregoing cases touch the point involved in the present appeal; and we are clearly of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its conclusion that the plaintiff's sole remedy for the overvaluation of his assessable property, and the consequent imposition of a tax thereon which he ought not to have been required to pay, was by application to the board of equalization for a revaluation of his said property. Not having made such application, he was not entitled to apply to the courts for relief.

Judgment affirmed.

FAMOUS PLAYERS–LASKY CORPORATION v. EWING. (Civ. 3463.)

Master and servant 🔑62—Employer held entitled to invention of employee.

Where defendant was employed by plaintiff motion picture corporation to improve the light in the studio in every way possible and to use his expert knowledge and ability in that direction, and the general idea of an invention designated a "light dissolve" was that of the manager of the plaintiff, plaintiff was entitled to the invention.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation against Howard M. Ewing. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. E. Harpham, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph F. Westall, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment directing him to execute and deliver to the plaintiff an assignment of the title to an invention designated as a "light dissolve" and enjoining him from transferring or incumbering the invention.

The appellant attacks the judgment on various grounds, none of which has impressed this court as being substantial. An unwarranted attack is made upon the learned judge of the trial court. It is said that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the findings show the plaintiff had no cause of action, but neither argument nor authority is presented. Examination of the record fails to support the appellant's assertions in these particulars. Motion was made to vacate the judgment on the ground that the conclusions of law are not supported by the findings, but are inconsistent therewith, and a motion for a new trial was made. Both motions were denied. It is contended that the court erred in not granting the appellant's motion for nonsuit and in giving judgment for the plaintiff. There is really but one question presented by the appeal, which is whether or not the plaintiff corporation is the owner and should have conveyed to it the title to the invention. The appellant contends that he made the invention while he was employed by the plaintiff corporation and that there was no agreement in the terms of his employment by which his invention should belong to his employer. The respondent, on the other hand, maintains that the trial court correctly determined upon the facts that the appellant was employed to make the invention, and that, if there is substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding must be sustained.

The plaintiff is engaged in producing motion pictures. Its manager, Cecil B. De Mille, employed the defendant for the corporation as an expert electrician. He had been a theatrical electrician, but had no knowledge of making pictures at the time of his employment. His duties were to improve light in all manners possible. He was employed first at a salary of $30 a week, but because of his inventive ability his salary was raised from time to time until he was receiving $100 per week. The principal photographer of the corporation was Mr. Wyckoff. In taking motion pictures in the studio, open-faced arc lights were used. It was deemed necessary that some device be used to permit the gradual diminution and increase of the intensity of the light, the process of diminution being known as dissolving. Mr. De Mille, Mr. Wyckoff, and the defendant discussed the matter for several hours, and it was suggested that the arc lights might be reduced in power by some device, but the defendant, from his knowledge of electrical devices, considered that impractical. Mr. De Mille suggested using a piece of silk on a roller to be used in front of the lights, the silk being arranged so that it ran from red or orange through yellow, white, and blue to black, to effect a gradual dimming of the light. The defendant said he knew the machine and suggested that he work out something along that line for the purpose of dissolving the light from the arc light used. Mr. Wyckoff also made some suggestions on the subject. Subsequently Mr. Wyckoff made further suggestions, and finally a curtain was evolved of white material at one end and black at the other, with a V-shaped extension of the black running into the white portion at the middle of the curtain. This was mounted on two rollers operated by hand at the top and bottom of the lights before which it was used. When it was put into operation, at the request of De Mille, the attorney for the plaintiff was asked to examine it and suggested there might be patentable features about it, De Mille, Wyckoff, and Ewing being present. Upon the direction of De Mille, a patent attorney was called in and directed by the attorney of the plaintiff corporation to prepare an application for patent. Since the application had to be signed by an individual, De Mille suggested that Ewing and he should sign it jointly, but, it being suggested by the attorney that De Mille was too busy to attend to the details, the application was signed by Ewing alone. The corporation paid all fees in connection with the patent application, although Ewing testified that he expected to pay the fees when the bill came in.

The appellant relies on the established rule that persons employed, as much as employers, are entitled to their own independent inventions (Agawam Co. v. Jordan, 74 U. S. [7 Wall.] 583, 19 L. Ed. 177), and that, in the absence of an express contract or agreement, the relation of employer and employee does not invest the employer with the entire property right in an invention of the employee (Johnson F. & E. Co. v. Western F. Co., 178 Fed. 823, 102 C. C. A. 267). In the Agawam Case, among other things, it was determined that, where a master workman employing other people has conceived the plan of invention and is engaged in experiments to perfect it, no suggestion by a person employed by him not amounting to a new method or arrangement, which in itself is a complete invention, is sufficient to deprive the employer of the exclusive property in the perfected improvement. "An employer who conceives the result embraced in an invention, or the general idea of a machine upon a particular principle, and in order to carry his conception into effect necessarily employs manual dexterity, or even inventive skill, in the mechanical details and arrangement, is nevertheless the inventor, and entitled to patent as against the servant who was the mere instrument through which he realized his idea." King v. Gedney, 14 Fed. Cas. page 526, No. 7795; Wellman v. Blood, Fed. Cas. No. 17,385; Huebel v. Bernard, 15 App. D. C. 510; Gallagher v. Hastings, 21 App. D. C. 88. The defendant was employed to improve the light in every way possible and to use his expert knowledge and ability in that direction. The general idea of the invention was that of De Mille, the manager of the plaintiff corporation. "As between an employer and a party employed for a special purpose, matters merely auxiliary or tributary to the main invention can give to the employee no claim as an inventor, and in regard to such features as amount to independent inventions a presumption exists in favor of the employer as the author of the same which can only be overcome by conclusive and unequivocal proof." Miller v. Kelley, 18 App. D. C. 163; United Shirt & Collar Co. v. Beattie, 149 Fed. 736, 79 C. C. A. 442. The findings of the trial court are in accordance with the facts; they are fully supported by the evidence, and the conclusions of law are in accordance both with the findings and with the evidence. The judgment follows the conclusions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by E. E. Miller against J. J. Turner, Town Marshal, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James T. Matlock and N. A. Gernon, both of Red Bluff, for appellants.

James M. Lee and W. P. Johnson, both of Red Bluff, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for false imprisonment, and was tried without a jury. The court awarded the plaintiff the sum of $450, and from the judgment the appeal has been taken.

The gist of the action is shown by the following allegations of the complaint:

> "On the 21st day of August, 1918, at and in the said town, the said J. J. Turner, with force, and without any public offense having been committed or attempted in his presence by the plaintiff, and without an order, warrant, or process of any court so to do, did seize and arrest the plaintiff on a pretended charge of vagrancy, and did then and there, against the will of the plaintiff, imprison him in the town jail of said town, and there restrain him of his liberty, for a space of five hours; that at the time of said arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff as aforesaid the said J. J. Turner, by virtue of his official duties as marshal as aforesaid, was the custodian of said jail, and in charge of and using the same for the confinement of prisoners; that the plaintiff submitted to said seizure, arrest, and imprisonment by reason of the fact that the said J. J. Turner was then and there marshal as aforesaid; and that said J. J. Turner would not have made said arrest, but for the fact that he was such marshal, and claiming that a public offense, to wit, vagrancy, had been committed in his presence by the plaintiff at said time."

The action was brought against said Turner, as marshal of the town of Tehama, and the sureties on his official bond.

[1] The first point made by appellants is that a suit on such official bond will not lie in behalf of an individual. But a complete answer to this contention is found in section 961 of the Political Code, from which it is sufficient to quote the concluding clause:

> "And any person so injured or aggrieved may bring suit on such bond, in his own name, without an assignment thereof."

[2, 3] The claim that the demurrer should have been sustained to the complaint is equally without merit. Therein is involved no uncertainty or ambiguity, and the facts are sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The facts were set forth with slightly varying phraseology in three different counts. This was unnecessary, but it constitutes no cause for complaint on the part of the appellants. Without setting forth the allegations of the complaint, it is sufficient to say that it contains all that is requisite under the doctrine announced in Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 102 Pac. 12.

[4] It cannot be successfully urged that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. The marshal had no warrant for the arrest of plaintiff, and the only attempted justification for his action is based on the claim that Miller committed the crime of vagrancy in the presence of the officer, because Miller said he did not want a job. This, indeed, would be very slight consideration upon which to base the arrest; but even that was denied by Miller, who said that he told the marshal that he was going to Corning to see if he could get a job there, and that thereupon the marshal said, "I will give you a job," and arrested him and put him in jail. Miller further testified that at the time he had in his pocket some $465, and that he had been in the town of Tehama only a few minutes before the arrest was made. In brief, there is ample support for the conclusion that the arrest was entirely without authority or excuse.

It is entirely immaterial whether the defendant Turner was the actual custodian of the jail. In that respect it is sufficient to say that he carried the keys to the jail, and locked the plaintiff in the cell.

[5] The court was not required to find specifically upon the allegation of the answer that the arrest was made without malice. If the action had been for malicious prosecution, such allegation and finding would be material; but, the complaint having been drawn upon the theory of false imprisonment, or an arrest without probable cause, the element of malice was not involved in plaintiff's cause of action, and hence no finding in regard thereto was necessary. Nelson v. Kellogg, 162 Cal. 621, 123 Pac. 1115, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 759; Neves v. Costa, 5 Cal. App. 111, 89 Pac. 860.

Certain specifications of errors of law are contained in the brief of appellants; but, as no reason is urged or authorities cited in support thereof, we pass them by without specific consideration, further than to say that we perceive therein no prejudicial error.

[6] The only contention of appellants that seems to possess even the semblance of any merit is the claim that the damages are excessive. But in considering this point we must remember the well-established principle, as declared in Gomez v. Scanlan, supra, as follows:

> "The amount of money which will compensate one for an unwarranted restraint of his person is not the subject of exact computation. Especially is this true where the invasion of the right of personal liberty is accompanied by circumstances causing humiliation, shame, and public disgrace to the party injured. In cases of this kind the extent to which the allowance may go must, in large measure, be left to the sound discretion of the jury."

In 19 Cyc. p. 372, the rule is stated as follows:

> "In fixing the amount of damages, a jury is justified in exercising a liberal discretion with due reference to the place of plaintiff's detention, as well as duration of the detention, and the oppressive or humiliating treatment by defendant which may have characterized the detention for which plaintiff brings his action."

In viewing this feature of the case, we must, of course, accept the statements of plaintiff as embodying the true situation. So viewing the record, we find him confined for about five hours in a repulsive and filthy jail, and on account of said arrest and confinement being subjected to great humiliation, and also suffering the taunts and jeers of his neighbors. The mental disturbance caused thereby, while not capable of exact measurement, assuredly cannot be said to be more than compensated by the award which was made by the learned trial judge. In this particular it is not deemed advisable to notice in detail the various cases that have been cited on the subject, many of them being set forth in a note appended to the above quotation from Cyc.

From a review of the whole record, we cannot say that there is any legal justification for interfering with the conclusion of the trial court.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; HART, J.

Ex parte HEATH. (Cr. 546.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 25, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1202(1) — Indeterminate sentence has no effect on procedure as to prior convictions.

The Indeterminate Sentence Law does not affect the procedure as to prior convictions, nor does it relieve defendant of the additional burden that may be imposed thereby.

2. Criminal law ⚷1208(9)—Limits of authority of state prison directors, as to term of imprisonment under Indeterminate Sentence Law, defined.

Under the Indeterminate Sentence Law, the authority of the state prison directors as to determination of the term of imprisonment is limited to cases wherein the Legislature has provided both a minimum and a maximum punishment, in view of subdivision (d) of the act.

3. Criminal law ⚷1211 — State prison directors have no authority to fix sentence for robbery with prior conviction for burglary at less than life, under Indeterminate Sentence Law.

Where petitioner was convicted of robbery together with a prior charge of burglary, and it appeared that in such case Pen. Code, §§ 213, 667, requires the punishment to be imprisonment for life, no minimum sentence being provided, the state prison directors held to have no authority under the Indeterminate Sentence Law to fix the term of imprisonment at less than life.

Application by Henry V. Heath for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the Warden of the State Prison at Folsom. Writ denied.

PER CURIAM. In the superior court of Alameda county, in the month of April, 1919, the petitioner was convicted of the crime of robbery together with a prior charge of burglary. In such cases it cannot be disputed that the statute requires the punishment to be imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. There is no minimum sentence for such case. Sections 213 and 667, Pen. Code.

[1, 2] But it is claimed that by virtue of the Indeterminate Sentence Law (St. 1917, p. 665), the board of prison directors should have disregarded the prior conviction and fixed the term of imprisonment as though the defendant had been convicted of robbery only. But this is a mistaken view of the law. Said statute does not affect the procedure as to prior convictions, nor does it relieve the defendant of the additional burden that may be imposed thereby. It does not, indeed, authorize or permit the state prison directors to fix the term of imprisonment, where no minimum is prescribed by the law. Their authority is limited to cases wherein the Legislature has provided both a minimum and a maximum punishment. This appears from subdivision (d) of said act, as follows:

> "The governing authority of the reformatory or prison in which such person may be confined, or any board or commission that may be hereafter given authority so to do, shall determine after the expiration of the minimum term of imprisonment has expired, what length of time, if any, such person shall be confined," etc.

[3] In the case at bar they had no discretion in the matter, since, at the time of petitioner's conviction, there was no minimum provided, and it is quite apparent that, if they had attempted to fix the term at less than life, they would have exceeded their authority. We may add that section 18a (Stats. 1919, p. 7) does not apply to this case. There is nothing in the situation before us to indicate in the slightest any illegality in the detention of petitioner.

The petition, therefore, for a writ of habeas corpus, is denied.

FARRELL v. CITY OF ONTARIO.
(Civ. 3355.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 26, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 23, 1920.)

1. New trial 🔑136—One defendant not required to give notice of intention to move for new trial to other defendants not affected by the judgment.

Where general verdict for plaintiff against one of the defendants made no reference to other defendants, and where plaintiff, on appeal from judgment for defendant, entered pursuant to order made on defendant's motion for new trial and for judgment on the special findings of fact, under Code Civ. Proc. § 663, subd. 2, conceded the finality of a judgment as to the other defendants, and where appellate court on such appeal ordered lower court to "enter judgment in accordance with the general verdict upon the issues as to damages," the defendant against whom such verdict was rendered on its motion for a new trial as to the judgment rendered against it on appellate court's order, was not required to notify such other defendants of its intention to move for a new trial under section 659; the judgment on appellate court's order not affecting the rights of such other defendants.

2. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—New trial for insufficiency of evidence not reversed in absence of abuse of discretion.

An order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict will not be reversed unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

3. New trial 🔑68—Insufficiency of evidence addressed to discretion of court.

Motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the discretion of the court.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑846 — Findings held to justify denial of injunction restraining city from maintaining canal.

In action to enjoin city from maintaining a canal and from permitting water to be discharged therefrom so as to flow upon plaintiff's lands, findings that a canal and ditch had been constructed by the city more than five years prior to the commencement of the action and had been improved and maintained openly during such time with full knowledge upon the part of plaintiff and without objection by him, and that the construction and maintenance of canal had not changed the place where storm and surface waters would naturally flow upon plaintiff's land or increased the rush of waters thereon or the quantity of waters discharged thereon, held to justify denial of injunctive relief.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Patrick Farrell against the City of Ontario and others. Verdict for plaintiff against named defendant, and from order granting a new trial and from a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Order and judgment affirmed.

Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, and A. G. Ritter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Benjamin F. Warmer, of Ontario, R. S. Parker, of Pasadena, and E. H. Jolliffe, of Ontario, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. By the complaint in this action the city of Ontario was charged with having constructed and maintained a ditch or waterway through and by means of which it wrongfully and without right diverted storm waters upon plaintiff's land, to his damage in the sum of $10,000. In addition to the allegations upon which recovery of damages was sought, facts were alleged upon which plaintiff asked that the city of Ontario be perpetually enjoined from maintaining said canal, waterway, and connections in the manner then existing, and from permitting any water to be discharged from said canal upon any lands from whence such water will flow upon plaintiff's land.

Alleging that E. W. Churchill, Harvey Churchill, C. C. Groff, and F. W. Bauer cooperated with the city of Ontario in the doing of the wrongful acts complained of, they were made parties in the action for the recovery of damages only. The action was dismissed as to F. W. Bauer, and a judgment of nonsuit granted as to Harvey Churchill.

The case was tried before a jury, which on February 14, 1917, returned its general verdict in favor of the plaintiff as against the defendant city alone in the sum of $2,500, no reference therein being made to defendants E. W. Churchill and C. C. Groff; and at the same time the jury returned therewith its special verdict in answer to certain interrogatories submitted by the court. No objection was made by any of the parties on account of the irregularity in the verdict in omitting any reference to defendants Churchill and Groff. Thereupon the clerk, of his own motion, on the 15th day of February, 1917, entered judgment for the plaintiff and against the city of Ontario on the general verdict. Within ten days thereafter said defendant served and filed its notice of intention to move for a new trial, and notice of motion for a judgment for defendant on the special findings of fact, under section 663, Code of Civil Procedure, subd. 2. Said motions were argued and taken under submission by the court, which thereafter, on July 11, 1917, without ruling upon either of the motions, ordered findings and judgment for the defendant. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment entered, pursuant to that order, on April 6, 1918 (which judgment was that the plaintiff take nothing, and that the defendant city of Ontario have judgment against the plaintiff for costs), and upon a hearing thereof the judgment was by this court reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court, with directions to enter judgment in accordance with the general verdict upon the issue as to damages, and to make such findings of fact as it might deem appropriate upon the evidence as to the equitable issues, and render judgment accordingly. Farrell v. City of Ontario, 39 Cal. App. 351, 178 Pac. 740. In its decision this court held that at the time when the clerk made his first entry of judgment he was without authority to enter judgment; that the judgment so entered was premature and of no effect; that therefore the motion for new trial was premature and of no effect. It was further noted in that decision that the plaintiff conceded the correctness of the judgment as to the defendants other than the city of Ontario. Upon going down of the remittitur, the court, on the 9th day of June, 1919, entered judgment against the defendant city of Ontario for the sum of $2,500 damages, and costs in the sum of $569.70, in accordance with the general verdict of the jury, and upon stipulation of the attorneys that, without further evidence taken, it should make findings as to the equitable issues, made findings upon which it denied to plaintiff the injunction prayed for.

Thereafter in due time the defendant city of Ontario, pursuant to its notice of intention so to do, moved the court for a new trial as to the judgment so rendered against it for damages, upon the ground, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, which motion was by the court granted, and from which order so granting defendant's motion for a new trial plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Appellant contends that the court below was without jurisdiction to grant the motion for a new trial, because the defendant city did not serve upon its codefendants, E. W. Churchill, Harvey Churchill, and C. C. Groff, any notice of its intention to move for a new trial. The necessity for such service of notice is governed by the actual, and not by the merely nominal, relations of the parties. The notice of intention must be "served upon the adverse party." Code Civ. Proc. § 659. Were the Churchills and Groff parties adverse to defendant city at the time when the proceeding to obtain a new trial was instituted; that is, were they persons whose rights could be affected by any order made either granting or refusing the city's motion for a new trial? We think not. The plaintiff on its former appeal had conceded the finality of the judgment of April 6, 1918, so far as those defendants were concerned. This court's order of reversal of that judgment, construed in the light of that concession and its acceptance by this court, was a reversal of the judgment only as between the plaintiff and the defendant city. This is consistent with the further order which this court then made directing that the superior court "enter judgment in accordance with the general verdict upon the issues as to damages." That verdict being confined, in its terms and effect, to the plaintiff and the defendant city, the direction thus given was similarly limited. The action then remained pending only as an action between the plaintiff and the defendant city. Understood in the plain light of these facts, the judgment entered after remittitur sent down on the former appeal was a judgment affecting the rights of no defendant except the city. The only legally possible object of defendant city's motion for a new trial, and the only effect of the order granting the motion, was to set aside the judgment awarding damages and obtain a retrial of the issues pertaining to the claim for damages between the parties as to whom a new judgment had been entered pursuant to the order made by this court; that is to say, between the plaintiff and the city. We conclude that service of the notice on said former defendants was not necessary, and the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion.

[2, 3] The form of the notice of intention to move for a new trial (we refer to the amended notice), while not written in the customary terms, is sufficient, and the grounds specified were, in part, those designated by the Code. Code Civ. Proc. § 657. One of these was insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and another that the damages awarded were excessive. The motion, as presented in accordance with the notice of intention, was limited to the law side of the case; it was that the court "set aside the verdicts and the judgment in the above-entitled cause and grant a new trial therein as to the issues at law and in said action for damages." There was conflicting evidence bearing upon the facts at issue, both as to the cause and the extent of the alleged injuries to the plaintiff's property. An order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict will not be reversed, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of that discretionary power of the court to which the motion was addressed. In this case it cannot be said that the lower court did not have some reasonable ground for its decision that the motion should be granted.

[4] There is also an appeal by the plaintiff from that part of the judgment whereby the plaintiff's prayer for an injunction was denied. In support of this appeal it is claimed that the pleadings and findings do not support the judgment. Attention is directed to the allegations contained in paragraph XII of the amended complaint, which appellant says were not denied. Referring to the same condition of the pleadings, this court said, in deciding the former appeal:

"Appellant contends that the allegations of the complaint upon which the prayer for equitable relief is directly predicated are admitted by the failure to deny them in the answer. This is true with respect to the allegations of the probability of future injuries. The other allegations so referred to by appellant, while not categorically denied, are sufficiently traversed by affirmative allegations in the answer inconsistent therewith."

Among the facts so alleged in the answer, it was set out therein that the said canal and ditch had been constructed by the city more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, and after their construction had been improved and maintained openly, with full knowledge on the part of the plaintiff and without objection by him. This the court found to be true. The court found further that the acts of the defendant had not changed the place where storm and surface waters would naturally flow upon plaintiff's land, or increased the rush of waters thereon, or the quantity of water discharged thereon. These were issues of fact, upon which there was evidence legally sufficient to sustain the court's determination thereof. The facts as thus determined fully justify the decision made thereon that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunctive relief claimed by him.

The order granting a new trial of the issues at law is affirmed.

The judgment denying an injunction is affirmed.

COLE v. BUX. (Civ. 2055.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

The question presented by a conflict in the evidence was solely a question of fact, on which the conclusion of the trial court is binding on appeal.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑23(4) — Contract of employment held not a promise to answer for debt of another, but a new and independent contract.

Where plaintiff and his assignor were working for W. at $11 a day, and after a few days quit W., and asked for their money, W. telling them to go to B., and B. stated that they should stay and work, and he would pay them for what they had done for W., and what they were to do for him, the new relation constituted a new and independent contract, involving no element of the statute of frauds, not being a promise by B., as contended by him when sued, to answer for the debt of another.

3. Depositions 🔑95—Court can exclude immaterial evidence contained in deposition.

The trial court, on objection of the adverse party, can exclude proposed evidence contained in a deposition on the ground that it is immaterial, or on other grounds touching its general competency, despite the rule that a party offering a deposition must read the whole of it.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—Rejection of part of deposition held error, to be disregarded as harmless.

In an action to recover for labor performed, error of the trial court in refusing to receive in its entirety the deposition of the deputy labor commissioner held of such small proportions as to require disregard, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Jasper W. Cole against M. Bux. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.
Harry Davids, of Chico, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, in the first count of his complaint, claims the sum of $330 as due to himself for labor performed for the defendant. A second count or $385 is based upon a like claim of one Melvin J. Cole, assigned to the plaintiff. The appellant makes two points. The first involves a mere conflict in the evidence. The second is based upon certain rulings of the court concerning parts of a deposition of the deputy state labor commissioner.

[1, 2] 1. As to the first point, it is sufficient to state that the evidence is very sharply conflicting—the plaintiff having testified to one state of facts and the defendant to another, and in direct conflict with the plaintiff. The plaintiff and his assignor were working for one Walker at an agreed price for themselves and teams of $11 per day. Walker was a contractor under the defendant, and the labor was being performed upon property in the ownership or charge of the defendant. The plaintiff testified as follows:

"After we worked a few days, we quit Mr. Walker, and told him we wanted our money; and he said, 'If you are going to quit, go to M. Bux;' that 'we will go to see him and see if he can get your money,' and after we went to Mr. Bux he said 'You stay and work, and I will pay you,' and then he said that he would pay us for what we done and what we were to do we would stay and work, but that we were through with Mr. Walker, and wouldn't take any more chances with him;" and "he said, 'You boys are the only ones that are doing any work, and you stay and work, and I will pay you.'"

The testimony of the plaintiff was corroborated by other witnesses. The question was solely a question of fact, upon which the conclusions of the trial court are binding on appeal. No citation of authorities is needed to show that the new relation constituted a new and independent contract, involving no element of the statute of frauds. It was not a promise, as contended by the appellant, to answer for the debt of another. The court, out of an abundance of caution, rejected the claim for the first five days of labor performed for Walker, although under the third subdivision of section 2794 of the Civil Code. It might well have allowed this. The very recent case of Fuller v. Towne (October 11, 1920, decided by the court in bank) 193 Pac. 88, discusses a similar case, and our conclusions are in harmony with the doctrines of that case. On the theory that the primary contract (subsequent in point of time to the original contract for five days' work) was entered into with Walker, a theory not sustained by the findings of the trial court, the following observation by Mr. Justice Burnett, in Meyers v. McKillop, 37 Cal. App. 144, 173 Pac. 773, is in point:

> "It is a fair inference from the foregoing that the services were performed upon the reliance that the defendant would pay, and it is also a fair inference that the latter directly promised to make such payment. This constitutes an original contract, with a sufficient consideration for its support."

[3, 4] 2. Complaint is made by the appellant that the court refused to receive in its entirety the deposition of the deputy labor commissioner. The court, in a commissioner's decision, in Bank of Orland v. Finnell, 133 Cal. 475, 65 Pac. 976, held that the trial court must require the party offering a deposition to read the whole of it. In the later case of Metteer v. Smith, 156 Cal. 572, 105 Pac. 600, the court, in referring to the last case, passes it with the remark that counsel concede the admission of part of the deposition to be error; but the court ignores the error on the ground that the portions admitted were harmless. Conceding the soundness of the rule, it has no application to this case. Here the deposition was offered by the appellant, and the only portion denied admission was that part relating to an exhibit, as to which the court sustained an objection on the ground that it was not binding on the respondent. It has never been held that the court could not, upon the objection of the adverse party, exclude proposed evidence contained in a deposition upon the ground that it is immaterial or upon other grounds touching its general competency. Moreover, the alleged error is of such small proportions that it must be disregarded in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

The judgment finds abundant support in the evidence, it appears to be just, and we find no error prejudicial to the appellant.

WESTERN SOIL BACTERIA CO. v. O'BRIEN BROS., Inc. (Civ. 3484.)

1. Sales 🔑441(2)—Finding that seed was sold under guaranty that it would grow held sustained.

In an action for the purchase price of seed and a bacterial preparation to be mixed therewith, evidence held to sufficiently show that plaintiff expressly warranted that the seed would grow, and that it was such warranty which induced the purchase by the defendant of the seed and preparation.

2. Sales 🔑284(1)—Abnormal season defense to enforcement of guaranty that seed would germinate.

Since seasonal conditions are beyond the control of any person, if it can be shown that seasonable condition during time when seed was planted and was expected to grow was abnormal, and that failure in such seed to germinate was attributable to such abnormal condition, this would be a good defense to the enforcement of a guaranty that the seed would germinate.

3. Sales 🔑441(3)—Finding that failure of seed to germinate was not caused by abnormal weather conditions held sustained.

In an action for the purchase price of seed and a bacterial preparation to be mixed therewith, wherein defendant set up breach of a warranty that the seeds would germinate, evidence for the plaintiff, tending to show that the season was unusual as to the time and amount of rainfall, held insufficient to establish that the failure of the seed to germinate was due to the abnormal season.

4. Evidence 🔑150—No abuse of discretion to refuse to permit introduction of testimony of test made by witness.

In an action to recover purchase price of seed and a bacterial preparation, where defendant set up breach of warranty that the seed would germinate, held that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit plaintiff's witnesses to testify that they made a test of the seed by placing 100 grains between moistened blotters and subjecting them to a temperature of 98° for a specified time, and that some of them germinated.

5. Evidence 🔑150—Courts vested with discretion as to admission of evidence of tests.

Trial courts are invested with a large discretion in the matter of the admission of evidence of tests made by witnesses.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the Western Soil Bacteria Company against O'Brien Bros., Incorporated, and others. From a judgment in its favor for only part of the relief prayed for, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mervyn R. Dowd, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oliver Dibble, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought to recover the sum of $525.40, a balance alleged to be due on the purchase price of certain vetch seed and of a certain bacterial preparation known as Westrobac, purchased by the defendants from the plaintiff.

The complaint was in two counts, each for goods sold and delivered, and each referring to the same transaction. The answer of the defendants, after denying that anything was due to plaintiff, or that any goods sold by it to the defendants had any value, set forth as an affirmative defense that—

> The seed and bacteria sold to the defendants by plaintiff was so sold upon the express understanding and agreement "that the same should be planted by defendants upon land belonging to the defendants in the state of California, and that when so planted the said bacteria and vetch seed so sold and delivered would grow upon said land, and would thereby promote the growth of trees in the orchard of defendants planted upon said land aforesaid; defendants allege that after said bacteria and vetch seed was delivered by plaintiff to defendants the same was planted by defendants upon said land, pursuant to the orders and direction of plaintiff and in furtherance of the scheme for which said bacteria and vetch seed were purchased by defendants as aforesaid; allege that said vetch seed failed to grow as warranted and agreed to by plaintiff, and was worthless."

Upon the trial and submission of the cause the trial court made its findings in favor of defendants, and in so doing found that said vetch seed and bacteria was sold by plaintiff to the defendants upon the express understanding and warranty made by plaintiff that the seed should be mixed with said Westrobac, and when so mixed should be planted by defendants upon certain land, * * * and that when so planted the said vetch seed * * * would grow upon said land and promote the growth of trees in the orchards of said defendants. The court further found that the said seed and bacteria was mixed and planted by defendants, pursuant to the orders and direction of plaintiff, and was planted and cultivated by defendants upon their said land in the manner directed and prescribed by plaintiff, and that said vetch seed so planted by defendants failed to grow as warranted by the plaintiff.

Upon these findings the court rendered judgment for the defendants as to the main amount of the plaintiff's claim, but for the plaintiff as to a small portion of said vetch seed, amounting to $67.50, which was neither planted by them nor returned to plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals from said judgment.

The chief contention of the appellant upon said appeal is that there was no evidence sufficient to support the finding of the court as to the existence of the express warranty, above referred to, and that, even if such warranty was made, it is not such a warranty as could be enforced in an action to recover the purchase price of the seed and bacteria involved in this transaction.

[1] In so far as said contention involves the existence of evidence to support the court's finding as to the making by plaintiff of the express warranty that the plaintiff's said seed when mixed with its special preparation, known as Westrobac, and planted upon the lands of the defendants, according to the paintiff's directions, would germinate and grow thereon, we are of the opinion that there is sufficient evidence to support such findings. The defendants were at the time of the transaction in question the owners of a large tract of land in Shasta county, which was planted out to orchard, and were desirous of planting among the trees in said orchard a cover crop, which would sprout and grow therein during the earlier months of the year, and would then be plowed under for the better fertilization of the soil in which said orchard trees were being grown. The plaintiff was advertising, by circulars and otherwise, the special merits of its bacterial preparation called Westrobac, which, being mixed with vetch seed, would greatly assist its germination and growth as a cover crop for planting in orchards. The defendants received some of these circulars, and were induced thereby to call upon the plaintiff with a view to purchasing some of its said preparation, and, upon doing so, were strongly advised by the officials of plaintiff to purchase from it the vetch seed with which said Westrobac was to be mixed, insisting that their said seed was of a superior quality, and that if the defendants would purchase it at a somewhat higher price than that quoted by other dealers in vetch seed the plaintiff would guarantee that such seed, when treated by its special preparation and planted and cultivated according to its direction upon the premises of the defendants, would germinate and grow. The evidence sufficiently shows that the plaintiff's assurance of such a result was not only express, but was unqualified, and was made with the full knowledge on the part of the plaintiff as to the purpose of the purchase of said seed and as to where the same was to be planted and grown. The evidence further sufficiently shows that it was this express and unqualified warranty which induced the purchase by the defendants of the plaintiff's said seed and preparation.

[2, 3] The appellant, however, contends that, even if such express warranty was given and made, and even though it formed the chief inducement to defendants for their said purchase, it is not such a warranty as would be enforceable, for the reason that there are other elements which enter into the problem as to whether seed, however reinforced as to its germinating qualities, and however carefully or correctly planted, will germinate and grow to its expected maturity, such as conditions of soil and location, and also the particular climatic conditions of the season of the planting and growth of said seed, which matters, according to thhe plaintiff's contention, would always be beyond the control of the vendor of the seed. The difficulty with this contention consists in the fact that, in so far as the matters of soil and location are concerned, the plaintiff knew at the time said warranty was given in just what soil and location said seed was to be planted. It was purchased by defendants for planting in growth as a cover crop within their said orchard, which facts were fully known to plaintiff at the time of said sale. With respect to the seasonal conditions, it is true that this would be beyond the control of the plaintiff; and that, if it could be shown that the seasonal conditions of the particular place where and time during which said seed was to be planted and was expected to grow were abnormal, and that whatever failure there was in said seed to germinate and grow was attributable to such abnormal conditions, this would be a good defense to the enforcement of such guaranty. It must be conceded that there is some evidence in the record going to indicate that the season during which said seed was sown was unusual as to the time and amount of rainfall. This evidence, however, was educed from officials and employees of the plaintiff, and evidently did not impress the trial court, either as to its truth, or as to the sufficiency of its explanation why none of the seed sold by plaintiff to the defendants, and by them treated, planted, and cultivated in all respects in conformity to the plaintiff's directions, either germinated or grew. Upon this subject the evidence is positive and direct that absolutely none of said seed so treated and sown by the defendants within their said orchard either germinated or grew; and this failure of the defendants' said seed to measure up to the plaintiff's express warranty thereof the trial court finds to have been due to the breach of said warranty, and not to the fact that any alleged abnormal seasonal conditions contributed to the failure of said seed to germinate and grow. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff failed to sufficiently establish its alleged excuse for the failure of its seed to measure up to the requirements of its warranty.

[4, 5] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in excluding certain testimony offered by plaintiff with respect to certain tests made of portions of the particular vetch seed sold by it to the defendants and later returned to it. The test to which the plaintiffs' offered witnesses would have testified were made by taking 100 grains of said seed, and, after placing them between moistened blotters subjecting them to a temperature of 98° for a specified length of time. The plaintiff offered to show that when said seed was subjected to this form of test a large proportion of its grains germinated. It will be apparent, however, that such a test as this would be one made under very different conditions from those surrounding the planting and growth of seed in an open orchard, and under conditions as to soil, temperature, and location entirely different from those under which the, so to speak, laboratory test proffered by the plaintiff was made. Trial courts are invested with a large discretion in the matter of the admission of evidence of this character, and we are unable to say that the trial court in the instant case abused its said discretion in its refusal to admit such testimony. People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 294, 52 Pac. 833.

No other errors being urged by the plaintiff, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PURIO et al. (Cr. 535.)

1. Jury 🔑136(5)—Statute providing for 20 peremptory challenges inapplicable to robbery.

Pen. Code, § 1070, entitling an accused to 20 peremptory challenges in certain cases, applies only to cases where no shorter sentences than life may be imposed, and is not applicable where the punishment in the discretion of the court may be less than life, and therefore does not apply to the crime of robbery under section 213, where it is provided that punishment shall not be less than one year.

2. Jury 🔑136(1)—Indeterminate sentence law does not affect rule as to number of peremptory challenges.

The recent change in the law providing for an indeterminate sentence has not affected the rule in regard to the number of peremptory challenges to which an accused is entitled.

3. Criminal law 🔑1137(3)—Error in instruction held invited by requested instruction for accused.

An instruction which unduly emphasized the importance of care in considering evidence on the subject of alibi could not be complained of by an accused, who requested an instruction which assumed that evidence as to alibi was easily fabricated and difficult to disprove; the requested instruction inviting the error.

4. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Argumentative instruction not reversible error in absence of prejudice.

Where from the entire record it can be safely said that no prejudice resulted, a judgment of conviction will not be reversed by reason of an argumentative instruction.

5. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—Granting new trial for newly discovered evidence rests largely in discretion of trial court.

The matter of granting a motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.

6. Criminal law 🔑945(2)—Statements as to newly discovered evidence held too uncertain to render denial of new trial error.

In a prosecution for robbery, statements in an affidavit filed on motion for new trial, in which several witnesses deposed that they conversed with the prosecuting witness on a certain date, in which he stated: "Make no difference to me. More better let them go. No look like same man anyhow. No good send 'em jail"—were so uncertain and inconsequential that it cannot be said that trial judge abused its discretion in denying the motion, as it was for him to determine whether a new trial would result in a different verdict.

7. Criminal law 🔑945(1) — Newly discovered evidence should be such as would produce different result.

Newly discovered evidence which would require a reversal of action of trial court in denying a motion for new trial should be such as would produce a different result from that arrived at by the jury.

8. Criminal law 🔑939(1) — Diligence in obtaining alleged newly discovered evidence held wanting.

Where alleged newly discovered evidence consisted of statements of prosecuting witness concerning identification of defendants, made during the trial and the day before the case was submitted to the jury, and no reason appears why it was not immediately called to the attention of the court, action of the court in denying a motion for a new trial on the ground of such alleged newly discovered evidence was justified on the ground of want of diligence.

9. Criminal law 🔑991(3)—Judgment for indeterminate sentence held in conformity with statute.

A judgment, "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that you be taken hence by the sheriff of the county of M. and be by him delivered to the proper authorities of the prison of San Quentin, and there be confined pending the determination of the proper authorities as to when you shall be released," held a proper indeterminate sentence in conformity to the requirement of Pen. Code, § 1168, as added by St. 1917, p. 665.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Frank Purio and others were convicted of robbery, and from the judgment of conviction and an order denying their motions for new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

L. J. Schino, of Merced, Wm. P. Toscano and F. E. Murphy, both of Stockton, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellants were convicted of the crime of robbery, and they appeal from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial. The evidence for the people showed that they entered a store kept by certain Chinese in the city of Merced, and by the use of force and violence took quite a sum of money from the person of several of the Chinamen, including the owner, who were therein at the time. It was a brutal crime, and there was strong and convincing evidence of the guilt of the defendants. They were positively identified by two of the Chinese. One of them made an admission which was virtually equivalent to a confession of guilt, and strong circumstantial evidence was introduced tending to connect the defendants with the commission of the crime. In fact, a careful reading of the record can leave little doubt that the verdict is just, and should not be disturbed. The situation is such that we might with propriety disregard any of the alleged errors, upon the general ground that no prejudice has been shown to the substantial rights of any of the defendants. The assignments of error, however, have been carefully examined, and, while numerous, and persistently urged by appellants, it can with confidence be said that nearly, if not quite, all of them are destitute of any merit. If two or three of them may be questioned, they are matters of such slight importance as hardly to require serious consideration. Indeed, the attitude and conduct of the district attorney and of the trial judge seems to have been characterized by the greatest care and anxiety to protect and safeguard the rights of the defendants, as well as to promote the welfare of the community. That appellants had a fair and impartial trial cannot be successfully controverted. And while we would be justified in affirming the conviction upon the foregoing statement, we proceed to notice a few of the objections that have been made by appellants.

[1, 2] The action of the court in refusing to allow more than 10 peremptory challenges is claimed as error under section 1070 of the Penal Code. It is contended that, since the crime of robbery may be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for life, the defendants, by virtue of said section, were entitled to twenty of such challenges. The said provision, however, applies only to cases where no shorter sentence may be imposed. It is not applicable where the punishment, in the discretion of the court, may be less than life. It therefore does not apply to the crime of robbery wherein the statute has provided that it is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year. Section 213, Pen. Code. This has been decided by the Supreme Court in the following cases: People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438; People v. Riley, 65 Cal. 107, 3 Pac. 413; People v. Sullivan, 132 Cal. 94, 64 Pac. 90. In People v. Harris, 61 Cal. 136, upon which appellants rely, it appears that the defendant was charged with robbery and also prior convictions, and therefore under section 667 of the Penal Code, the information involved a charge which, if sustained by a verdict of conviction, would require the court to impose a life sentence without any discretion to reduce the term. It may be added that the recent change in the law providing for an indeterminate sentence has not affected the rule in reference to the number of peremptory challenges.

[3, 4] The action of the court in giving and refusing instructions, and also in modifying certain instructions proposed by defendants, is severely criticized. As to the instructions, it may be said that they contain comprehensive and accurate statements of every principle of law that was necessary for the guidance of the jury. Every appropriate instruction proposed by defendants which was rejected by the court was substantially covered by the charge. If any just criticism at all could be made of the action of the court in its directions to the jury, it would be based upon the use of the following language:

> "The fact, however, which experience has shown, that an alibi as a defense is capable of being and has been occasionally successfully fabricated; that even when wholly false its detection may be a matter of very great difficulty; and that the temptation to resort to this as a spurious defense may be very great—these are considerations attendant upon this defense which call for some special suggestion upon the part of the court. These are that, while you are not to hesitate to give this as a defense full weight, either as entirely satisfying you of the innocence of the defendants or as creating the reasonable doubt which entitles them to an acquittal, still you are to scrutinize the testimony offered in support of an alibi with care, that you may be satisfied that a fabricated defense has not been imposed upon you."

There may be some doubt as to the propriety of such caution on the part of the court. The instruction is somewhat argumentative, and might be regarded as unduly emphasizing the importance of care in considering the evidence on the subject, and as conveying a possible suggestion on the part of the court that the evidence in behalf of defendants in favor of the alibi was fabricated. It is to be observed, however, that the court in this and other instructions clearly told the jury that they were to give fair consideration to such evidence, and that if it created a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendants, or any of them, they should not hesitate to find a verdict of not guilty. We may remark, also, that an instruction was requested by defendants which assumed that such evidence was easily fabricated and difficult to disprove. It could be said, therefore, that appellants are in no position to complain at the use of this language by the court, since they themselves invited it. At any rate, in view of the entire record, it can be safely said that no prejudice resulted to defendants by reason of any questionable phrase that may have been used by the court.

[5-8] Another matter that may receive brief attention is an affidavit that was filed by defendants on their motion for a new trial. This was made by Lino Piazzi, Louie Nolan, and Walter Palmer, in which they deposed that they conversed with one Yee Chung on the 21st day of May, at the hour of 5:30 o'clock p. m., in the city of Merced, in which he uttered the following words:

> "Make no difference to me. More better let them go. No look like same man anyhow. No good send 'em jail."

The matter of granting the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence so largely rests in the discretion of the trial court that an appellate court would require a stronger showing than was made herein to reverse an order denying such motion. The statements contained in said affidavit are so uncertain and inconsequential and the affidavit was obtained under such suspicious circumstances as to entitle it to little consideration. Even giving full force and credit to said affidavit, it would still remain for the trial judge to determine whether, in his opinion, if such evidence were offered at a new trial, it would produce a different result from that arrived at by the jury. He undoubtedly concluded that the defendants would be convicted again, and we think such conclusion is not at all unreasonable. Besides, this purported conversation appears to have taken place during the trial, and the day before the case was submitted to the jury. There is no reason shown why it was not immediately called to the attention of the court, and for this apparent want of diligence the action of the court was justified.

Appellants seem to question the sufficiency of the judgment, which was in the following form:

> "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that you be taken hence by the sheriff of the county of Merced, and be by him delivered to the proper authorities of the state prison at San Quentin, and there to be confined, pending the determination of the proper authorities as to when you shall be released."

In explanation of the form the court said:

"It must be an indeterminate sentence. The court cannot fix any time at all. The authorities at San Quentin fix the term."

[9] It may be remarked that no objection was made by defendants or any of them at the time to the form of the judgment. However, the action of the court was in conformity to the requirement of the law (section 1168, Pen. Code; Stats. 1917, p. 665) as construed by this and the Supreme Court. People v. Lee, 36 Cal. App. 334, 172 Pac. 158; People v. Mendosa, 178 Cal. 509, 173 Pac. 998.

We have not deemed it necessary to review specifically the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, as they involve simple and familiar rules of practice that have often been enunciated and must be deemed clearly established.

The judgment and order are legally sound, and are therefore affirmed.

HINCKLEY et al. v. SAN DIEGO COUNTY. (Civ. 3465.)

1. Taxation ⚿98—Intangible personal property has situs at owner's domicile.

Generally, intangible personal property, for the purposes of taxation, has its situs at the domicile of the owner; but such rule does not apply where the property has acquired a business situs elsewhere.

2. Taxation ⚿100 — Notes held by bank for collection do not acquire business situs in state in which bank is situated.

Notes held by a bank in a state other than that of the domicile of the owner for purposes of collection do not acquire a business situs in the state in which bank is situated, so as to subject them to taxation therein, as against state of owner's domicile.

3. Taxation ⚿99—Notes of deceased resident held in other state held not taxable in California.

Where will of resident of California was probated in another state, and the estate was being administered therein, and where beneficiaries named in will were not residents of California, notes held by bank in such other state for collection at time of testator's death were not taxable in California, pending administration of the estate, since ownership of note was not vested in a resident of the state at such time.

4. Taxation ⚿20 — Property neither actually nor constructively within state not taxable.

The taxing power of the state does not extend to property which is neither actually nor constructively within the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Joseph J. Hinckley and Fannie Munson, as administrator and administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Thomas S. Parker, deceased, against the County of San Diego. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Utley, Dist. Atty., and Albert J. Lee, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for appellant.

Haines & Haines and Fred O'Farrell, all of San Diego, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant, county of San Diego, from a judgment against it decreeing that plaintiffs recover from the county $2,608.70, theretofore paid under protest by plaintiffs as state and county taxes assessed and levied against the estate of Thomas S. Parker, deceased, for the fiscal year 1918–1919.

As stated by appellant, the sole question is whether, for taxation purposes, intangible personal property has its situs at the domicile of the decedent, who at the time of his death was a resident of the state of California, or at the place where the evidences of indebtedness are physically situated and have been reduced to possession and are under the control of executors in a foreign jurisdiction.

Briefly the facts are these:

Thomas S. Parker, of whose estate plaintiffs are administrator and administratrix, respectively, died at Rochester, Minn., on July 11, 1917, and was at that time a resident of the county of San Diego, state of California. He left a will, by which he appointed the American Trust & Savings Bank of El Paso, Tex., and James G. McNary, of the same place, executors and also trustees. Said will was admitted to probate in the county of El Paso, state of Texas, on September 4, 1917. On September 27, 1917, said will was admitted to probate in the county of San Diego, state of California, an exemplified copy thereof, and of the probate thereof in the state of Texas, having theretofore been filed in the superior court of said county of San Diego, and the plaintiffs were appointed administrator and administratrix, respectively, with the will annexed.

On the first Monday in March, 1918, the plaintiffs had in their possession in the county of San Diego, belonging to said estate, certain real estate and personal property, which was valued by the assessor for taxation purposes at $1,850. As an addition to the tax return made by the plaintiffs, the assessor inserted an item of "money and solvent credits," and valued them in the arbitrary sum of $100,000, and said item was placed upon the assessment roll, and a tax thereupon levied in the sum of $2,608.70, which was paid by the plaintiffs under protest. Thereafter, and in due course and according to law, plaintiffs filed a claim with the board of supervisors against the county of San Diego for the repayment of said tax so paid, which claim was rejected by the board of supervisors. Thereafter this action was commenced, at a time when the estate of said Parker was still in process of distribution in both jurisdictions.

In addition to the property physically situated in the county of San Diego, at the time of Parker's death, he was the owner of ten promissory notes of the J. H. Nations Meat & Supply Company, of El Paso, Tex., in the aggregate principal sum of $50,000, said notes being secured by a lien on real estate situated in said city and state. These notes were in the hands of a bank at El Paso for collection. Said Parker, at the time of his death, was also the owner of money on deposit in the First National Bank at El Paso, amounting to $684.35; money on deposit in the American Trust & Security Bank, Washington, D. C., amounting to $208.37; Liberty Bonds purchased and paid for by decedent in his lifetime, amounting to $20,000, and on deposit with the bank in El Paso; and, in addition thereto, certain jewelry, of the value of $110, which was on his person at the time of his death.

On the first Monday in March, 1918, the money, jewelry, and evidences of indebtedness referred to in the preceding paragraph, and in addition thereto $1,750 collected as interest, were in the hands of the executors of the last will and testament of decedent at El Paso, and said money, jewelry, and evidence of indebtedness were physically situated at El Paso, and had not been physically in the state of California at any time subsequent to the death of Parker, and had never been in the possession or the control of plaintiffs, or either of them.

It is needless to discuss at length the general principles involved in appellant's contention. The rules governing the situs of personal property for the purposes of taxation have been clearly defined in this state and in other jurisdictions. See note to Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Co. v. Board of Assessors, L. R. A. 1915C, 903; also note to Boyd v. Selma, 16 L. R. A. 729; Estate of Fair, 128 Cal. 607, 61 Pac. 184; Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 61 Pac. 382; Mackay v. San Francisco, 113 Cal. 392, 45 Pac. 696; San Francisco v. Lux, 64 Cal. 481, 2 Pac. 254.

[1] From these cases it is clear, as stated by appellant, that the general rule is that, if one is domiciled in the state, his personal property, in contemplation of law, has its situs there, and is taxable there. In Worthington v. Sebastian, 25 Ohio St. 1, which has been quoted in many subsequent cases, it is said:

> "Intangible property has no actual situs. If, for purposes of taxation, we assign it a legal situs, surely that situs should be the place where it is owned, and not the place where it is owed. It is incapable of a separate situs, and must follow the situs either of the creditor or the debtor. To make it follow the residence of the latter is to tax the debtor and not the creditor."

See, also, Estate of Fair, supra; Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 61 Pac. 382; Goldgart v. People, 106 Ill. 25; Scripps v. Fulton County, 183 Ill. 278, 55 N. E. 700; Hayward v. Christian County, 189 Ill. 234, 59 N. E. 601; Matzenbaugh v. People, 194 Ill. 108, 62 N. E. 546, 88 Am. St. Rep. 134.

[2] There is a well-recognized exception to this general rule, which occurs when there exist certain combinations of circumstances upon which a situs, commonly called a "business situs" may be predicated. We refer to this exception in passing for the reason that the respondents attempt in their brief to bring the facts of the present case within this exception. In reply to this contention, it is to be observed that the findings in the present case show that the notes of J. H. Nations Meat & Supply Company, aggregating $50,000, were in the hands of the bank at El Paso at the time of the death of Parker merely for the purpose of collection. It has been held that notes left in a state other than the domicile of the owner for safe-keeping or for collection do not acquire a "business situs," so as to subject them to taxation in the place of their physical location. Johnson County v. Hewitt, 76 Kan. 816, 93 Pac. 181, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 493; Gibbins v. Adamson, 5 Kan. App. 90, 48 Pac. 871, affirmed in 58 Kan. 818, 51 Pac. 1101;[1] Hunter v. Board of Supervisors, 33 Iowa, 376, 11 Am. Rep. 132; Bullock v. Guilford, 59 Vt. 516, 9 Atl. 360.

Upon this subject it is sufficient to say that the cases announcing the rules with reference to a "business situs" of personal property all suggest as an indispensable condition of such a situs, the necessity of something like a general, or more or less continuous, course of business or series of transactions within the state where the property is physically located, as distinguished from mere sporadic and isolated transactions. In the case of Vicksburg v. Armour Packing Co. (Miss.) 24 South. 224, the court observed that the question of what constituted a business situs was a difficult one, but from the reports on the subject it would seem that a business situs is connected with the idea of more or less permanency of location of the credits, or with a purpose to incorporate them when collected into the mass of property of the state. See, also, Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. New Orleans,

It is to be remembered that the only item of importance involved is the notes of Nations Meat & Supply Company, aggregating $50,000; it being conceded that the tax was improper upon the Liberty Bonds, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a recovery for the amount of the tax paid thereon.

[3] Having determined that the facts in the present case do not bring it within the exception to the general rule, which is founded upon the idea of the property having acquired a "business situs" elsewhere than the domicile of the owner, let us revert again to the general rule, hereinbefore recognized, that intangible personal property, for the purposes of taxation, has its situs at the domicile of the owner. The application of this general rule in the present case, however, does not sustain the contentions of the appellant, for the reason that we are unable to agree with the appellant that the owner of the property, at the time of the levy of the tax, was domiciled within the state of California. It affirmatively appears in the present case that the court at El Paso has taken the property in question into its custody and is administering upon it—indeed, has partially distributed it. The courts of California have no jurisdiction of the El Paso executors, who have been given a qualified interest in this property during the period of administration for the purposes of such administration. In so far as the title to this property is concerned, it appears from the record that one-half of the property went to the wife of the decedent as her share of the community property. She is, and at all times mentioned in the record has been, a resident of the state of Washington, and as to her share of the property, assuredly, the owner thereof is not resident of this state. As to the remainder of the property, by the terms of the will, after administration, it was to be held by the persons appointed as executors by the El Paso court as trustees for certain definite purposes. These trustees were not residents of California. It is, of course, true that at the time of the levy of the tax the property was not being held by the trustees in that capacity, as it had not yet been distributed to them as such. It was being held by them in their capacity as executors. As such they had a limited property in the notes. Ham v. Henderson, 50 Cal. 367; Page v. Tucker, 54 Cal. 121; Jahns v. Nolting, 29 Cal. 507, 510, 511; Freese v. Hibernia Savings, etc., Co., 139 Cal. at page 397, 73 Pac. 172. As to the vested legal title, subject to this qualified right in the executors, it assuredly was in the trustees, the persons to whom the property had been bequeathed. Therefore it appears that the ownership, title, and right to the present and future possession of the property, and, indeed, each and every right, title, and interest, legal and equitable, in the same, was vested in nonresidents of this state, at the time of the levy of the tax in question.

[4] It is, of course, axiomatic that the taxing power of the state does not extend to property which is neither actually nor constructively within the state. Maxwell v. People, 189 Ill. 546, 59 N. E. 1101. Under the fiction or maxim that the situs of personal property follows the domicile of the owner, property is said to be constructively within the state of the owner's domicile to give jurisdiction for taxation. In cases where the owner is in the state, or his executor or trustees are within the state, holding the property, the state has some way to acquire jurisdiction of the property, constructively, at least, by acquiring jurisdiction of the owner or holder thereof. But in the present case there was no one in California who had either the title, the possession, or the right to the possession of these credits at the time of the levy of the tax. There was no one in the state who had either an absolute or a qualified right to the credits or to the evidences thereof. The courts of California have no jurisdiction of the El Paso executors, who have the right to the possession of this property during the period of administration, nor of the trustees, who have the vested legal title, subject to the right of the executors.

In the case of Mackay v. San Francisco, supra, a quotation is made from Judge Cooley's work on Taxation (page 376), in which it is said:

> "If a fund is in charge of a court, it is taxable in the jurisdiction having control of it."

In the present case the courts of California have no jurisdiction over the res by reason of its actual situs here, and they cannot give the credits a constructive situs in this state, because they cannot acquire jurisdiction over the owner or holder thereof.

The Political Code, by section 3629 thereof, requires the assessor to exact from each person a statement in writing showing all property "owned by such person, or in his possession or under his control." The notes in question were not owned by plaintiffs; they were not claimed by, nor in the possession of, nor under the control of, plaintiffs. Furthermore, possession of the same could not legally be secured by the plaintiffs. They could not, as a matter of right, demand that the El Paso court order the credits transmitted to them in California. In the case of Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 61 Pac. 382, the bonds sought to be taxed were held by trustees, one of whom lived in San Francisco and the other in Nevada. The court said (128 Cal. at page 683, 61 Pac. 383):

> "The property under this rule could not be assessed to the plaintiffs in San Francisco, because that is the place of domicile of only one of them. It could not be assessed to them in Nevada, because that is the place of domicile of only one of them. The property is not in California, nor in Nevada, but, being intangible personal property, is said by defendants to follow the person of the owner. If it follows the person of the owner, it could not, as matter of law, be said to follow the person of the plaintiff who resides in California, and to forsake and refuse to follow the person of the plaintiff who resides in Nevada. It follows one as much as the other, and its situs is that of the place of domicile of its owners. Therefore, on the first Monday of March, 1895, the plaintiff Mackay was a resident of Nevada and was the owner of an undivided one-half of the bonds, and, neither the property nor the owner being within the jurisdiction of the state, the assessment, as to Mackay's interest, was void. The language of the Constitution is: 'All property in the state * * * shall be taxed in proportion to its value.' The interest of Mackay in this property was not 'property in the state' within the meaning of the Constitution."

It is true that in the last-cited case, the property was held by trustees after distribution, and in the present case the American Trust & Savings Bank of El Paso and James G. McNary of the same place are holding the notes as executors and not as trustees, because the property has not yet been distributed to them as trustees under the will. However the fundamental question presented is the same in both cases. The answer to the contention of the appellant in the present case is, in the language of the Mackay Case, that "neither the property nor the owner being within the jurisdiction of the state the assessment * * * was void." The probate court of El Paso, Tex., had the right to take this property into its custody. It had the right to distribute the same without reference to administrations pending in other states.

Again, in the language of the Mackay Case, how can it be said that the notes shall follow the person of the administrator who has never taken possession of them, and cannot secure possession of them because they are outside of the jurisdiction of the court through which he derives his authority, and forsake and refuse to follow the persons of the executors who have taken possession of them and are exercising control over them, as an arm of the court having jurisdiction over the credits by reason of their actual situs? With reference to the title to these notes, there is privity between Parker, the decedent, and his El Paso executors; but the administrators in California are unconnected with these assets in any way.

In Goldgart v. People, supra, it is said, quoting from Burroughs on Taxation:

> "If the owner be resident in the state there is jurisdiction over his person, and over his credits also, which, in legal contemplation, in the absence of anything showing they have a situs elsewhere, accompany him. If the owner is absent, but the credits are in fact here, in the hands of an agent, for renewal or collection, with the view of reloaning the money by the agent as a permanent business, they have a situs here for the purpose of taxation, and there is jurisdiction over the thing."

In the present case, the state of California has neither jurisdiction over the credits, nor over the person owning them, nor in the possession and control of them. It is not, as contended by appellants, merely a case of the construction of the statutes of this state. The question involved goes to the jurisdiction, to the power of the state to tax at all.

> "While the mode, form, and extent of taxation are, speaking generally, limited, only by the wisdom of the Legislature, that power is limited by a principle inhering in the very nature of constitutional government, namely, that the taxation imposed must have relation to a subject within the jurisdiction of the taxing government." Louisville, etc., Co. v. Kentucky, 188 U. S. 385, 23 Sup. Ct. 463, 47 L. Ed. 513.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. McKITTRICK OIL CO. (Civ. 3356.)

Public lands 🔑106(1) — Decision of commissioner and Secretary of Interior conclusive.

Where the United States government, by its duly authorized agents, the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, declared title to a certain placer mining claim was in plaintiff railroad instead of an adverse claimant, the matter was finally settled and closed in favor of the railroad, not only as against the adverse claimant, but also as against the United States; the title of the railroad becoming vested from and after the date of the decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against the McKittrick Oil Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to quiet its title to certain tracts of land in Kern county, described as lots 1 and 2 and south ½ of the southeast quarter of section 1, in township 30 south, range 21 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Plaintiff's claim of title is based upon a patent, dated January 25, 1896, from the United States government to plaintiff, of a large number of parcels of land, one of which was designated as all of fractional section 1, containing 641.40 acres, in said township 30. The same patent also granted the northeast quarter of section 11, containing 160 acres, and being in the same township. A survey of the lands in that township, approved April 27, 1869, and known as the Reed survey, was the only official survey of that section until the year 1893. A second survey known as the Carpenter survey, was approved on November 18, 1893. In some land department cases this is called the survey of 1894. By the Carpenter survey the former section 1 was preserved and marked on the Carpenter map as "S. P. R. R. Co. Lot 37." It was not attached to any section, according to the Carpenter map. Immediately south of this lot 37, Carpenter in his survey designated and laid out a new fractional section 1, subdivided into six lots, which were designated therein as lots 1, 2, 3, 4, S. ½ of S. W. ¼, and S. ½ of S. E. ¼. Three of these parcels are subject to the present action.

On February 17, 1892, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company applied by list No. 48, to be permitted to select certain indemnity lands, including all of section 1. On January 14, 1896, indemnity selection list No. 48 was approved by the Interior Department. On January 25, 1896, the patent issued as hereinabove stated. Respondent contends that the land conveyed by plaintiff's patent was the section 1 as designated by the Reed survey. Appellant, on the other hand, contends that the description in the patent applies solely to the Carpenter survey. There have been conflicting decisions upon the question of interpretation thus presented. The present task resolves itself into the duty to determine which ones of those decisions are controlling authority in this case.

On December 30, 1899, one Carl A. Bruns made application to select, under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stats. U. S. 36), the several subdivisions constituting section 1 of said township 30. On January 10, 1900, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company applied to make indemnity selection of the S. ½ of the S. W. ¼ and the S. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of said section. Both of these applications were subsequent to the approval of the Carpenter survey and the descriptions in the applications tally exactly with the subdivisions of section 1 as shown in that survey. By decision of date November 22, 1900, the Commissioner of the General Land Office rejected both of these applications upon the ground that the patent to the railroad company issued on January 25, 1896, included the land embraced in said applications. On December 15, 1900, the commissioner recalled said decision and permitted the selection by Bruns to stand, holding in effect that the railroad patent of January 25, 1896, did not embrace the land covered by said applications, because it was land added to section 1 by the Carpenter survey. From the decision of December 15, 1900, the railroad company appealed to the Secretary of the Interior. By decision of date March 26, 1902, the Secretary reaffirmed the commissioner's decision of November 22, 1900. Referring to the fact that the patent conveyed a title to "all of fractional section 1" within said township, the Secretary held that this language was clear and unambiguous, and that the land then in question was the only land meeting the description quoted according to the plat of the Carpenter survey, "which was the then accepted plat in use governing the disposal of public lands in this township." The foregoing decision of the Secretary seems to have ended the controversy so far as Bruns was concerned and so far as the United States government was concerned, and from that time has been relied upon by the railroad company, which prior thereto had been contending that the land conveyed to it in the patent of fractional section 1 was the land designated as lot 37 in the Carpenter survey and as fractional section 1 of the Reed survey.

On the 28th day of December, 1904, the McKittrick Oil Company presented in the Visalia land district an application for patent for what is called the California Oil Company No. 28 Placer Mining Claim, embracing within its limits the same parcels of land now claimed by the plaintiff in this action. This application was made under a mining location which originated on September 19, 1899, and which on December 2, 1899, was conveyed by the locators to the claimant, McKittrick Oil Company. This application was rejected by the local land officers on the ground that the land asked for had been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and was not therefore public land of the United States subject to disposition under the mining laws. On appeal by the mineral claimant, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by decision of April 12, 1905, affirmed the action of the local officers, citing the case of Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Bruns (31 Land Dec. 272), which is the decision of March 26, 1902. The mineral claimant having further appealed, the Secretary made his decision thereon of date November 13, 1908. McKittrick Oil Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 37 Land Dec. 244. In this decision the department arrived at the conclusion that the decision of March 26, 1902, was erroneous in its "assumption that a patent must in all cases be read in connection with the plat of survey on file at the date of the issuance of the patent, where prior thereto two or more conflicting or inconsistent surveys had been made of the township embracing the tract named in the patent." After stating the decision made in Gleason v. White, 199 U. S. 54, 25 Sup. Ct. 782, 50 L. Ed. 87 (relating to a patent for lands in Florida), which was relied upon as authority for the new attitude of the department concerning the interpretation of the patent, the decision concludes:

> "The department is of opinion, therefore, that the assumption upon which its previous decision with respect to the land here in question was based was erroneous, and that the case should have been, and should now be, in determining the subject-matter of the patent, considered and decided with reference to the record involved in the issuance of the patent."

The department thereupon held that, in view of the circumstances stated by it:

> "The tract represented as fractional section 1 of township 30 south, range 21 east, M. D. M., on the plat of the survey of 1869, and not the fractional section 1 of that township as returned by the survey of 1894, is the tract that passed to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by its patent of January 25, 1896. The departmental decision in the case of Southern Pacific Railroad Company v. Bruns, supra, is therefore recalled and vacated."

Thereafter the mineral claimant, the defendant in this action, was allowed to continue its proceeding to perfect its claim to this land as public land of the United States, with the result that on April 3, 1916, there was issued to the defendant the patent under which it now claims title to the land in controversy.

Appellant relies upon Southern Pacific R. Co. v. Jackson Oil Co., 164 Cal. 392, 129 Pac. 276, as authority upon which this case should be decided. In that action the land in controversy was described as lot 4 of section 11 of said township 30. The plaintiff there based its claim of title upon the patent of January 25, 1896, which, as we have shown, included a tract of land designated as the northeast quarter of section 11, of which lot 4 was a part, according to the Carpenter survey. We here refer to that decision and its statement of the case there presented. The Supreme Court in its opinion copied in full a decision rendered October 6, 1911 (40 Land Dec. 528), on appeal from a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the case there entitled Jackson Oil Company v. Southern Pacific Railway Co. In that opinion the department overruled its former decision of date November 13, 1908, in McKittrick Oil Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., and again held as has been held in the Bruns Case that the patent of 1896 to the railroad company must be interpreted according to the Carpenter survey. Not only so, but the decision further emphasized the fact that the department itself in 1903 had held, in a contest which presented the same question, that the patent of 1896, "conveyed the title to these lots to said company; and since then this department has been without jurisdiction over the lands. Any expression to the contrary, in the case of McKittrick Oil Co. v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. (37 Land Dec. 243), must be regarded as overruled." Thereupon the Supreme Court said:

> "With the foregoing opinion we entirely agree. The United States government by its duly authorized agents declared the title to this lot to be in the plaintiff, and the whole matter finally settled and closed. * * * While the matter was pending, the Secretary of the Interior had jurisdiction to review all rulings theretofore made (Gage v. Gunther, 136 Cal. 345 [89 Am. St. Rep. 141, 68 Pac. 710]), but after the patent had issued and the government had formally declared that it conveyed the land in question, no further departmental interference was legally possible."

After the department decision in Jackson Oil Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., of date October 6, 1911, the matter of the McKittrick Oil Company and its claim for a patent was again considered by the department, which, on August 9, 1913, reaffirmed its former decision in the case of McKittrick Oil Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., and declined to follow the doctrine of the Jackson Oil Company Case.

By the decision which, on November 13, 1908, the Secretary of the Interior made in favor of the McKittrick Oil Company, and by the subsequent proceedings in the same case, the department assumed that it had jurisdiction over this land as government land. On that assumption the department called before it the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and undertook to "recall and vacate" its decision of March 26, 1902, wherein the government had acknowledged that this was no longer public land, and had solemnly declared that it was the property of the railroad company. If in these later proceedings the Land Department did have jurisdiction to act upon the subject-matter constituting appellant's rights under its patent, then the judgment herein should be affirmed, since the state courts have no power to review the decisions of the department in the exercise of its jurisdiction over the disposition of public lands. But if in such later proceedings the department was without jurisdictional power and authority to so act, then the judgment of the superior court herein should be reversed. We think that the decision in S. P. R. R. Co. v. Jackson Oil Co., 164 Cal. 392, 129 Pac.

276, is authority to the effect that the department was without power to repudiate the finality of its former decisions. The United States government, by its duly authorized agents, on March 26, 1902, declared that the title to this land then was in appellant. Certainly the matter was then finally settled and closed in favor of appellant, not only against Bruns, but also as against the United States. The effect of that decision was that the title of appellant had become vested, to the very land in question here, from and after the 25th day of January, 1896. Thereafter, there being no further appeal, that proceeding became final and complete. It is appropriate to say here, as was said in the Jackson Case, "no further departmental interference was legally possible." It results that the respondent's claim of title under its patent must yield to the prior title of appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

JENSEN v. CORNING FARMS CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 28, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑86—Evidence sustained finding buyer had expressed intention to abandon contract.

On evidence showing that plaintiff orally announced his intention to abandon his contract to purchase realty, and notified the sellers in writing of his intention, a refusal which he admitted and repeated on trial, the trial court was justified in finding that plaintiff intended to abandon the contract and had expressed such intent prior to defendant sellers' notification to him that they had terminated the contract.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101, 335—Buyer refusing to perform not entitled to notice allowing further time nor to recover payments before abandonment.

Where the buyer of realty abandoned his contract and expressly refused to perform, he was not entitled, as a condition to forfeiture of payments made, to notice from the sellers allowing him further time to perform, and was not entitled to recover payments made by him on his contract prior to his expressed abandonment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Henry J. Jensen against the Corning Farms Company and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. W. Hughes, of Corning, and W. A. Fish, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff as the vendee under a contract for the sale of real property to recover from the defendant Corning Farms Company, a corporation, the amount paid by the plaintiff to said defendant under the terms of said contract after the same had been terminated by the vendor for the alleged failure of the vendee to make certain installment payments due upon the purchase price of said property, according to the terms of said contract.

The amended complaint was in two counts, the first of which set forth the contract in hæc verba and alleged the making of the payments thereunder for the recovery of which the suit was brought, and further alleging a mutual cancellation, termination, and rescission of said contract. The second count was in the form of the common counts for money had and received by the defendants to and for the plaintiff's use. The defendants in their answer admitted the making of the contract and the payment of the sums alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff thereunder; but they denied that said contract was canceled, terminated, or rescinded by mutual consent, and in that respect affirmatively averred that the plaintiff, after having made repeated defaults in the payment of the installments due upon said contract, had wholly abandoned any intention to carry out or fulfill the terms of the same, and had notified said defendants of his said intent, and that it was only after such repeated defaults and such express notification of the plaintiff's intent to abandon said contract and refuse to fulfill its terms that said defendants had proceeded to terminate the same by giving notice of such termination to plaintiff.

Upon the trial and submission of the cause the court made its findings of fact, in which, after finding that the plaintiff had made the payments alleged to have been made by him aggregating the sum of $6,142.58, it proceeded to expressly find that the plaintiff, after a series of defaults in making the installment payments due under the terms of said contract, had notified and informed the defendants that he did not intend to and that he refused to carry out said contract, and that he had permanently abandoned all intention to perform the same, and that thereafter the defendants had terminated the same by notice to the plaintiff as averred in their said answer. Thereupon the trial court ordered judgment entered in favor of the defendants, and it is from such judgment that the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiff had abandoned said contract prior to the defendants' termination of the same by notice. After an examination of the evidence in the case we are satisfied that there is no merit in this contention, since the evidence sufficiently shows that the plaintiff not only orally announced his intention to abandon said contract, and notified the defendants in writing of his said intention, but that he also, and when upon the witness stand during the trial of the cause, admitted and repeated his refusal to further perform the terms of said contract. The trial court was therefor justified in finding that such an intention existed and had been expressed on the part of said plaintiff prior to the defendants' notification to him that they had terminated said contract.

[2] The next and main contention of the appellant is that, notwithstanding his repeated defaults in making the payments required by the terms of said contract, and notwithstanding his expression of an intent to abandon the same, the defendants were not entitled to terminate said contract and thereby work a forfeiture of the payments which the plaintiff had theretofore made upon it without first giving to said plaintiff a notice granting him a reasonable time within which to make said payments and otherwise perform the terms of said contract, before exercising their asserted right to terminate the same and to forfeit the payments which the plaintiff had made thereunder. In making this contention the appellant relies upon the case of Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751, Pearson v. Brown, 27 Cal. App. 125, 148 Pac. 956, and the later line of decisions of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal upholding the doctrine declared in these cases. The respondents concede the correctness of the principles enunciated in the foregoing cases, but contend that they have no application to the facts of the case at bar, for the reason that, while in each of those cases the vendee was in default in making the installment payments required under his contract, the vendors, having finally accepted such delayed payments when made, had thereby waived their right to terminate the contract without first giving to the vendee a reasonable time within which to perform the same. In the case at bar the added fact had been proven that the vendee, in addition to his repeated defaults, had expressly notified the vendor of his intention not to perform further the terms of his contract, and by such notification had rendered the giving of further time for such performance an idle and useless act; and, having done so, the vendee was not now entitled to have the vendor perform said idle and useless act before terminating said contract on its part.

We are of the opinion that the authorities sustain the respondents' contention in this regard. In the early case of Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 278, the rule is laid down that, where a vendee makes known to the vendor that he does not intend to perform the covenants of a contract by him to be performed, the vendor is not bound to do that which would amount to an idle and useless act, in view of the vendee's attitude in respect to the performance on his part of said agreement. This case was cited with approval in the recent case of Lemle v. Barry, 183 Pac. 150, wherein the doctrine was reaffirmed that, where one party to a contract had given the other notice in advance of his intention not to perform the same, the other party was absolved from the necessity of doing those things which otherwise would be required in order to work a termination on its part of the agreement.

In the case of Andrews v. Karl, 183 Pac. 838, the appellate court reviewed the cases relied upon by the appellant herein, and, after doing so, declared it to be the rule that—

> "Where a vendee in possession, neither performing nor willing to perform, has absolutely refused to complete the contract, he may be treated as one who has abandoned the contract under which he entered, and the vendor, by an action in ejectment, may recover the possession. The willful refusal of a vendee to perform his agreement amounts to an abandonment of the contract by him, and a repudiated contract is no protection to a vendee in possession against the legal title."

It is true that the court in that case also held that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the vendor's claim that the vendee had abandoned the contract; but this does not militate against the correctness of the rule announced therein upon a full review of the authorities touching the subject.

In the light of these decisions we are of the opinion that the conclusion of the trial court was correct, and that the said plaintiff, having on his part abandoned his contract, and expressly refused to perform the same, was not entitled to a notice from the vendor allowing him further time to perform that which he had expressly notified said vendor he did not intend to perform, and hence that he was not entitled to recover the payments made by him upon said contract prior to his express abandonment of the same.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

LINDLEY v. LINDLEY. (Civ. 3283.)

1. Process ⟹165—Court may authorize filing of affidavit of mailing to nonresident on motion to vacate decree.

Where, in a divorce action, a copy of the complaint and summons was mailed to the nonresident defendant as ordered by the court, and the interlocutory decree so recited, the court had authority to permit the filing of an affidavit of mailing on defendant's motion to vacate the decree and set aside his default for want of service.

2. Process ⟹165—Affidavit of mailing filed by permission on motion to set aside default supports decree.

Where, in a divorce action, a copy of the complaint and summons was mailed to the nonresident defendant, and the interlocutory decree so recited, affidavits of mailing filed by permission of the court on the hearing of a motion to vacate defendant's default supported the decree as though of record before its entry, for the court's jurisdiction to render the interlocutory decree did not depend upon proof of service, but on the fact that service had been made.

3. Appeal and error ⟹865—Sufficiency of evidence may not be raised by appeal from an order refusing to vacate default.

The objection that the evidence in a divorce suit was not sufficient to establish the jurisdictional fact of plaintiff's residence should have been raised on an appeal from the judgment, and not on appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to set aside his default and vacate the decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action for divorce by Cecil Lindley against Scott Lindley. From an order denying a motion to vacate and set aside defendant's default, and the interlocutory decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff sought and obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce. Service on the defendant, a nonresident, was by publication. Less than six months after the entry of the decree the defendant made a motion, supported by an affidavit of facts, an affidavit of merits, and his proposed answer, to vacate and set aside the default and the interlocutory decree, and for permission to answer. The court denied the motion, and from that order the defendant appeals on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] Only one question requiring consideration is presented. The defendant was a resident of the state of Missouri, and the court made an order that a copy of the complaint and summons be mailed to him at his last-known place of residence as set forth in plaintiff's affidavit for publication. The order was complied with, but no affidavit of the fact was made or filed. In due time the court entered the default of the defendant for failing to appear, and granted the interlocutory decree of divorce, which, among other recitals, contained a finding "that summons had been served upon the defendant by publication in the manner, and for the period of time, required by law." The defendant in his affidavit alleged that "no complaint or summons was ever served upon" him. His contention is that the court never acquired jurisdiction of his person, and that the interlocutory decree of divorce entered was a nullity. It is not necessary to discuss the sufficiency of the averment of nonservice, which is but a conclusion of law, for the uncontradicted record is that the summons was published for the required length of time, and that the copy of the complaint and summons was duly mailed to the defendant, addressed to him at his home address. Due proof of the mailing, which had not been filed prior to the granting of the interlocutory decree, was made, by permission of the lower court, at the time of the hearing of the motion to vacate and set aside the default.

The recital in the decree that the defendant was duly served with process is consistent with the facts, and the court had authority to permit the filing of the affidavit of mailing in support of the service. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 220, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 601, 29 Pac. 220. Jurisdiction did not depend upon the proof of service, but upon the fact that service had been made. When the affidavits of mailing were filed, they supported the decree as fully as though of record before its entry. Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509, 42 Am. St. Rep. 145; Heinlen v. Heilbron, 94 Cal. 636, 30 Pac. 8; La Fetra v. Gleason, 101 Cal. 246, 35 Pac. 765; Bank of Orland v. Dodson, 127 Cal. 208, 59 Pac. 584, 78 Am. St. Rep. 42.

[3] The objection that the evidence in the divorce proceeding was not sufficient to establish the jurisdictional fact of plaintiff's residence is one which should have been raised on an appeal from the judgment. However, the plaintiff testified that she had lived in the city of San Francisco and state of California "going on three years." She was fully corroborated by her sister, a witness in her behalf, who testified that she had so resided for "almost three years."

As the sole ground of the motion to set aside the interlocutory decree was the alleged want of jurisdiction, the lower court's ruling was correct.

The order is affirmed.

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑125(2)—No damages recoverable for breach of oral contract to purchase land.

Where there was no contract or memorandum in writing subscribed by purchaser of land or by its agents thereunto authorized in writing, there was no contract, and there could be no recovery of damages for breach thereof under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑129(5)—Payment of purchase price of land does not constitute part performance.

Payment of purchase price of land does not of itself constitute part performance under the statute.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑129(1)—Part performance only considered for purpose of relief in equity.

Part performance by one contracting to purchase land does not withdraw the transaction from the effect of the statute, except for the purpose of relief in equity, under Civ. Code, § 1741.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑125(2)—Where equitable relief was denied and damages awarded, action must be treated as one at law.

Where an action was brought to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase land, and equitable relief was denied, and the only judgment against defendant was a judgment awarding damages for breach of contract, and the defendant appealed, the action for the purpose of the appeal must be treated as one at law in which part performance on the part of defendant would not warrant awarding of damages for breach of contract.

5. Frauds, statute of 🔑118(4)—Letters and other documents held not sufficient as contract to purchase of land.

Documents consisting of letters, checks, options, and lease held insufficient under the statute to sustain any finding of fact to the effect that a contract to purchase land was made by the defendant.

6. Trial 🔑60(2)—Writing signed by agent inadmissible in absence of showing of written authority.

Writings signed by an agent of defendant are inadmissible in evidence to show that defendant contracted to purchase land unless it is first shown that such agent was thereunto authorized in writing signed by defendant.

7. Corporations 🔑410—President has no authority to contract to purchase lands.

The fact that one contracting to purchase land in behalf of a corporation was president of such corporation is not alone sufficient to show that he was authorized to enter into such contract.

Action by Alphonsine Matheron against the Ramina Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Evans, Abbott & Pearce and Arthur J. Abbott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action wherein the plaintiff seeks to compel specific performance of an alleged contract of date October 10, 1916, for the purchase by the defendant of 298 acres of land in Kern county, and to compel payment of $8,000, the alleged purchase price. Judgment was entered denying specific performance, but at the same time awarding to plaintiff the sum of $3,000 damages for nonperformance of the contract. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

[1] Appellant presents this appeal upon several grounds, the first of which alone, if sustained, is sufficient to determine the result of the action. This is that the judgment should be reversed because there is no evidence of any contract or memorandum in writing subscribed by appellant or by its agent thereunto authorized in writing. If there is no such evidence, then there was no contract, and there can be neither breach nor consequent damages. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5. Respondent contends that the contract is evidenced by a series of writings which, taken together, comply with the requirements of the statute of frauds. It will be necessary to refer briefly to this series of documents.

The first is a memorandum of lease, dated October 1, 1914, between the plaintiff and one J. W. Jennings, which was signed by these persons, and reads as follows:

> "Received of J. W. Jennings, of Tehachapi, Kern county, Cal., the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00) as full payment for the first year's lease on 240 acres of land near Oak creek, Kern county, Cal. The said lease is to run two years at two hundred dollars per year payable in advance and that J. W. Jennings has the option to buy the said land at any time during this lease at a price to be mutually agreed upon, but said price not to exceed eight thousand dollars."

The second is a document of date September 28, 1916, signed by the plaintiff alone, which reads as follows:

"Bakersfield, Cal. Received through James F. Farraher two hundred fifty dollars on account acceptance of option to J. W. Jennings of Tehachapi, Calif., on October 1, 1914, giving right to purchase my land on Oak creek, Kern county, Cal., embracing the west half of section 32, township 12 north, range 14 west, S. B. M., and containing 297.89 acres, 50% of the purchase price of $8,000.00, less the $250.00 paid this day, to be paid on or before 30 days from date. The balance of said purchase price to be due and payable on or before one year from date. Deed of grant therefor to be executed and delivered in escrow to the First National Bank of Bakersfield, Cal. Vendee or successor to have privilege, on payment of 50% of said purchase price as stated, of receiving deed upon execution and delivery of mortgage to said vendor covering the 50% of purchase price unpaid and drawing interest at the rate of 6% per annum. Title to be fee simple and free of incumbrances. Abstract of title to be delivered to vendee within ten days from date. Dated September 28, 1916. Alphonsine Matheron. Marion H. Damon, Witness."

The third is a document dated October 10, 1916, which was deposited with the First National Bank of Bakersfield by James F. Farraher, is signed by the plaintiff alone, and reads as follows:

"First National Bank, Bakersfield, Cal.: You will please receive as an escrow the within and accompanying deed to Ramina Corporation which bears date October 10, 1916, and purports to grant the west half of sec. 32, township 12 N., range 14 W., S. B. M., in Kern County, Cal., containing 297.89 acres, and hold and deliver the same to J. W. Jennings either upon payment to you for my account and credit of the sum of seven thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($7,750.00) in cash or upon the payment of three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($3,750.00) in cash for my credit and the delivery to you for me of a promissory note and mortgage on said property for the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000.00), said mortgage to be accompanied by approval in writing of F. E. Borton as to form, provided said sum of seven thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($7,750.00) or the said sum of three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($3,750) and delivery of said note and mortgage are made to you on or before the 1st day of November, 1916, and within banking hours on said date. Otherwise on demand after said 1st day of November, 1916, shall be returned to me. Interest on note at 6 per cent. semiannually. Note due November 1st, 1917. Witness my hand this 10th day of October, 1916. Alphonsine Matheron."

The fourth is an undated document signed by the plaintiff alone, which was delivered to the escrow holder, and reads as follows:

"First National Bank, City—Gentlemen: In modification of escrow instructions given you under date of October 10, 1916, I beg to advise you that said instructions are modified so as to permit, and you are hereby authorized to deliver my deed or deeds as individual owner, and my deed as guardian of the estates of my minor children, Henry, Blanche and Emile Matheron, to the Ramina Corporation providing considerations are paid or delivered to you as specified in said former instructions on or before the 23rd day of December, 1916. And you are hereby authorized to forward said deeds to Los Angeles Title Insurance Company, at 624 South Spring street, Los Angeles, for delivery by them upon payment of said consideration. Alphonsine Matheron. Witness: Louis V. Olcese."

The fifth is a check which reads as follows:

"Ramina Corporation. No. 744. Santa Monica, Cal., Oct. 20, 1916. Pay to the order of First National Bank of Bakersfield $3,750.00, thirty-seven hundred fifty no/100 dollars. Ramina Corporation, by Robert K. Walton. To the Bank of Santa Monica Commercial Savings, Santa Monica, Cal. Alphonsine Matheron escrow with Ramina Corporation."

It is in evidence that Robert K. Walton was president of the defendant corporation; that this check was received by the First National Bank of Bakersfield and collected by that bank. The words "Alphonsine Matheron escrow with Ramina Corporation," at the bottom of the check, were written in ink. The testimony is silent as to the person by whom these words were written on the check, but we shall assume for the purposes of the argument that they were written by Mr. Walton.

[2-4] According to the undisputed testimony of the secretary of defendant, the minutes of the Ramina Corporation show absolutely nothing relative to this transaction. There is no evidence that the defendant was ever in possession of the land, or that anything in the nature of part performance of the alleged contract has taken place. Payment of the purchase price does not of itself constitute part performance. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 131, 113 Pac. 147. Moreover, part performance does not withdraw a transaction of this kind from the effect of the statute of frauds, except for the purposes of relief in equity. Civ. Code, § 1741. Since in this action equitable relief was denied and the only judgment against appellant is a judgment awarding damages for breach of contract, the action, for the purposes of this appeal, must be treated as an action at law.

[5-7] From the documents hereinabove set forth it appears that the plaintiff on September 28, 1916, received the sum of $250 "on account acceptance" of the option theretofore granted by her to J. W. Jennings. She stipulated that her deed was to be delivered in escrow to the First National Bank of Bakersfield, "vendee or successor" to have the privilege of receiving deed upon payment of half of the purchase price and upon execution and delivery of mortgage to the vendor for the remainder of the purchase price. There is no evidence of any assignment made by the vendee of his rights under the contract, and it is perfectly clear that the vendee intended in the document was J. W. Jennings. It further appears that when the deed was placed in escrow it was made as a deed to Ramina Corporation. The fact that this was done and that Ramina Corporation deposited the sum of $3,750 with the bank, with the notation on the check as stated, "Alphonsine Matheron escrow with Ramina Corporation," is not of itself sufficient to prove, and in fact does not by itself even tend to prove, any substitution of Ramina Corporation for J. W. Jennings as purchaser under the contract. The money advanced might have been a loan to Jennings, or pursuant to any other agreement between Jennings and Ramina Corporation by which the title was to rest in the name of the corporation instead of the name of Jennings. The documents to which we have referred are insufficient to sustain any finding of fact to the effect that the contract of purchase was made by the defendant. This defect in evidence of a contract in writing signed by the party to be charged cannot be supplied by oral evidence, or by evidence of writings signed by an agent of defendant, unless it is first shown that such agent was thereunto authorized in writing signed by the party to be charged. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a letter of date October 23, 1916, written by Farraher, to plaintiff, and another letter dated February 15, 1917, written to the First National Bank of Bakersfield by "Evans, Abbott & Pearce, by Arthur J. Abbott, Attorneys for Ramina Corporation." There is no evidence that either Farraher or Jennings or said attorneys for Ramina Corporation ever received any authority in writing from the defendant to make or to ratify any contract of defendant corporation with the plaintiff. The same observation applies to Robert K. Walton. The evidence shows that he was president of the corporation, but that fact, which stands alone, is not sufficient to show that he was authorized to enter into a contract on behalf of the corporation for the purchase of lands. All of these documents were received in evidence over objections constantly made by the defendant.

PEOPLE v. COLUMBUS. (Cr. 735.)

1. Criminal law 🔑736(2)—Whether confession was voluntary is question for judge.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2101, 2102, the question whether offered evidence is admissible is a question for decision by the judge not for submission to the jury, even though the determination of that question involves a decision on conflicting evidence as to whether a confession by accused was voluntary.

2. Criminal law 🔑531(4)—Exclusion of evidence confession was not voluntary before confession was admitted is error.

In a prosecution for crime where the state offered a confession by accused after testimony by the officers to whom it was made that it was voluntary, it was error for the court to refuse to hear defendant's testimony that the confession was obtained by duress and threats before admitting the confession in evidence.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Exclusion of preliminary evidence confession was involuntary held to require reversal.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal for technical error, does not prevent reversal of a conviction for error in refusing to permit accused to testify the confession offered against him was not voluntary before the confession was admitted in evidence, where the entire cause does not enable the appellate court to determine whether the confession would have been excluded if defendant's testimony had been heard before ruling thereon, nor whether the jury would have convicted defendant if the confession had not been admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

James Columbus was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

LeRoy D. Barnett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for new trial. The evidence tending to establish his guilt consists of the direct testimony of a little girl, five years of age, and his own written, signed confession, made by him at the police station on the evening of the alleged crime, in the presence of a number of police officers. The prosecution's preliminary evidence upon the admissibility of the confession, as the free and voluntary act of the accused, consists of the testimony of two police officers who testified that defendant made his confession freely and voluntarily. Upon the introduction of this preliminary evidence, the district attorney offered the confession in evidence. To this offer defendant objected; his counsel stating that he wanted to put the defendant himself upon the stand, before the document was read in evidence, to testify in regard to the circumstances under which he claimed the confession was made. Defendant's announced purpose was to contradict the testimony of the two police officers that the confession had been given freely and voluntarily, by testifying that it was procured through fear, induced by the threatening manner and the violent language of the officers by whom he was surrounded when he agreed to make a confession. The objection was overruled, and the confession read in evidence.

[1] The question of the confession's admissibility as the free and voluntary act of the accused was one for the determination of the judge only.

"When a confession is offered against a defendant on trial, and he objects to it, and offers to prove that it was procured by threats or promises, or under such circumstances as would render it incompetent, it is error to receive the confession without first hearing the proof offered and ruling upon the competency of the confession as evidence against the party making it." People v. Gibson, 28 Cal. App. 334, 152 Pac. 316.

Sections 2101 and 2102 of the Code of Civil Procedure read:

"Sec. 2101. All questions of fact, where the trial is by jury, other than those mentioned in the next section, are to be decided by the jury, and all evidence thereon is to be addressed to them, except when otherwise provided by this Code.

"Sec. 2102. All questions of law, including the admissibility of testimony, the facts preliminary to such admission, and the construction of statutes and other writings, and other rules of evidence, are to be decided by the court, and all discussions of law addressed to it. Whenever the knowledge of the court is, by this code, made evidence of a fact, the court is to declare such knowledge to the jury, who are bound to accept it."

[2] The section last quoted (2102) is a legislative recognition of the rule that, when the admissibility of any evidence depends upon a collateral fact, it is for the judge to pass upon such collateral fact in the first instance. It is expressly made the duty of the judge to pass upon all questions of fact the determination of which is a necessary preliminary to the admissibility of any testimony. The jurors are sworn and impaneled to try the issues joined between the people and the prisoner, and are not sworn or impaneled to try collateral matters preliminary to the admissibility of evidence. The duty of passing upon the facts preliminary to the admissibility of evidence is often very embarrassing, particularly where there is a conflict of testimony. This duty, nevertheless, must be discharged by the judge, and by him only. In the case of confessions, the evil of allowing the jury to pass upon a conflict in the evidence upon the collateral question as to whether the confession was or was not the free and voluntary act of the accused is this: If the confession be permitted to be given in evidence before the judge, after due consideration of all the evidence for and against its voluntary character, is satisfied that it was voluntarily made, it may be difficult for the jurors, in deciding the question of admissibility, i. e., whether it was voluntarily made or not, to be wholly uninfluenced by the confession itself, which, unless it be admissible, they ought not to hear or consider. State v. Andrews, 61 N. C. 207, 208; Nicholson v. State, 38 Md. 156–157. We are satisfied that the refusal to permit the defendant, before the confession was read to the jurors as evidence in the case, to introduce his evidence of the circumstances under which it was made, was prejudicial error. People v. Gibson, supra; People v. Cahill, 11 Cal. App. 685–691, 106 Pac. 115; State v. Sherman, 35 Mont. 512, 90 Pac. 981, 119 Am. St. Rep. 869; note to Ammons v. State, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 778 et seq.

[3] The salutary provision of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution cannot successfully be invoked to uphold the judgment. After a most careful consideration of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are unable to determine whether the trial judge would or would not have excluded the confession had he heard defendant's testimony before ruling upon its admissibility; nor are we able to say whether the jury would or would not have convicted the defendant if the erroneously admitted confession had been excluded from their consideration. This being so, we do not feel that section 4½ can aid the judgment. See People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 226, 146 Pac. 522; also, People v. Gibson, supra.

The judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Brokers 🔑86(4) — Evidence held to show plaintiff brokers did not consummate sale.

Evidence held to support finding that plaintiff brokers did not consummate the sale for which they claimed commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by D. H. Kash and another against B. Paule. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Tackaberry, of Reedley, for appellants.

Harris & Harris, of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant, after motion for a new trial made and denied. The action is one to recover commissions claimed to be due under a written instrument, which, it is alleged, appointed plaintiffs exclusive agents to sell certain real and personal property of the defendant. It is further alleged that pursuant to the agreement the plaintiffs procured purchasers ready, willing, and able to, and who did actually, purchase the real property for the sum of $15,500. The court found these allegations to be untrue. In seeking a reversal, appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the judgment, and that the decision is against law.

Plaintiffs were engaged in the real estate business, and Mr. Besoyan was engaged in the same kind of business in a neighboring town. They sometimes worked together, and frequently exchanged lists of available properties. On May 13, 1919, the defendant, B. Paule, one of the owners, by an instrument in writing, appointed plaintiffs as agents to sell the real property, together with certain personal property located thereon, all for the sum of $15,500, on terms specified, agreeing to pay them 5 per cent. commission on the selling price. This authorization was to remain in full force and effect for eight days, and thereafter until revoked by the defendant in writing. Appellants contend that they were appointed the exclusive agents to sell the property, but there is nothing in the writing that warrants the contention.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

In arriving at a solution of the tangle arising out of the sale of the property, much depends upon the connection the real estate agent Besoyan had with it. The testimony is confused and contradictory as to the time when Mr. Besoyan first came into the transaction. Mr. Paule, one of the owners of the ranch, testified that he told Besoyan the property was for sale on May 24th, and that Besoyan returned the next day with Mr. Furlong, and the day following with Hardison, the two purchasers of the place. There is other evidence tending to corroborate this view. Newton, one of the plaintiffs, testified that on June 1st Besoyan obtained from plaintiffs a listing of the property, and that the plaintiffs took Besoyan and "his buyer" to see the place. Besoyan testified that he first learned the place was for sale about June 1st, from the plaintiffs, when he "took a couple of buyers" to see it. The property was ultimately purchased by Hardison and Furlong, and it clearly appears that Besoyan first took them to inspect the property. There is no doubt that they first learned that the property was for sale through him. Besoyan stated to them that the price of the property was $16,000. Hardison and Furlong offered $15,500, which was refused. Shortly after this, Hardison and Furlong learned through another agent, Glidden, that the property could still be purchased for $15,500. Feeling that they were under obligations to Besoyan, they then returned to him, informed him that they had learned the property could be had at the lesser figure, and again offered him a chance to make the sale on those terms. Besoyan's reply was: "Go to it, if you can. I can't do it." They thereupon completed negotiations, and effected the sale through Glidden. The buyers do not appear to have known the plaintiffs in the transaction at all, and had no dealings with them.

It is the respondent's theory of the case that Besoyan was acting in his own behalf, and in his individual capacity as agent, in the transaction. The trial court accepted this view, for it expressly found that the plaintiffs did not consummate the sale.

The judgment is affirmed.

KING v. CLINE, Sheriff. (Civ. 3319.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 28, 1920.)

1. Evidence 🔑471(29)—Question as to understanding of another with his servants held to call for a conclusion.

In an action for wrongful attachment in connection with an employer's action against an employee for damages to a truck driven by him, a question as to whether the witness was acquainted with the employer's understanding with its men regarding the handling of its property was properly excluded as calling for a conclusion.

2. Master and servant 🔑66—Employee's obligation to carefully handle employer's property implied and need not be proved.

A question as to an employer's understanding with its men in regard to the handling of its property, asked for the purpose of showing an employee's obligation to carefully and skillfully manage a motor truck driven by him, was properly excluded, as such obligation was implied on proof of the employment.

3. Attachment 🔑4—Action must be for money due under obligations of contract.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, authorizing issuance of writ of attachment in an action on contract express or implied for the direct payment of money, the money claimed must be due under the contract by reason of the express or implied obligations cast upon the party sought to be charged.

4. Attachment 🔑7—Employer's action against employee damaging property by negligence does not warrant attachment.

An employer's action against an employee for damages to a truck driven by him through his negligence is not an action for money due under the contract of employment so as to warrant an attachment under Code Civ. Proc. § 537; the action being one for damages which were contingent upon the employee's failure to perform his contract.

5. Sales 🔑476—Vendor under conditional sale entitled to recover property or its value when payment overdue and attachment not released.

Where a payment under a conditional sale contract was overdue when the property was attached as property of the vendee and the contract authorized the vendor to retake possession after default in payment or in any other condition of the agreement and required the vendee to release any attachment within three days, which was not done, the vendor or his successor was entitled, as against the vendee, to recover the property or its value at the time possession was demanded of the sheriff.

6. Sales 🔑480(6)—Attachment of property as property of conditional vendee held a conversion.

Assuming that one attaching property sold by a conditional contract of sale as the property of the vendee may be placed in the shoes of the vendee upon tendering performance, the vendor's assignee was nevertheless entitled to recover as for a conversion, where the attaching creditor never tendered performance of the money due under the contract and the sheriff when sued for conversion denied the assignee's right and alleged title to be in the vendee.

7. Sales ⚷475 — Assignment by conditional vendor of automobile not invalid for failure to comply with statute as to registration.

Where an automobile sold by a contract of conditional sale was registered in the name of the vendee and was attached as his property and the sheriff had possession of the automobile and presumably of the certificate of registration when the vendor assigned his rights under the contract, there was a good transfer of his interest, though the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act as to registration and transfer of the registration were not complied with.

8. Sales ⚷479(1)—Vendor on default of conditional vendee entitled to possession and not limited to recovery of balance due from one converting property.

Where the vendee of an automobile under a contract of conditional sale was in default when the automobile was attached as his property and did not have the attachment released within three days as required by the contract, one to whom the vendor assigned his rights was entitled to the possession in order that he might proceed as authorized by the law and the contract, and was not limited to a recovery of the balance due under the contract of sale in an action against the sheriff for conversion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by A. M. King against John C. Cline, Sheriff of Los Angeles County, Cal., for damages for conversion of an automobile. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. T. Lightfoot, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered against him for damages arising by reason of the alleged conversion of an automobile taken by him under attachment in a suit of the Union Oil Company against Parsons. The latter action grew out of the relation of employee and employer which had existed respectively between Parsons and the Union Oil Company. Parsons, while employed by the oil company as a truck driver, became intoxicated and so negligently handled the machine under his control as to greatly damage it. The oil company brought the action for damages for the alleged breach of duty, and in that action procured a writ of attachment and caused it to be levied upon an automobile then in the possession of Parsons. This automobile was being purchased from one Cook under a conditional sale contract which reserved title in the seller, and the purchase payments had not at that time been all made. After the attachment was levied, being apprised of this latter situation, Cook was approached by representatives of the oil company and asked what the balance due from Parsons was and whether he would accept the same from the oil company. Cook had at this time filed with the sheriff a third-party claim, demanding the release of the automobile from the attachment on the ground that he was the owner thereof. Cook informed the oil company in effect that he would consider the matter, and soon thereafter he made an assignment of his interest in the contract and automobile to the plaintiff King. King renewed a claim for the automobile in his own behalf to the sheriff and the sheriff refused to release the same, and King then brought this action for conversion and obtained judgment.

[1-4] Appellant makes several contentions as ground for reversal. It is insisted first that the court erred in sustaining an objection to a question asked of a witness, the question being as follows:

> "Are you acquainted with the understanding of the Union Oil Company with its men in regard to the handling of the Union Oil Company property?"

A general objection was interposed to the question and sustained by the court. Regardless of the matter which we will immediately call attention to, the objection was properly sustained for the reason that the question called for a conclusion of the witness and not for the facts as to what the contract was between the oil company and Parsons. Further than this, it is apparent that the whole purpose in asking the question was to show that the relations between Parsons and the oil company during the former's employment were such that Parsons assumed the obligation to carefully and skillfully manage and control the property of the company committed to his charge. Once admitting the employment, as to which there was no dispute, the condition sought to be proved would be implied. While the question as to the validity of the attachment is perhaps not properly presented here, in passing we express the view that the attachment was not authorized to be issued under the facts claimed. By section 537, Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that the writ of attachment may issue "in an action upon a contract express or implied, for the direct payment of money, where the contract is made or is payable in this state, and is not secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property. * * *" In order to authorize a writ of attachment to be issued, we think it clear that the money claimed in the suit must be due under the contract, by reason of the obligations, express or implied, which the contract casts upon the party sought to be charged. The action referred to was purely an action for damages which were contingent upon Parsons failing to perform his contract. In the sense of the section, the damages so sought to be recovered would not be "money due under the contract."

Appellant insists that King, standing merely in the shoes of Parsons' vendor and holding the original contract for the sale of the automobile as assignee thereof, could not claim the right to the machine until default had been committed on the part of Parsons in the making of payments and the right to the possession of the automobile had thereby become vested in the vendor.

[5-8] This action was commenced in the latter part of January, 1919. On January 2, 1919, a payment on the automobile was due to the vendor from the vendee. Plaintiff testified that shortly after the payment became due he notified the vendee of the fact. The contract of sale gave the right to the vendor to retake possession of the machine after default in the making of payments or default as to any other condition of the agreement. One of the stipulations was that the vendee should procure the release of any attachment levied against the automobile within three days. We think it clear that even as against the vendee the vendor or his successor was in a position to recover the automobile or its value at the time possession was demanded of the sheriff on the part of plaintiff. Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 468, 101 Pac. 299. The opinion in Morris v. Allen, 17 Cal. App. 684 (121 Pac. 690), contains the following statement of the law, sustained by authorities cited:

> "While it may be true that the vendee under a contract of conditional sale acquired a defeasible interest in the property sold, which, before default, he may sell or assign, nevertheless he has no attachable interest in the property until such time as he has fully complied with the condition concerning payment of the purchase price."

Admitting that this law is subject to modification, and that an attaching creditor may be placed in the shoes of the vendee upon tendering performance of all obligations existing against the vendee, the evidence fails to sustain such a condition of facts here. Defendant made no formal tender of the money due under the contract, to plaintiff. He denied in his answer any right in the plaintiff to assert any quality of title, and alleged that the automobile was the property of Parsons, the vendee. The case last above cited was somewhat similar in its facts on this point to the case here, and the court held that under such a condition of the pleadings the claim of the vendee's creditor that he should by the judgment be subrogated to the rights of the vendee was without merit. That the formalities regarding the registration of the machine under the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397), and the transfer of such registration, were not complied with, under the particular facts of this case, will not, we think, diminish the right of the plaintiff to his judgment. The machine had been registered in the name of the vendee; the defendant sheriff had possession of the vehicle and presumably possession of the certificate of registration which defendant insists should have been indorsed to plaintiff. That under such circumstances the vendor could make a good transfer of his interest in the automobile as was attempted, we think altogether consistent with the purpose and intent of the act in question. With that conclusion in mind it will be unnecessary to consider respondent's proposition that, if the act in terms prevents such a transfer, it invades constitutional rights. Nor should plaintiff have been limited, as defendant contends, to a recovery only of the balance due under the contract of sale. He possessed the right to have the automobile delivered to him that he might proceed as his contract and the law authorized him to do. He failed to secure the automobile, after demanding it, and was hence entitled to recover its value.

county of Alameda. The facts of the case, in so far as they are undisputed, may be briefly summarized as follows:

On the 10th day of June, 1915, one H. A. Thomas, while driving an automobile upon one of the streets in the city of Oakland, ran into and severely injured a minor named Marcellus Vermont Pearson, who was riding a bicycle along said street at the said time. Thereafter and on January 13, 1916, the said minor by his guardian ad litem commenced an action against said H. A. Thomas in the superior court of said county to recover damages for the injuries which said minor had sustained. That cause went to trial, with the result that on the 31st day of July, 1916, a judgment was rendered, entered, and docketed in favor of the plaintiff in that action for the sum of $1,000 and costs. Thereafter and on January 25, 1918, at the instance of said plaintiff, an execution was issued in said action, directed to the sheriff of said county, with instructions to levy upon the property of the defendant therein, and acting thereunder said sheriff levied said execution upon the real property involved in the present action, and on the 11th day of March, 1918, and after due and legal notice of the time and place of sale, sold all of the right, title, and interest of said H. A. Thomas in said real estate to one Frances Fowler, who was the highest bidder at said sale, for the sum of $1,179.12, and issued to said Frances Fowler his certificate of sale therein, which was duly recorded on the 12th day of March, 1918, in the office of the county recorder of said county. Thereafter and on the 21st day of December, 1918, said Frances Fowler transferred said certificate of sale to Lulu E. Jordan, as the guardian of said Marcellus Vermont Pearson, which transfer was also duly recorded; that, pursuant to said certificate of sale and of the transfer thereof, said Lulu E. Jordan, as said guardian of said minor, would on the 12th day of March, 1919, have been entitled to a deed from the said sheriff of the county of Alameda to all of the right, title, and interest of said H. A. Thomas in and to said real property. In order to prevent the said sheriff from proceeding with the execution of said deed, and to quiet the title of the plaintiffs herein against the effect of said judgment and execution sale, the present action was instituted. The chain of title upon which the plaintiffs herein rely to sustain this action is as follows:

On or about January 20, 1914, Priscilla Frances Thomas, being the owner of all of the premises involved in this action and of much other property, died testate in the county of Alameda, state of California. By the terms of her last will and testament she devised certain of her properties, including the premises in question, to certain trustees, with full power to mortgage and sell any and all portions of said trust property, and to apply the proceeds thereof to certain purposes declared in her said will. The trust thus created was to continue in force and effect during the natural life of her surviving husband, John H. Thomas, and upon his death the properties remaining in the hands of said trustees were to go to her five children share and share alike. At the time of the death of said Priscilla Frances Thomas there was an outstanding mortgage covering the property involved in this action and other properties in favor of George W. Cox and Louise Viola Cox (the latter a daughter of said decedent) for the sum of $10,650. Subsequent to the death of said decedent a settlement was brought about between the said children and heirs of said decedent and her surviving husband, John H. Thomas, by which the latter was given a portion of the property of said estate absolutely, and in consideration of which he released all claim to any interest in the balance of said estate. Thereafter and on August 28, 1917, the said John H. Thomas and all of the said heirs of said decedent, including H. A. Thomas and his wife, Hannah C. Thomas, and also the trustees of her said estate under said will, executed and delivered a deed to said George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox, his wife, covering the real estate described in said mortgage. In the meantime and on the 14th day of October, 1915, said H. A. Thomas had made, executed, and delivered to his wife, Hannah C. Thomas, a deed of gift to all of the property involved in the present action which would have constituted his share of the property of his deceased mother, which said deed of gift was recorded on February 2, 1916. Thereafter said George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox applied to the probate court in which the matter of the estate of said decedent was pending for a decree of distribution to them of the property described in said deed. Thereafter and on the 3d day of January, 1918, the said George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox conveyed the premises involved in this action to the plaintiffs herein, and thereafter and on September 30, 1918, commenced the present action to quiet their title against George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox, their grantors in said deed, and also against Marcellus Vermont Pearson and his guardian, Lulu E. Jordan; the object of said suit being to quiet the title of said plaintiffs against all of said defendants. The said plaintiffs a short time thereafter also commenced an action against Frank Barnett, as sheriff of the county of Alameda, and Lulu E. Jordan personally and as guardian ad litem of Marcellus Vermont Pearson, the object of said last-named action being to enjoin the said sheriff from the execution of a deed by him to said Lulu E. Jordan, as guardian ad litem of Marcellus Vermont Pearson, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the aforesaid execution sale.

The defendants George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox appeared in the present action, and filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiffs therein, and also against their codefendants, alleging that as to certain of the properties described in the complaint in this action they were still the owners thereof, and praying that as to such portion of said property their title be quieted both as against said plaintiffs and against their said codefendants. The other defendants herein also appeared to contest both the claims of the plaintiffs and of their codefendants, and to assert the validity of said execution sale and of the right of said Lulu E. Jordan, as guardian ad litem of Marcellus V. Pearson, to have the judgment obtained by her in said former action established, and her rights under said execution sale sustained as against whatever interest in said real estate the said plaintiffs through their said codefendants had secured in and to the interest of said H. A. Thomas in the estate and properties of his deceased mother, Priscilla Frances Thomas. In support of their said assertion the last-named defendants, both in their answer to the original complaint and to the cross-complaint of their codefendants, affirmatively averred that the aforesaid deed of gift from said H. A. Thomas to his wife Hannah C. Thomas was made without consideration and while the said H. A. Thomas was insolvent, and was made and executed by him for the sole purpose of defeating the effort of said Lulu E. Jordan, as guardian aforesaid, to obtain and enforce a judgment in favor of said Marcellus V. Pearson for damages for said injuries; and further alleging that, at the time said judgment was obtained and docketed and the said execution thereon issued and levied, the said H. A. Thomas was the owner of all of said property which had been derived by him from the estate of his deceased mother, and that as to such property the said Lulu E. Jordan, as guardian ad litem etc., was entitled to have her said judgment and execution thereof and sale thereof sustained.

Upon the trial and submission of the cause upon the issues thus framed, the trial court made its findings of fact wherein, after a recital of the foregoing facts relating to the chain of title to the several properties involved in the action, it proceeded to hold that as to the defendants and cross-complainants George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox they were entitled to a judgment quieting their title to the portion of said premises to which they asserted title in their answer and cross-complaint, both as against the plaintiffs herein and as against their codefendants Lulu E. Jordan, and Lulu E. Jordan as guardian ad litem of Marcellus V. Pearson. The trial court further proceeded to find that the said plaintiffs were entitled to have their title as to the remaining portion of the premises described in their complaint quieted as against all of said defendants. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox quieting their title as to the portion of the property claimed by them, and in favor of the plaintiffs quieting their title as to the remainder of said property as against all of said defendants. From this judgment the defendant Lulu E. Jordan, as guardian, etc., has prosecuted this appeal.

The sole question urged by said appellant upon this appeal relates to the correctness of the findings of the trial court with respect to the conveyance made by H. A. Thomas to his wife Hannah C. Thomas on October 14, 1915, which were in substance that said deed, although in form a deed of gift, was in truth and fact a transfer for a valuable consideration, conveying to said Hannah C. Thomas all of the right, title, and interest of said H. A. Thomas in and to his share of the estate of Priscilla Frances Thomas, deceased; and that said deed was not made for the purpose of defrauding said Marcellus V. Pearson or his guardian ad litem as to any rights existing in them or either of them by virtue of the injuries suffered by the former through the negligence of said H. A. Thomas and for which suit had not been commenced at the date of the execution of said deed. It is the appellants' contention that the evidence in the case is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court in the above regard, and hence that the judgment herein, in so far as it purports to quiet the title of both the plaintiffs and the cross-complainants herein to the properties covered by said execution sale should be reversed.

We have carefully examined the record in the case for the purpose of determining the merits of this contention; and without attempting to set it forth in detail we are of the opinion that there is ample evidence to support the findings of the trial court with respect to the validity of the conveyance from H. A. Thomas to his wife, Hannah C. Thomas. If said conveyance is to be held valid, it follows necessarily that the subsequent conveyance made on August 28, 1917, by the surviving husband and heirs of said Priscilla Frances Thomas, including H. A. Thomas and his wife, Hannah C. Thomas, and also including the trustees under the said will of said deceased, transferring the title of all of the premises affected by this action to George W. Cox and Louise V. Cox, is also beyond attack; and it further follows necessarily that whatever equities might exist as between the grantors and grantees of said deed other than said Hannah C. Thomas, the said grantees acquired whatever title she held by virtue of the conveyance from H. A. Thomas to her free and clear of any claim which the appellants herein as creditors of said H. A. Thomas might assert through the rendition of the judgment in their favor in the action for damages brought against him and through any levy or sale subsequently made thereunder.

In arriving at this conclusion we have not found it necessary to review the authorities which the appellants cite in support of their claim with respect to the fraudulent nature of the deed from H. A. Thomas to his wife, for the reason that, conceding said authorities to correctly state the law, the findings of the court to the effect that said deed was not fraudulent take the case out of the range of the appellants' said authorities.

The only error assigned by the appellants herein being that above disposed of, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. TRUITT. (Cr. 717.)

1. Robbery ⚷24(3)—Evidence held to establish identity.

In prosecution for robbery, notwithstanding alibi testimony of accused and his relatives, evidence held to identify accused as the person, who, by pointing his revolver at a druggist, took money from the latter's cash register.

2. Criminal law ⚷1159(3)—Conflicting evidence for the jury.

An argument based on the weight of admittedly conflicting evidence will not be considered by an appellate court in reviewing the jury's conclusions; such court's jurisdiction, in such cases as robbery trials, being confined to questions of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

J. W. Truitt was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. T. Chapman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery. His appeal presents the single question whether the evidence is sufficient to identify him as the person who committed the crime. It is conceded that the robbery was committed by some one.

[1] On the evening of December 12, 1919, a person identified by Robert E. Sherman, the complaining witness, as this defendant, entered Sherman's drug store at 4300 Pasadena avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, and asked Sherman to sell him a small quantity of carbolic acid. While in the back part of his drug store, at the prescription case, engaged in filling the order for carbolic acid, Sherman heard the bell on the cash register ring. Concluding therefrom that some one was trying to rifle the register, Sherman hurriedly returned to the front part of the store. There, so Sherman testified, he was confronted by defendant. Sherman testified that defendant presented a revolver at him just as he returned from the rear of his store, and ordered him to turn around and go back to the prescription case and stay there. Sherman further testified that, as he turned to go back to the prescription case, in obedience to defendant's command, he saw the defendant take $11 in paper money from the cash register. In his identification of defendant as the person who entered the store and took the money from the register, Sherman, who was quite positive in his testimony, was corroborated by his wife, who testified that she fired two shots at the robber as he was walking from the store, and that, as she fired the second shot, the robber, who was then going out of the door, turned around and looked directly at her. She testified that she got a good look at him. She swore positively that defendant is the man at whom she fired the shots.

Defendant, his wife, sister, and brother-in-law testified that, at the time when the robbery was committed, defendant and wife were visiting his sister at the latter's home several miles distant from the drug store where the robbery occurred. This testimony, if believed by the jury, would establish a complete alibi. The substance of appellant's contention is that the testimony given by himself and relatives to establish an alibi was not overcome by that of Mr. and Mrs. Sherman identifying him as the person who entered the drug store and took the money from the cash register. The substance of the argument advanced in support of this claim is that it is not probable that either Mr. or Mrs. Sherman, in the excitement of the moment, would pay such heed to the features of the robber that either could identify him at the time of the trial. This, and certain alleged discrepancies in the testimony of the prosecution's witnesses, constitute the sole reason for the appeal.

[2] Appellant's contention is addressed wholly to the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence—matters respecting which the jurors are the sole judges. It is too thoroughly settled to require citation of authority that an argument based on the weight of evidence which is admittedly conflicting will not be considered by an appellate court in reviewing the conclusions of the jury. Our appellate jurisdiction in these cases is confined to questions of law. The futility of urging this court to hold, as a matter of law, that the jury was not justified in finding against defendant on his claim of an alibi and in reaching the conclusion that he was the identical person who entered the drug store and stole the $11 from the cash register, must be apparent from the evidence as we have summarized it. The appeal is devoid of all merit.

Judgment affirmed.

HALL v. ORLOFF. (Civ. 3473.)

1. Champerty and maintenance 🔑5(6)—Contract requiring payment to attorney on dismissal of action is void.

Though an attorney may make a contract with his client for a share in the proceeds of any settlement of litigation, a contract requiring the client to pay the attorney a stipulated minimum sum as a penalty for dismissing the action without the attorney's consent, when the client received nothing for such dismissal, is against public policy and void.

2. Attorney and client 🔑134(1)—Can recover on quantum meruit for services in action dismissed by client.

Where a client dismissed the action without his attorney's consent, the attorney can recover on quantum meruit for the reasonable value of services rendered before the action was dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. J. Wood, Judge.

Action by M. D. Hall against Max Orloff to recover the amount due on a contract for attorney's fees. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry K. Wolff, of San Francisco, and I. R. Rubin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he, as assignee of the rights of R. A. Dunnigan, sought to collect $900 attorney's fees under a written contract for professional services made between said R. A. Dunnigan and defendant.

The trial court found that a written contract had been entered into between defendant and R. A. Dunnigan, under which contract the said Dunnigan was to render professional services as an attorney at law in the prosecution of two suits in which the defendant herein was the plaintiff. The only question involved in this appeal is as to the validity of certain provisions contained in said contract. The contract recites the employment of the attorney to file suit against Sam Orloff, Diana Orloff, and the Taft Junk Company, for an accounting of a partnership existing between said parties and the defendant herein, and also to prosecute another suit for damages against the said Sam Orloff for assault and battery upon the person of the defendant herein. It also provides that the defendant herein was to advance all costs of suit, and was to pay to the attorney fifty per cent. of all moneys received in said actions, either by compromise or by judgment. Then follows the provision upon which this action is based. It is as follows:

> "It is specifically understood and agreed that neither of the parties hereto are to settle said cases without the consent and knowledge of the other, and the party of the second part (Orloff) agrees in event of any settlement being made to pay to said party of the first part, 50 per cent. of said settlement, provided, however, that the said 50 per cent. so paid to the said party of the first part shall not be less than $1,000."

In accordance with this contract of employment, the attorney instituted suits in Kern county, for the purposes mentioned in the contract. Thereafter, on October 11, 1918, the defendant herein, in his own name and in his own behalf, filed in the said superior court dismissals of said actions so filed by his said attorney. The court found that the defendant herein did not receive any consideration of any kind or character from the defendants or from any other source, for his dismissal of these actions. It was agreed by the parties, and the court so found, that it was the intention of the parties to the contract between Dunnigan and Max Orloff that said Max Orloff should not have the right to settle or dismiss or compromise the aforementioned actions without the consent of his attorney, and that, if said Orloff did so dismiss said actions, he was required to pay as a penalty therefor the sum of $1,000 to his said attorney. Plaintiff herein relied upon this interpretation of the contract and gave defendant credit for $100 paid by him to his said attorney for costs and expenses, making a balance claimed of $900.

The trial court held that the provision in the contract between the parties for the payment of the $1,000 penalty was void as being contrary to public policy.

[1] Appellant relies upon the case of Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564. That case does not present the same question as the present appeal. In the Hoffman case a contract had been made between an attorney and his client for a contingent fee of one-half of the amount recovered by judgment on compromise in certain litigation regarding a large tract of land. It is true the contract contained a provision that the client should not compromise the case without the consent of the attorney, but the complaint alleged that after the attorney had expended much time, money, and labor upon the litigation, the client in contravention of the agreement, without the knowledge of the attorney and in fraud of his rights, made a settlement with the defendant under which the client received $12,500 which at the request of the client was paid to his son, who invested it in real property which he was holding in trust for his father. The prayer was that an undivided one-half of the property purchased with the money received in compromise be decreed to be held in trust for the attorney in fulfillment of the agreement made by the client to pay to the attorney as his fee one-half of whatever was recovered by judgment or compromise.

The difference between that case and the case at bar is the important one that in the Hoffman Case there had been a consideration received by the client, and the attorney was clearly entitled to one-half thereof, while in the present case, according to the evidence and findings, no consideration was received by the defendant, and the sum sought to be recovered is not based upon any amount received by the defendant as the basis of compensation provided by the contract of employment. In the Hoffman Case no recovery was sought by the attorney because of the dismissal of the case by the client, but recovery was sought because of the compromise made, and for one-half of the amount secured by the compromise, which was the agreed fee of the attorney under the written contract. In the present case the recovery is for a penalty for dismissing the suit without the consent of the attorney.

The question involved here was discussed in the case In re Snyder, 190 N. Y. 66, 82 N. E. 742, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 533, 13 Ann. Cas. 441, in which it is said:

> "In other states an abundance of authority is to be found for the doctrine that a clause prohibiting the client from making a settlement of his litigation without the consent of his attorney is void as against public policy. Huber v. Johnson, Supreme Court of Minnesota, 70 N. W. Rep. 806; North Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Ackley, 171 Ill. 100; Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Ohio 715, 716; Key v. Vattier, 1 Ohio, 132; Davis v. Webber, 66 Ark. 190. * * *
> "The clause in the contract fixing the value of the services at a certain percentage of the recovery was connected with the provision that the attorneys should have a voice in any settlement and in determining the amount of any recovery by that process. The two clauses are manifestly part of a single plan. Therefore, when the client takes advantage of the invalidity of one clause and repudiates it, the other one cannot stand alone but must fall with it, and the result of this again is to permit the attorneys to recover for the services which they have actually rendered according to their real value and independent of the original provision in the contract upon this subject. Davis v. Webber, supra; Gammons v. Johnson, 69 Minn. 488; Stearns v. Felker, 28 Wis. 594."

In the present case the defendant testified that he had become convinced that the actions instituted by his attorney were without merit, and that he had no evidence to establish his right to a recovery therein, and it was for these reasons that he had dismissed the actions. A similar situation was considered in the case of Andrewes v. Haas Bros., 214 N. Y. 255, 108 N. E. 423, where the court said:

> "The employment of a lawyer to serve for a contingent fee does not make it the client's duty to continue the lawsuit and thus increase the lawyer's profit. The lawsuit is his own. He may drop it when he will. Even an express agreement to pay damages for dropping it without his lawyer's consent would be against public policy and void. Matter of Snyder, 190 N. Y. 66, 69. The law will not imply an agreement which would be illegal, if it were express. It will not, under the coercion of damages, constrain an unwilling suitor to keep a litigation alive for the profit of its officers. Tenney v. Berger, 93 N. Y. 524; Matter of Dunn, 205 N. Y. 398, 402; Nutt v. Knut, 200 U. S. 12, 21; Mesa County Bank v. Berry, 24 Colo. App. 487. The notion that such a thing is possible betrays a strange misconception of the function of the legal profession and of its duty to society. When the defendants abandoned the action, they became liable to the plaintiff for the value of the services then rendered. That is the measure of their liability and of his right."

[2] We have been cited to other cases containing similar statements and intimations. However, appellant urges upon our attention that the attorney in the present case performed services in the preparation and filing of the complaints and in making a trip from Los Angeles to Bakersfield for a conference with the defendants in the action filed; that after the performance of these services he was discharged by the client and the actions dismissed; and that he is entitled to $1,000 as a not unreasonable estimate of the value of such services in the event of such a dismissal of the actions. A recovery under such circumstances may be secured in an action for damages for breach of contract, upon a proper showing, or in an action upon quantum meruit, under the cases herein discussed. See, also, 6 Corpus Juris, § 321, p. 745; Swinnerton v. Monterey Co., 76 Cal. 114, 18 Pac. 135.

In a suit to recover a fixed penalty provided for by the contract in the event of a dismissal of the actions by the client, the ruling of the trial court that the provision of the contract relied upon was against public policy and void is correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALSH v. DECOTO. (Civ. 3539.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 4, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 3, 1921.)

Parties 🔑59(4)—Court authorized to order that individual defendant sued in corporate trade-name by mistake be substituted.

Where defendant, doing business under the name "Blue Taxicab Corporation," injured plaintiff, who sued as against the corporation, then moved for order to amend complaint to bring in defendant as real defendant, the court was authorized to order that the true name of defendant as an individual doing business under the corporate name be inserted in pleadings and proceedings, and that they be amended accordingly, particularly in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 389.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Menzie Walsh against Ezra W. Decoto, doing business under the name and style of Blue Taxicab Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Kennedy, of Oakland, for appellant.

Stanley Moore and Geo. K. Ford, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Justice pro tem. On April 23, 1915, the plaintiff, Menzie Walsh, filed in the superior court of Alameda county an unverified complaint against Blue Taxicab Corporation as defendant. The Blue Taxicab Corporation was named as defendant in the title of the action, and in the body of the complaint the corporate character of the defendant was set out. By her complaint the plaintiff sought damages for certain personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her on September 1, 1914, through the negligent operation of an automobile by the defendant on the streets of the city of Oakland. On August 14, 1915, the summons was served upon the appellant, Ezra W. Decoto, for the first time. At the time of service, according to an affidavit of R. W. Palmer, the process server, the summons and a copy of the complaint were handed by him to Decoto, who then told him to make return that it was served upon the president of the Blue Taxicab Corporation. The Blue Taxicab Corporation appeared by demurrer, and the demurrer was overruled. On October 8, 1915, the Blue Taxicab Corporation filed its answer, in form a general denial, and also set up the special defense of contributory negligence and assumption of risk by plaintiff. Like the complaint, this answer was unverified. On March 15, 1916, the plaintiff gave notice that she would move the court for a jury trial of the case. On July 27, 1916, about two years after the accident, the plaintiff served and filed a notice of motion to amend her complaint in three respects, namely: First. By inserting therein as a portion of the title of the cause the words, "Ezra W. Decoto, doing business under the name and style of." Second. By striking out the whole of the paragraph of the complaint referring to the corporate character of the defendant, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That at all the times herein mentioned Ezra W. Decoto was doing business under the name and style above mentioned, and that said name was a fictitious and false name." Third. That the proposed amendment be filed as of April 23, 1915, the date of the commencement of the action. The grounds of this motion, as stated in the notice, were that a mistake had been made in the name of the party defendant in the complaint, and also a mistake as to the capacity in which the defendant was sued. At the time plaintiff filed and served her proposed amendment and with the motion there was an affidavit filed in support thereof, stating that she had been mistaken in the name of the defendant, and that Mr. Decoto was doing business under the false and fictitious name Blue Taxicab Corporation, that plaintiff was ignorant of that fact when she filed her complaint, and that under said name at the time of the accident Mr. Decoto was operating the taxicab by which the plaintiff was injured.

Prior to the hearing of this motion, and on August 1, 1916, the plaintiff returned and filed the summons issued in this action, with the affidavit of service upon Ezra W. Decoto, personally, indorsed thereon. It will be noticed that this return was subsequent to the appearance of the Blue Taxicab Corporation by demurrer and answer as above stated.

The motion to amend was heard on August 4, 1916; but before the court had ruled on it the plaintiff filed another notice of motion for an order to allow plaintiff to file an amended complaint upon the same grounds as those which formed the basis of the first notice above recited. Affidavits supporting and in opposition to this motion were also filed; and on August 21, 1916, the court granted leave to file the amendments proposed therein. These amendments were all practically to the same effect, namely, to bring in Mr. Decoto as the real defendant in the action in place of the Blue Taxicab Corporation. On September 22, 1916, a copy of the amendment was served on Mr. Decoto by mail, his office being in Oakland, and that of the plaintiff's attorneys in San Francisco. On October 4, 1916, the judge of the superior court before whom the action was pending, without, as it is said, notice or suggestion of anyone, but solely upon his own initiative or motion, made and caused to be entered upon the minutes of the court the following order:

> "It appearing that the plaintiff herein was ignorant of the name of the defendant at the time of the commencement of the above-entitled action, and that such fact is stated in the amendment to said complaint on file herein, and that the defendant herein was and is designated in the pleadings and proceedings herein by the name Blue Taxicab Corporation, and that at all of the times referred to in said complaint said Ezra W. Decoto was operating the automobiles referred to in the complaint, and was doing business under the false and fictitious name Blue Taxicab Company, now, therefore, it is hereby ordered that the true name of said defendant, to wit, Ezra W. Decoto, doing business under the name and style of Blue Taxicab Company, be, and it is hereby, ordered inserted in all of the pleadings and proceedings herein in place and stead of the name Blue Taxicab Corporation, and that all of the pleadings and proceedings herein be amended accordingly."

On the 20th day of April, 1917, the summons, complaint, and amendment to the complaint, as the said summons, complaint, and amendment to the complaint were amended by the order above recited, were personally served upon Mr. Decoto in city of Oakland. At the same time and place the amended complaint was served upon Mr. Decoto in the same manner. Meantime perhaps it should be noted, although it appears to be immaterial that a default already entered in the action had been set aside on motion of Mr. Decoto, who specially appeared for that purpose; and after the entry of the order of October 4, 1916, the court had permitted the withdrawal of the summons for service as above set forth. After the denial of a motion to quash the service of summons and the affidavit of service thereof, upon the ground that no copy of the summons had ever been served and the defendant had never appeared and had never submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, interposed by Mr. Decoto upon a special appearance for that purpose, the default of the appellant Decoto for failure to further defend was entered, and after hearing, a judgment for $5,000 damages was entered against him. From this judgment he has duly appealed.

The only question involved in the appeal is whether or not the trial court had authority to substitute Mr. Decoto personally for the Blue Taxicab Corporation in the action. The substitution was made admittedly long after the statute of limitations would have run against Decoto had no action been commenced thereon. There is not very much conflict in the evidence upon which the various motions were submitted, and the facts seem quite clearly established as follows: Mr. Decoto was doing business under the name Blue Taxicab Corporation or Company, and operating a cab by which the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of its driver. An action was thereupon begun by the plaintiff, Walsh, for redress of her injuries sustained in this accident. Not knowing the name of the party operating the cab, she sued the Blue Taxicab Corporation. It was supposed that Mr. Decoto was an officer of this so-called corporation. The Blue Taxicab Corporation appeared in the action, and sought to defend it. Upon the discovery that the name Blue Taxicab Corporation was a trade or business name under which Mr. Decoto was operating the cab, the plaintiff sought to have him substituted by his name in place of the name under which he was doing business. The court, after hearing various motions and making an order which in effect ought to have accomplished this purpose, probably thinking the order not sufficient, made the sweeping order above recited for the amendment of all of the pleadings and proceedings in the case by substituting Mr. Decoto's name for the name under which he was doing business. There was no suit here against a false entity, so the plaintiff claims, but an action simply against a defendant by the name under which the business was being conducted; and it is claimed that the case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., decided by the Supreme Court on July 28, 1919, and found in 180 Cal. 730, 183 Pac. 153, is decisive of the question before us.

We are inclined to accept this position as correct. In that case a complaint was filed against the Southern Pacific R. R. Company, in which the defendant was described as a corporation organized and doing business as a railroad company in the state of California pursuant to its laws. Summons was issued, and an alias summons was given in the action. This alias summons with a copy of the complaint was served upon the agent of the Southern Pacific Company upon whom process might be served in the state of California under a due authorization. The Southern Pacific Company was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Kentucky. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company answered, and subsequently the Southern Pacific Company appeared specially for the purpose of moving to quash the alias summons served on it and to set aside the service upon the grounds, among others, that it was not a party to the action. This motion was denied; and subsequently upon motions duly noticed the word "railroad" was striken from the name of the defendant in the title to the action upon the ground that the Southern Pacific Company had been properly served and had appeared in the action. The Supreme Court sustained this position in the following language:

> "In this case the real defendant's agent received the summons and knew the contents of the complaint, because the corporation appeared specially in the action."

So Mr. Decoto here knew the contents of the complaint, and appeared specially in the action; the "real defendant," in the words of the Supreme Court, having received the summons. "True," that court continues, "there was a misnomer of the party defendant in the pleadings; but the court having acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, as well as the subject-matter of the suit, possessed the power to correct the misnomer." It is true that in that case the correction was in the name of a corporate defendant; but it seems to us that there is no difference in principle between such a case and the case at bar. The substance of the matter is the real thing to be considered; and we do not think that a defendant who does business under a trade-name by which, although no deceit is necessarily intended thereby, a party injured is misled to the loss of his cause of action, should be heard to say after service upon him personally and with full notice of the situation, that the action had been begun in the wrong name, and should therefore be abated.

This view makes it unnecessary for us to consider the cases relied upon by appellant, except to say that the case of Altpeter v. Postal Tel. Co., 26 Cal. App. 705, 148 Pac. 241, is distinguished in the case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra. See Nisbet v. Clio Min. Co., 2 Cal. App. 441, 83 Pac. 1077.

It may be said in addition that this is not an action against a non-existing entity, nor an action against a corporation in no wise connected with the enterprise from which the plaintiff received her injury. It was an action against Mr. Decoto by the fictitious name under which he was conducting the business during the course of which the injury to the plaintiff occurred. It is true that there is a contention to the effect that there was such a corporation as the Blue Taxicab Corporation. In one of the affidavits in the case the existence of such a corporation at and prior to August 15, 1915, is averred, and it is also stated that Mr. Decoto was the president thereof. The injuries of plaintiff occurred on September 1, 1914. This affidavit, therefore, does not show the existence of a corporation at the time of the accident; nor that the corporation owned the cab by which the plaintiff was injured.

Nor do we think that the court exceeded its authority in making the sweeping order for the amendment of the pleadings in the action which is above set forth (30 Cyc. 141; Code Civ. Proc., § 389); and there is abundance of authority that the court may so act on its own motion in furtherance of justice (31 Cyc. 476).

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

HARTER v. DELNO. (Civ. 3474.)

1. Sales ⚷473(1)—Bona fide purchasers from conditional buyers get no claim to property.

Conditional sales being recognized fully, even bona fide purchasers from persons to whom property is delivered under conditional sales get no valid claim to the property.

2. Contracts ⚷147(3) — Intent to be ascertained from whole document.

Contracts ought to be interpreted not upon any single clause, but the intent of the parties is to be ascertained from the whole document.

3. Sales ⚷459—Contract regarded as one of absolute sale where it appears credit was given.

If, on the entire contract, it appears there was a valid sale and credit given, regardless of any language which may have been used whereby the vendor sought to retain title until payment of the debt, the contract will be considered as one of absolute sale, and the provision in regard to title as inserted for security only.

4. Contracts ⚷155 — Sales ⚷467 — Ambiguous language to be construed most strongly in favor of party not using it, but claiming under it.

If language in a claimed conditional sale contract was ambiguous, it is to be construed most strongly in favor of the party not using it, but claiming title under it.

5. Sales ⚷479(1)—Conditional vendor bound by election to affirm or rescind on default.

Under conditional sale contracts, where an option is retained by the vendor on default of the vendee either to consider the transaction as a sale with the right in the vendor to collect the balance of the purchase price or to stand on the condition that title remains in the vendor and to sue for the property on default, the vendor must elect, and, having elected, is bound thereby.

6. Sales ⚷480(2)—Conditional vendor's right to recover property may be lost.

A conditional vendor's right to recover the property on default may be lost by delay or by his estoppel to assert a right to the property in the hands of innocent third parties.

7. Sales ⚷480(2)—Conditional vendor estopped to claim property as against owner of premises on which it was installed.

Conditional vendor of ice-making machinery, which, at the time of default by the buyers, did not promptly exercise its right of election to collect the balance of the debt, held estopped, as against the owner of the property in which the machinery was installed by the buyers, to claim it, where, if the conditional vendor had promptly exercised its right of election, it might have given notice to the owner of the property in time to enable him to protect it from the amount he still owed his contractors, the buyers.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by A. Harter against H. Delno. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hert & Watt, of Colton, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment against him in a suit brought for the return of certain property or for its value.

The plaintiff-appellant is the assignee of Frick Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, manufacturers of ice-making and other machinery. For many years it maintained an agent named Meltzer in Los Angeles. Horstmann & Plomert, partners, engaged in the contracting business, or at least in the business of installing ice plants, in Los Angeles, were negotiating with the respondent, Delno, for the installation of an ice plant on property owned by him in Colton, in San Bernardino county. He wanted the Frick machinery. Meltzer, the Frick agent, was present during the negotiations between Horstmann & Plomert, on the one side, and Delno, on the other, but was not present when the contract between them was executed. Under this contract Horstmann & Plomert undertook to furnish to Delno an ice-making and cold storage plant, specifying a refrigerating machine made by the Frick Company. They agreed to deliver a machine and apparatus f. o. b. Waynesboro, Pa., and Los Angeles, respectively, about May 31 and May 28, 1916, respectively. Delno agreed to pay $17,252, $1,500 on the signing of the contract, 25 per cent. less $1,500 when the machinery and apparatus should be ready for shipment, 25 per cent. when the plant was ready for charge and test run, and the last 25 per cent. within 45 days thereafter. Ten thousand dollars of the purchase price was to be placed in escrow immediately with a Los Angeles bank, for disbursement in accordance with escrow instructions. The title to the machinery and apparatus was to remain in Horstmann & Plomert until all payments should be made. It was agreed that the machinery should not become a part of any real estate on which it was to be located or attached before settlement; title not to pass from Horstmann & Plomert until all cash and securities contracted for should be given, and on default of any payment the whole of the unpaid indebtedness should, at the option of Horstmann & Plomert become due and demandable. The purchaser agreed that Horstmann & Plomert should have the right to file mechanics' liens for labor and material. The contract was dated April 15, 1916.

On or about April 19, 1916, Horstmann & Plomert told Meltzer they had contracted with Delno to furnish him machinery for his plant, and he thereupon, for Frick Company, entered into the contract upon which this suit is based. It bore date April 19, 1916. It was on a form supplied by Frick Company to its agents. Under the head "specifications" at the first part of the form was a proposal on the part of Frick Company to Horstmann & Plomert to furnish one refrigerating machine with condensers and other details in accordance with the specifications. They called for a steam engine, gas compression pumps, shafting, ammonia gauges, ammonia condenser, receiver and oil separator, compression system, traveling crane, accumulator, mercury wells, and other parts, evidently to be built in a complete refrigerating plant. The purchaser was required to furnish and erect all foundation work, masonry, and carpentry work. The last provision of the specifications was that the purchaser, from the time of its arrival, should keep the machinery and apparatus insured against fire for an amount equal to the unpaid portion of the purchase price, with loss payable to the Frick Company as its interest appeared. Following these specifications under the word "Miscellaneous" was the contract proper in which Frick Company agreed to furnish Horstmann & Plomert "for use in the ice plant of H. Delno, situated in the city of Colton, county of San Bernardino," one refrigerating machine, together with the apparatus mentioned and described in the attached proposal and specifications and in accordance therewith, they being made a part of the agreement. The contract continued "the land upon which said machine and apparatus are to be erected is described as follows." Then follows a description of five lots by block and number and of the entire tract by metes and bounds in the city of Colton, the entire tract having a frontage on the Southern Pacific Company's right of way of 161.3 feet and on H street of 69.8 feet, with a depth between H street and an alley of 150 feet, its frontage on the alley being 128½ feet. Frick Company was to deliver f. o. b. Waynesboro 50 days from the date of receipt of order. The price was $3,373, payable 25 per cent. with bill of lading, and equal payments on July 10, August 10, and September 25, 1916. After provisions immaterial to the present controversy, the contract continued:

> "Settlement to be fully completed on arrival of machinery. All payments not due at time of settlement to be evidenced by negotiable notes bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum, which notes are to be secured in the manner indicated in paragraph (c) next below."

Paragraphs (a) and (b) provided respectively for mortgage of the entire plant and mortgage upon machinery alone. Paragraph (c) reads:

> "The title to machinery and apparatus remaining in Frick Company until all obligations given to it in settlement for same have been paid in cash."

There was a stipulation that the machinery should not become a part of the real estate on which it was erected or to which it might be attached before settlement, and "the title to the machinery herein ordered is not to pass from Frick Company until all the cash and securities contracted for are given, and in case of failure or refusal to make any of the payments when due, or to make settlement as hereinbefore agreed, or to pay any note that may be given when it falls due, the whole of the unpaid indebtedness arising under this agreement shall thereby at the option of Frick Company, become immediately due and payable." The contract by its terms is required to be approved by Frick Company at its home office, and was so approved April 25, 1916.

Delno recorded in San Bernardino county his contract with Horstmann & Plomert, and upon completion of their work on October 19, 1916, he filed with the recorder a notice of completion of the work. According to the notarial certificate the notice was acknowledged instead of being sworn to. No claim is made by Delno that the notice was sufficient to start time running as against mechanics' liens, but in this case there is no question of such liens. It is claimed that the recordation of the Delno contract and notice was sufficient to charge Frick Company with notice of the facts that the machinery was being installed on his property in such a manner as to cause it to become a part of the realty, and that he was dealing with Horstmann & Plomert upon the assumption that they were the owners of the property and could pass title. He held his final payment, amounting to something over $4,000, for 33 or 35 days after the notice of completion and then paid Horstmann & Plomert. The last payment became due from Horstmann & Plomert to Frick Company nearly one month before the notice of completion was filed, so that for a period of nearly 60 days Delno had in his hands more than enough to have paid the entire cost of the machinery sold by Frick Company to Horstmann & Plomert. During the installation of the plant Delno dealt with Meltzer, and at no time did Meltzer or the Frick Company inform Delno, on whose property they were contracting for the erection of the machinery, that they made any claim of title to the machinery or against him. Being interrogated in regard to this matter by the court, Mr. Meltzer stated that he followed the instructions of Frick Company. He said that he was not to interfere in the sale, notwithstanding his knowledge that the buyer from Horstmann & Plomert understood they were the owners. Being further interrogated, he stated that he understood he was not to volunteer any information, but, that, if anybody had asked him, he "would probably" answer exactly how the case was, leaving out the price. The attention of Delno to the claim of Frick Company was first called on February 25, 1917, by a letter from Meltzer stating that he had received from the Frick Company home office a telegram reading as follows:

> "Horstmann Plomert ignore balance their Delno account credit department interest on payment investigate please wire."

In his letter he said he was writing simply to let Delno know that Horstmann & Plomert still owed Frick Company a balance which was due quite some time ago, and—

> "I believe, if I remember correctly, Frick Company held title to the machinery bought from Frick Company until fully paid for in cash. I would be pleased to hear from you what can be done with regard to this matter, thinking that in case you should have to make some other payments to them you would kindly hold off doing so until I have fully reported to our home office."

The next that Delno heard from any one concerning the Frick Company's claim was through a letter dated October 10, 1917, from Stewart & Stewart, as attorneys of Frick Company, with reference to a balance of $873.16, and interest on the same from August 15, 1916, $70.47, making a total of $943.63 "yet unpaid on the ice machinery installed at your place by Horstmann & Plomert." Paragraph (c) of the Frick Company contract is quoted, and the substance of the provision in regard to title remaining in Frick Company is given, including the statement that, in the event of default, the whole of the unpaid indebtedness arising under the agreement should at the option of Frick Company become immediately due and demandable. The letter closed with the statement:

> "Frick Company will be loathe to make unnecessary trouble or expense, but must insist upon early payment."

The evidence showed that by installation the machinery and apparatus became integral parts of Delno's building.

The trial court made findings substantially in accordance with the foregoing statement of facts, and that the Frick Company, in failing to assert its rights in said personal property, acted in negligent disregard of the defendant's rights, and by its dealings with regard to the property and with Horstmann & Plomert actually induced a belief in defendant's mind that Horstmann & Plomert were the owners of the legal title of the property, and concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiff, as the assignee of Frick Company, should be estopped from asserting any right, title, or interest in or to the property; that the defendant is the owner and entitled to a decree quieting his title and to judgment against the plaintiff for costs.

[1-4] The appellant claims that the contract between Frick Company and Horstmann & Plomert was the ordinary conditional sale contract under which Frick Company retained title, that Horstmann & Plomert could give no better title than they acquired, and that Frick Company had the right to the property in the hands of Delno or its value. In this state conditional sales are recognized to the fullest extent, and even bona fide purchasers from persons to whom property is delivered under conditional sales get no valid claim to the property. Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474-477, 56 Pac. 339; Kellogg v. Burr, 126 Cal. 38, 58 Pac. 306; Lundy Furniture Co. v. White, 128 Cal. 170, 60 Pac. 759, 79 Am. St. Rep. 41. Contracts are to be interpreted, not upon any single clause, however, but the intent of the parties is to be ascertained from the whole document. If upon the entire contract it appears there was a valid sale and credit given, regardless of any language which may have been used by which the vendor seeks to retain title until payment of the debt, the contract will be considered as one of sale, and the provision in regard to title as one inserted for the purpose of security only. Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60. In that case it was said:

> "The intention must be taken to have been to transfer the ownership of the property, reserving a security for the price, and nothing more. The possession was delivered. The promise to pay was absolute."

In the present case it will be noted that the insurance required was for an amount equal to the unpaid portion of the purchase price, not for the entire value of the property. There was no provision in the contract for the forfeiture of partial payments as rental for the use of the property, such as is customary in condition sale contracts. "Settlement" was to be fully completed on arrival of the machinery, and negotiable notes were to be given at that time for payments not due. The stipulations of paragraph (c) that title should remain in Frick Company until all obligations given to it "in settlement for same" had been paid in cash show an intent to hold the property as security for the payment of the promissory notes given in settlement. If settlement was made, sale was completed, and, if Frick Company desired to hold the machinery as security for the notes, it might have accomplished this object under paragraph (a) or paragraph (b), which provided for mortgages, and the recordation of such mortgages would have advised Delno, who was admittedly an innocent purchaser, of the claims of Frick Company. The provision for settlement implied a completed sale when settlement should be made. The language was that of the plaintiff's assignor. If it was ambiguous, it is to be construed most strongly in favor of the other party and one claiming title under it.

[5, 6] It is fundamental that under conditional sale contracts, where an option is retained by the vendor upon default of the vendee either to consider the transaction as a sale, with the right in the vendor to collect the balance of the purchase price, or to stand on the condition that title remains in the vendor and to sue for the property, upon default the vendor must elect, and, having elected, is bound thereby. The vendor's right to recover the property may be lost by delay or by his estoppel to assert a right to the property in the hands of innocent third parties. In the present case the contract provided that on failure to make settlement on delivery of the machinery by giving negotiable notes for deferred payments, or to pay any note when it should fall due, the whole of the unpaid indebtedness arising under the agreement should thereby, at the option of Frick Company, become immediately due and demandable. If it be assumed that settlement was made on the delivery of the machinery, the sale was complete and title passed to Horstmann & Plomert, from whom it was acquired by Delno. If settlement was not then made, Frick Company had the option immediately to declare the entire debt due. The contract called for the last payment from Horstmann & Plomert to be made on September 25, 1916. It was not made. If Frick Company at the time had promptly exercised its right of election to collect the balance of the debt, it might have given the notice to Delno, which it subsequently did give, in ample time to have enabled Delno to protect the Frick Company from the amount he still owed Horstmann & Plomert. By failing to act promptly and to advise Delno of its rights and election, it permitted him to change his position in relation to Horstmann & Plomert, and it would be a fraud on him to permit the plaintiff, whose assignor slept on its rights, to require him to pay even the debt of $900, and most inequitable to require him to pay the full value of the property.

Before the assignment to the plaintiff, Frick Company, through its agent, Meltzer, in February, 1917, five months after the default, advised Delno that it was seeking to collect the balance of the debt. Again, in October, 1917, more than a year after the default, through its attorneys, it advised him they were seeking to collect the balance of the debt. It exercised its right of election upon default, and in seeking to collect from Delno the balance of the Horstmann & Plomert debt it treated the transaction as a sale. Having made its election, it is bound by it. The fact that after default it sought to collect the balance strongly tends to show that the contract should be construed as indicated herein, and that the provisions of the contract in regard to the retention of title were inserted to evade the provisions of law requiring the recordation of chattel mortgages.

[7] The conclusion of estoppel from the findings was correct, and the findings showing the laches and estoppel were supported by the evidence. It further appears upon the entire record that no injustice has been done by the judgment. The substantial rights of the parties being thus determined, it becomes unnecessary to consider the minor contentions of the appellant.

BENNETT v. BENNETT. (Civ. 3070.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 19, 1920.)

Divorce ⚷203—Provision for alimony held unwarranted by complaint.

Where complaint in wife's divorce action did not pray for alimony, and did not contain allegations upon which to base such a prayer, the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, had no power, on defendant's default, to provide in its interlocutory decree for payment of alimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Kathryn A. Bennett against Merlin H. Bennett. From that part of an interlocutory decree requiring defendant to pay alimony, defendant appeals. Modified.

Isaac Pacht, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Alfred H. McAdoo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action for divorce, the prayer of the complaint, to which no answer was interposed, was for a judgment dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the parties, and for general relief. Defendant, claiming the same to be erroneous, appeals from that part of the interlocutory decree rendered upon his default and in favor of plaintiff, whereby it was adjudged that, until the further order of the court, "defendant pay plaintiff $25 per month alimony."

Clearly, the trial court erred in making the order, the effect of which was to grant relief in excess of that demanded in the complaint. Not only was there an absence of any prayer for alimony, but the complaint contains no allegations upon which to base such prayer. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, where no answer is filed by defendant, the relief granted plaintiff "cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint." As stated, the prayer was for a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony only, and the power of the court to grant such relief was not enlarged by the prayer for general relief against defendant, who had made default. Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 Pac. 1012. See, also, Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 Pac. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520; Foley v. Foley, 120 Cal. 42, 52 Pac. 122, 65 Am. St. Rep. 147; Benton v. Benton, 122 Cal. 395, 55 Pac. 152.

The decree is modified, by striking therefrom the following clause:

> "It is further ordered that until the further order of the court defendant pay plaintiff $25 per month alimony."

JOHNSTONE et al. v. GLOSTER et al.

(Civ. 2158.)

1. Estoppel 🔑26—No estoppel by deed of one not connected with claimants' title.

Where defendants and their predecessors in interest acquired a title by prescription to a water ditch and water flowing therein, they were not estopped from urging said claim by a deed conveying the water, executed by a third party not connected with their source of title to the land claimed by them.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1071(4)—Use of word "plaintiffs" for "defendants" in findings disregarded as clerical error.

Where the context showed that the word "defendants" was intended to be used in findings, the use of the word "plaintiffs" instead would be disregarded on appeal as a mere clerical mistake.

3. Adverse possession 🔑117—Findings held sufficient where using term "adverse."

A finding that defendants' use had been continuous, uninterrupted, and adverse to plaintiffs, and under a claim of right was not insufficient to uphold a decree of title by prescription, in that it did not appear that such use was open, notorious, or with knowledge and acquiescence of plaintiffs, for to say that a use is "adverse" is equivalent to the declaration that it is open, notorious, under a claim of right and with the knowledge of the owner of the legal title.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Adverse.]

4. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings are liberally construed.

Findings are to be construed so as to support rather than to defeat the judgment.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑152(10)—Findings as to water rights held inconsistent.

In action involving conflicting claims to water rights, findings, in effect, that plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to the use of 750 inches of the water, and defendants were also the owners and entitled to the use of 25 inches of said water, were inconsistent and contradictory, necessitating reversal of judgment based thereon.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1122(2)—Conflicting findings cannot be changed by appellate court.

Although conflicting findings result from inadvertence or oversight, the appellate court is powerless to change them, but this may be done only by the trial tribunal.

7. Trial 🔑398—Findings to be upheld if possible.

As against the claim of inconsistency in the findings, the findings must be considered together, and should be upheld if possible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Johnstone and others against Daniel A. Gloster and others. From order denying plaintiffs' motion for judgment on the findings, and from order denying new trial and from judgment in part for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Order refusing to enter judgment for plaintiffs affirmed, and the judgment and order denying new trial reversed.

Daly B. Robnett, of Alturas, for appellants.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The controversy was over the title and right to the possession and use of the waters of Raider creek in Modoc county. Plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to 750 inches of the water measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that the defendants wrongfully entered upon the channel of said Raider creek at a point above the lands of the plaintiffs and diverted a portion of the water from the main channel of said stream so as to deprive plaintiffs of a part of the water to which they were entitled, and which was necessary for the irrigation and maturing of their crops, greatly to the damage of said plaintiffs. Plaintiffs, therefore, sought the decree of the court to establish their rights to the waters of said stream, as set forth in their complaint, and the right of plaintiff Walter A. Johnstone to maintain "his said dams and ditches upon and across the lands of defendants," and that said defendants be enjoined and restrained from diverting or interfering with the flow of the water of said creek to the lands of plaintiffs in the quantities mentioned in the complaint, and from in any manner interfering with the maintenance by said Johnstone of the said dams and ditches. The material allegations of the complaint were denied by the answer, and therein defendants set up a title by prescription to 200 inches of said water, and also to the ownership of the said dam and ditch across the lands of defendants claimed by said Johnstone, and they asked for a decree of the court, establishing their said right in accordance with the allegations of their answer. The court filed lengthy findings of fact, and therefrom drew the following conclusions of law:

"That plaintiffs, as against the said defendants, have the right to take and use for the irrigation of their lands all of the waters of said Raider creek, except 25 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, at the head of what is known as the Gloster ditch, and that said defendants be forever enjoined and restrained from in any manner interfering with the natural flow of the waters of said creek to the lands of said plaintiffs, except said 25 inches measured at the head of the Gloster ditch.

"That as to the waters of said creek above the amount of 25 inches which may be permitted to flow into the Gloster ditch, the defendants Gloster are entitled to 75 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and the plaintiff Johnstone to 10 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, or such a pro rata thereof as may be permitted to flow in said ditch.

"That said Gloster ditch be declared to be the joint property of said defendants and said plaintiff Walter A. Johnstone, to be used in the manner hereinabove set forth, and that plaintiffs have their costs herein expended."

Plaintiffs were dissatisfied with the award that was made to defendants of the said 25 inches and with the disposition of said ditch and surplus water. They made, therefore, a motion under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure to have a judgment entered upon the findings of fact in favor of plaintiffs as prayed for in their complaint. This motion was denied, and they appeal from said order. They also moved for a new trial, and they have appealed from the order denying the same and also from the judgment.

One claim of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to support the contention that defendants have a title to said 25 inches of water, and also the right to the joint use of said ditch and of said surplus water that may be permitted to flow in the same. It may be said, however, that there is substantial evidence disclosed by the record to support such claim. The testimony upon which respondents rely is set forth in their brief, and, without reproducing it, we deem it sufficient to say that it is a fair inference therefrom that defendants are entitled to said right as so indicated in the conclusion of the trial court.

[1] It may be said, also, that there seems to be no substantial merit in the claim that defendants are estopped from claiming said right by virtue of a certain deed which it is claimed conveyed all the water here in controversy. Said deed, though, was executed by D. M. Gloster, Mary E. Gloster, and Maurice J. Gloster. Respondents, however, connect themselves with the title of Honoria Monica Gloster, to whom the land now owned by defendants was patented March 19, 1895. It is the claim of respondents, that at the time of the execution of said deed, said grantors had no interest whatever in said land now owned by respondents or in said water right. Their position is that the Gloster ditch was built for the use of said land which is called the desert claim; that said ditch was used to carry water to this claim, and that one D. M. Gloster sold his improvements to his daughter Honoria Monica Gloster in 1889, and that this Gloster ditch and the water right connected therewith went to her as a part of the improvements. But, be that as it may, there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the theory that said Honoria Monica Gloster and her successors in interest in the ownership and possession of said desert claim acquired a title by prescription to said water ditch and water, and manifestly they would not be estopped from urging said claim by reason of the act of some other party with whom they do not connect their source of title to the land.

[2-4] Another claim of appellants is that the conclusion of the court as to the adverse use by defendants of said 25 inches of water is not supported by the findings of fact. Finding No. 12 is one upon which defendants rely in that respect, and is as follows:

"That for more than five years next preceding the commencement of this action, the defendants have continuously, uninterruptedly and adversely to the plaintiffs, and to all of them, used and appropriated 25 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, of the waters of said stream, at the head of what is known as the Gloster ditch, and have continuously, during all of said times, uninterruptedly and adversely to the plaintiffs and their grantors, and under claim of right, used and applied said 25 inches, measured at the head of said Gloster ditch, for the purposes of irrigating the garden of defendants at the house of said defendants on the lands described in defendants' complaint, and during all of said time have paid all taxes of any kind or character levied or assessed upon or against said ditch or dam or said water right; that said 25 inches of water is necessary for the irrigation of the garden, shrubbery, and trees at the house of plaintiffs upon their said lands."

As to the use of the word "plaintiffs" in the last line of the above, we think it is a clerical mistake and should be disregarded as the context shows that the word "defendants" was intended. It is the claim, though, of appellants that said finding is fatally defective in that it does not appear that such use was open, notorious, or with knowledge or acquiescence of the plaintiffs. These are undoubtedly material elements of a title by prescription, and said finding is subject to criticism in its failure to set them forth. We think, however, that the finding is not so defective as to furnish no support for the conclusion of the court. The term "adversely" as used in said finding, is so generally recognized in the statutes and in the decisions as including these elements of title by prescription, that we think it should be so construed as thus used. To say that a use is adverse is equivalent to the declaration that it is open, notorious, under a claim of right, and with the knowledge of the owner of the legal title. In view of the well-established rule that findings are to be construed so as to support rather than to defeat the judgment, and also the fact that the court found that said use had been continuous, uninterrupted, and under a claim of right, we think it should not be held that said finding is entirely insufficient to uphold a decree of title by prescription.

[5] Another criticism by appellants that seems to present a graver question is to the effect that the findings of fact on material issues are wholly inconsistent and contradictory, and that therefore the judgment of the trial court must be reversed. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; Dorsey v. Newcomer, 121 Cal. 213, 53 Pac. 557.

We deem it unnecessary to quote in full said findings, but in simple and unambiguous language the court found that the grantors of the several plaintiffs made valid appropriations of 750 inches of the waters of Raider creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, prior to any use or appropriation of any of the water by the defendants or their grantors, and that ever since said first and prior appropriation of said 750 inches, said plaintiffs and their grantors have used, diverted, and conveyed said waters upon their said lands for beneficial purposes particularly specified in said finding, and that during all of said time the said respective amounts of water have been and are necessary and indispensable for the proper irrigation of said lands and crops. It further appears clearly from the finding that at the time of the appropriation of these waters and the use of the same they were unappropriated and unused water, and that the ditches were constructed over and across the lands of the United States, and that said ditches have ever since been maintained as a matter of right. In brief, these findings covered every element of a right by prior appropriation, and they show absolutely and conclusively that plaintiffs are the present owners and entitled to the use of said 750 inches of the waters of Raider creek, and have been such owners ever since said appropriation. There is a finding also to the effect that any and all appropriations by the defendants or their grantors were subsequent to the foregoing appropriations of 750 inches of the water, and that no use whatever was made of any of the waters of Raider creek by defendants or their grantors until after all of these appropriations had been made. Said findings in favor of plaintiffs are not qualified in any manner by the finding in favor of defendants. The situation is substantially this, that the court finds plaintiffs to be the owners and entitled to the use of 750 inches of the water and the defendants to be also the owners and entitled to the use of 25 inches of said water. It is manifest that these two conditions are irreconcilable and cannot coexist. The case would be the same if the action involved land and the court had found that plaintiffs are the owners, in the possession and entitled to the possession, of 750 acres, and the defendants are entitled to 25 acres of the same.

[6, 7] Of course, the trial court did not actually intend to make conflicting findings. The embarrassment is no doubt due to inadvertence or oversight, but we manifestly are powerless to change the findings of the lower court. That may be done only by the trial tribunal. Although it is true that the findings must be considered together and should be upheld, if possible, yet since there is nothing to indicate that plaintiffs' title is subject to defendants' right to said 25 inches, we see no other alternative than to reverse the judgment. The case, if retried, should be conducted with as little expense as possible to both parties. If it is had before the same trial judge, it should be submitted upon the evidence already received, and any additional evidence that the parties or either of them may desire to offer.

The order refusing to enter judgment in favor of plaintiffs is affirmed; the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

George De Martini was convicted of perjury, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for new trial. Judgment and order reversed.

See, also, 190 Pac. 468.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, E. R. Vaughn (Downey & Downey, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. A jury convicted the appellant of the crime of perjury. He appeals upon the ground chiefly that the evidence is insufficient to convict. The indictment charges that the appellant testified falsely in making certain answers to questions propounded to him while being examined on voir dire as a prospective juror in a criminal case in which one Fuski was being tried for a felony. These questions and answers are as follows:

> "Q. If you are chosen as a juror in this case, you will try this case solely upon the evidence produced in court and the instructions of the court? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Nothing outside of the case, that is, outside of the evidence and instructions of the court, will enter into your deliberations when you go to the jury room? A. No, sir."

The appellant was not asked to state any facts as to the then present condition of his mind, nor indeed, to state any fact of any kind; but only to declare under oath that he would try the case solely upon the evidence and the instructions of the court, and that he would not let anything outside of the case enter into his deliberations in the jury room. His declaration to this effect was not more than his solemn oath that he would well and truly try the case on the evidence. His answers constitute, in effect, the usual oath administered to trial jurors. He merely swore or promised that he would keep his oath as a juror.

[1] I. It is charged in the indictment that appellant well knew that the answers which he gave were false. Such an allegation, followed by proof thereof, is essential to a conviction. Such knowledge may be shown, and ordinarily must be shown, by the circumstances of the case, since such mental condition cannot usually be shown by direct evidence. Two lines of evidence were introduced on the trial of the case. The first consisted of the entire volume of evidence produced on the trial of said Fuski, the evidence being read to the jury in this case by the court reporter. This was introduced to show how unfounded was the stand taken by appellant in the jury room. This point will be noticed later.

The second line consisted of the evidence given by certain fellow jurors of appellant; and it becomes necessary to examine this second line of evidence to ascertain whether the testimony of any one of them or of all taken together is sufficient to establish the crime. We take it that to justify a conviction herein it must be established beyond a reasonable doubt by the testimony of these fellow jurors: (a) That appellant believed, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the party on trial was guilty, since otherwise, it would have been his duty to vote as he did for acquittal; (b) That he did not try the party solely on the evidence and instructions; and (c) That he knew when he was answering questions as a prospective juror that he would not try the case on the evidence and instructions.

A juror, Mr. Sturges, testified that the appellant said to him, while in the jury room, that he believed Fuski to be guilty, but that he would not vote for a verdict of guilty. This falls very far short of showing that, at the beginning of the trial, he knew that he would not try the case on the evidence and instructions. It does not even show that, at the moment these admissions were made in the jury room, he believed that Fuski should be convicted.

The law exacts from a juror very much more than a belief that an accused person is guilty. The law requires that this belief must be so strong that it amounts to a belief beyond a reasonable doubt, and that, if it falls short of this degree of certainty, the juror must vote for a verdict of not guilty. The appellant, in his admissions to the above-named juror, gave no intimation that he knew or believed from the beginning that Fuski was guilty. His entire opinion as to the guilt of Fuski may have grown up from disclosures made by witnesses during the progress of the trial. Two or three other jurors corroborated the testimony of the juror above named. Another juror, Mr. Bauer, testified that the appellant said in the jury room "that he thought it was a frame-up—there were others that ought to be convicted, the same as Fuski." The last clause of this admission is broad enough to warrant the inference that the appellant was convinced of the guilt of Fuski to that degree that would demand a verdict of guilty. Still, it is coupled in the same sentence with a statement that is wholly inconsistent with the idea that he believed him guilty, since he expressed the belief that the prosecution was a "frame-up." But even this strong and unsavory statement is entirely consistent with innocence of the crime, since it does not relate back to the beginning of the trial. It does show a degree of moral obliquity rarely observed in the class of persons listed as jurors. But the appellant is not on trial for general moral delinquency. The charge is the commission of a specific act criminal in its nature, to wit, falsely stating that he would try the accused solely on the evidence and the instructions, knowing that he would not do so. He can, of course, be convicted of no other. At most, the testimony of these fellow jurors generates a bare suspicion that the appellant is guilty of the specific act charged; but it falls far short of sustaining a legal inference to that effect. Perjury requires a higher measure of proof that any other crime known to the law, treason alone excepted. Any other crime may be established by the testimony of one witness who is entitled to full credit. Both perjury and treason require more than the testimony of one witness. And the charge against the appellant is much more difficult of proof than perjury cases in general. In the ordinary perjury case, the falsity of the oath may be shown by extraneous proof showing the existence or nonexistence of the alleged fact; but in a case like this, where the very essence of guilt consists in misrepresenting the state of the offender's own mind, it is difficult to meet the demands of the law in showing the necessary mental condition. But the difficulty of showing this does not relieve courts and juries from the duty of requiring evidence that shows guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and this reasonable doubt is not overcome by the testimony of a single witness, be he ever so truthful. The evidence submitted to us on this appeal would not sustain a verdict against him even in a civil action, where the mere weight or balance of evidence governs, far less sustain the conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt.

[2-4] II. But independently of all other considerations, the verdict cannot stand because the corpus delicti was not proved. The entire evidence thus far discussed consists solely of admissions made by the appellant while in the jury room. It is an inflexible rule that evidence of the admissions of a party are never sufficient to convict unless and until the corpus delicti is proved. Moreover, it is a fundamental rule that no person can ever be lawfully convicted of a crime, be it great or small, upon his admissions or confessions alone. This rule is universally recognized. No one presumes to question it. The term "corpus delicti" means simply the fact of the crime or the body of the crime. This does not necessarily involve proof that the accused person is the person committing it, but only that the crime has in fact been committed by some one. This may be illustrated by a concrete example. A man is accused of murder. The body of the victim is not found, and there exists no direct evidence that the victim was murdered. The accused person confesses at great length all the alleged details of the crime. Such confession is radically insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty. We are not concerned with the reasons for the rule, but when it is recalled that a great number of cranks confess to alleged crimes of which they know nothing, its propriety cannot be questioned.

After it is proved that the crime was committed by some person, then and then only may the admissions of the accused be used to show that he is the one committing it. Cases of the kind charged against the appellant are unique in this particular, that proof of the corpus delicti is so interwoven with proof of the identity of the person committing the offense that it is difficult to establish the first fact without also at the same time establishing the other. In other words, since proof of the admissions of the appellant is not competent to establish the fact of the perjury, and since proof of the fact of the perjury must, in this particular case, show that the appellant is the person committing it, evidence of his admissions cannot do more than confirm other and basic proofs. These basic proofs are wholly wanting.

[5] The prosecution, doubtless recognizing and seeking to avoid this rule, offered in evidence in this case the entire volume of evidence that was given in the case of the People v. Fuski. This was offered for the avowed purpose of showing that the appellant was not justified in believing from that evidence that the prosecution was a "frame-up" and in persisting in voting for an acquittal. This procedure was, in effect, asking the jury in this case to retry the Fuski Case for the purpose of determining whether or not the appellant was justified therefrom in voting for acquittal. But this rule might lead to some bizarre results. If it is admissible in this case, it must all be carried over into a hypothetical case involving a juror who sat on the trial of appellant, and so on ad infinitum. But if that evidence shows that this appellant is guilty, it likewise shows that the other two jurors who voted with him for an acquittal are guilty. But the evidence in the other case was inadmissible in this case for any purpose whatever. The law provides no machinery whereby the jury in this case could review the evidence submitted in the former case. Still less could this jury determine the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. The weight of evidence depends much upon the manner of the witness and the connection in which it is given. The credibility of a witness can be judged only by one who hears him testify. One of the highest functions of a juror is to measure up the credibility of a witness. This is a duty that can be neither delegated nor reviewed. The mere disagreement of three jurors does not ordinarily lead to the conviction that they have committed perjury or otherwise violated their oath as jurors.

Nor could this evidence in the Fuski Case show, or tend to show, that the appellant intended from the beginning to vote for an acquittal.

This was the only evidence, apart from the admissions of the appellant, that was offered in the case. This leaves the corpus delicti wholly unproved. It is not a case where the evidence on this point is weak. It is a case where it is wholly wanting.

[6] So many California cases hold that the corpus delicti must be proved by evidence independently of admissions of the accused that it would be impracticable to refer to more than a few of them. In People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 651, 63 Pac. 1001, 1003, the Supreme Court says:

> "Of course, it is well-settled law that the corpus delicti must be established independently of evidence which merely tends to connect the defendant with the crime charged and independently of any asserted extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the party charged, and that such admissions or confessions cannot be considered as evidence of the corpus delicti." (The italics are ours.)

Other cases to the same effect are: People v. Grill, 3 Cal. App. 514, 86 Pac. 613; People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440; People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 145, 131 Pac. 127; People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 566; People v. Thrall, 50 Cal. 415; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698.

Viewed from every angle, it seems impossible to uphold the conviction. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

HOEFT v. HOTCHKISS. (Civ. 2129.)

1. Partnership ⚷53—In suit for accounting, defendant's testimony against a partnership held sufficient to support verdict in his favor.

Where in a suit for an accounting under an alleged partnership agreement, plaintiff's cause of action was predicated on the theory that a written agreement was signed by both parties, defendant's positive testimony that he never signed the instrument or entered into the partnership claimed was legally sufficient to support a verdict in his favor.

2. Partnership ⚷47—Evidence of different partnership agreement held admissible to show agreement sued on was not made.

In an action on an alleged partnership agreement between plaintiff and defendant for the purpose of mining for chrome ore, evidence that on the date of the alleged agreement plaintiff, defendant, and a third person entered into a partnership for the same purpose was admissible as tending to show that the agreement alleged by plaintiff was not made.

3. Trial ⚷62(2)—Defendant may be asked whether he entered into particular agreement or any agreement and permitted to state its nature.

Where defendant denies the partnership agreement alleged by plaintiff, it is proper in rebuttal to ask him if he entered into the particular agreement and to follow that with the question if he entered into any partnership agreement with plaintiff, and, in answer to such question, to permit him to state the nature of such agreement.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1039(13)—No reversal because defensive matter was not pleaded when plaintiff not prejudiced.

A judgment will be affirmed, though defensive matter was proved without being pleaded, where it does not appear that appellant was at all prejudiced by the omission to plead it, and appellant protested amendment to meet evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Eleanore E. Hoeft against A. M. Hotchkiss. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. White, of Grass Valley, for appellant.
W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought for a partial accounting of an alleged partnership in the proceeds of a certain shipment of chrome ore made in June, 1918.

Plaintiff's claim of the partnership relation was based upon the asserted execution of the following written instrument:

> "Nevada City, August 25, 1917. This is to certify that A. M. Hotchkiss and Eleanore E. Hoeft have this day and date entered into a partnership for the purpose of chrome mining on equal shares in every and all discoveries made by A. M. Hotchkiss during the term of this partnership and equal interest in any lease that may be secured by said A. M. Hotchkiss during the term of said partnership."

The cause was tried with a jury, and their finding was in favor of defendant generally, and also specially that no such agreement of partnership was made.

Two points are urged by appellant: One, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; and, second, that the trial court erred in admitting certain evidence over the objection of appellant.

[1] As to the first, it is surprising that it should be seriously urged. The defendant testified positively that he never signed said written instrument or entered into any such partnership. We cannot say from the record that he did not tell the truth, and his testimony is, of course, legally sufficient to support the finding of the jury. It is not disputed that plaintiff's whole cause of action was predicated upon the theory that said writing was signed by both parties, and, having found upon sufficient evidence that said purported agreement was not so executed, the jury could consistently reach no other verdict.

[2, 3] The other point relates to the evidence that another partnership agreement on the part of plaintiff, defendant, and one Bob Locke was entered into on said August 25 or thereabouts for said purpose of chrome mining, and that this partnership was subsequently recognized and admitted by appellant.

The purpose of the evidence was to make more probable the inference that no such agreement as claimed by appellant was executed; for it was hardly to be supposed that on the same day she would enter into two different partnership agreements with different parties for the same purpose. We think the evidence was admissible as bearing upon the question of the probabilities of the situation. One partnership was inconsistent with the other, and according to the recognized standard of human conduct, we could not expect the average person to assume such an inconsistent attitude. The circumstance, therefore, was a proper one for the jury to consider in weighing the testimony of plaintiff and defendant to determine which was worthy of belief. In order to rebut the evidence of plaintiff, it was proper, of course, to ask the defendant if he entered into the particular partnership agreement, and to follow that with the question if he entered into any partnership agreement with her for said purpose. In answer to this latter question he would be permitted to state the nature of such agreement. The foregoing indicates virtually the course that was pursued.

[4] Indeed, in the closing brief appellant makes this statement:

> "Our contention in this matter is that this claim of another and distinct partnership having been entered into between the plaintiff, defendant, and the third party, 'Locke,' was defensive matter, and should have been pleaded by the defendant in his answer. If the same had been, that would have altered the situation entirely."

If we admit that it should have been set up in the answer, it would not follow that the judgment should be reversed. To the contrary, we must hold that it should be affirmed for the reason that it does not appear that appellant was at all prejudiced by such omission. Appellant seems to lose sight entirely of the familiar principle that must control in the consideration of such alleged error.

Moreover, at the trial, when this objection was made to the admissibility of such evidence, respondent asked permission to amend his answer in that respect, but appellant stoutly protested, and the court declined to permit the amendment. Under such circumstances this objection does not come with very good grace and should not be regarded with much favor.

Without multiplying words, we may say that there does not appear to be any merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Ex parte SILL.

Application of FRAZIER.

(Cr. 739.)

1. Habeas corpus ⚷117(1)—Judgment as to custody of child res judicata.

Judgment in habeas corpus proceeding for custody of a child is res judicata in a like subsequent proceeding on the same state of facts and between the same parties; the proceeding being essentially one to enforce private rights, and the gist thereof that the restraint of the child is in violation of petitioner's right to its custody.

2. Habeas corpus ⚷117(1)—State of facts relative to res judicata not different on two proceedings because of a fact known not being shown.

The state of facts on a second habeas corpus proceeding for custody of a child are not different from those on a prior proceeding, so as to render inapplicable the principle of res judicata to the judgment against petitioner in the first case, because of the fact of her divorce existing and known at the time of the first proceeding, but not attempted to be shown therein, appearing in the second proceeding.

Original habeas corpus proceeding by Viola Frazier on behalf of Gulda Ramona Sill, a minor. Writ discharged.

George W. Bush, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

WELLER, J. This proceeding was instituted to recover from the respondents the custody of Gulda Ramona Sill, a minor child about nine years of age.

It is alleged that petitioner, who is the mother of the child, placed her in the custody of respondents in order that they might enjoy her comfort and companionship, but without any intent to abandon the child, and that respondents have not adopted the child, but now unjustly claim the right to retain her custody. Further allegation is made that a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to recover the custody of the minor was filed by this petitioner against the respondents here in the superior court of Santa Barbara county, which, upon a hearing in that court was denied.

Respondents set forth in their return that, on or about the 13th day of July, 1911, the petitioner abandoned the child to their care and custody, since which time the mother has visited the child but three times, and has never contributed anything to her support. They aver that when the little girl was placed in their keeping it was agreed that petitioner should secure a divorce from her husband, from whom she was then separated, and that thereupon the respondents could adopt the child. This they are now willing to do, being abundantly able to maintain and educate the girl, and desire to treat her in all respects as if she were their natural child.

The facts found by the superior court in the habeas corpus proceeding wherein it awarded the custody of the child to the respondents here are set forth fully in the return filed in this court by respondents, and are substantially as we have above summarized the return, with additional details unnecessary to be repeated, but in no material respect different from the showing made on the hearing of the proceeding in this court.

Counsel for petitioner advances, with much persuasive force, the right of the natural mother to the custody of her offspring. With equal cogency the respondents present their claims, based upon the affection born of the years of loving care bestowed upon the infant consigned to their charge. The argument of each party to the controversy strikes a responsive chord in the heart and stirs the tender emotion of parental instinct in the breast. Were the question open for our consideration, we would with reluctance attempt to solve this delicate problem. However, this grave responsibility has already been assumed by another tribunal, to which the parties have submitted their respective claims. By the judgment of the superior court in a similar proceeding between the same parties it was determined that the best interests of the child would be subserved by awarding its custody to the respondents, and under the circumstances of this case we are bound by that decision.

[1] The great weight of authority is to the effect that, in a contest for the custody of an infant, the gist of the action is not that the child is unlawfully deprived of its liberty, but is that such restraint is in violation of the petitioner's right to its custody, and is essentially a proceeding to enforce private rights by the process of habeas corpus. For this reason it is held that a former judgment upon the same state of facts may be set up as res adjudicata when the same parties appear in a subsequent proceeding of the same nature. In re Holt, 34 Cal. App. 290, 167 Pac. 184; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 71 N. E. 1077, 67 L. R. A. 787, 1 Ann. Cas. 256.

[2] Petitioner argues that a different state of facts was presented in the hearing in this court than those proven in the superior court. Allusion is made to a decree of divorce granted to the husband of petitioner in Idaho, whereby the custody of the child was awarded to the mother, which fact counsel was unable to prove in the superior court. Nevertheless, the fact existed at the time of that trial, and the failure to prove or offer to prove it does not change the state of facts. The principle of res adjudicata applies as well to matters which might have been proven as to those actually offered in evidence. Were this not the law, the doctrine would not be efficacious, for a party could withhold evidence in one case and defeat the plea of res adjudicata by introducing it at a later trial of the same issues. The fact of the divorce existed, and was known at the time of the former hearing, and petitioner cannot now take advantage of her failure to produce the evidence.

Writ discharged.

In an action for services, if it was error to base an estimate of their reasonable value upon the agreed average earnings of other employees, the error was favorable to defendant, where the only evidence of reasonable value was testimony giving a higher value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Mustapha Abdullah, by Mike Aliskeroff, his guardian ad litem, against A. Abdullah. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred J. Spring and A. J. Getz, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him in favor of plaintiff, who is a minor and sues by his guardian ad litem. The plaintiff is the nephew of the defendant, and this action was brought to recover $572, money had and received by the defendant, together with $4,250, the alleged reasonable value of services as a masseur, rendered by the plaintiff over a period of 3½ years at a turkish bath establishment conducted by defendant, which services were rendered at the special instance and request of the defendant.

Defendant answered, denying the indebtedness for money had and received, and denying that the reasonable value of the services rendered was the sum alleged by plaintiff, and alleging that plaintiff had been fully paid for all services rendered for defendant. The answer was later amended so as to include an allegation that at all the times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiff was a member of the defendant's family, and the defendant bore to him the relation of a parent.

The trial court found:

> "That it is not true that at all times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint or at any time at all plaintiff was a member of defendant's family, and it is not true that defendant maintained plaintiff at all or any times according to his circumstances or in any other manner, and that it is not true that defendant was in the place of a parent toward plaintiff, but the court finds that the defendant never at any time exercised any control whatsoever over the plaintiff or stood in any relation whatsoever to this plaintiff, except as master and servant, and that it is not true that defendant did not make an agreement to pay plaintiff for his services, but the court finds it to be true that defendant did agree to pay plaintiff for his services."

[1, 2] Appellant contends that, under the evidence, the court should have found that the defendant was in loco parentis to the plaintiff, and under such a state of facts was entitled to receive without compensation the services of plaintiff and also the money earned by plaintiff by his services to others. The testimony upon this question is susceptible of conflicting inferences; and under such circumstances the findings of the trial court are conclusive upon us. The record contains testimony from which the findings just quoted may reasonably be made, for it appears that the plaintiff was living in Asia Minor with his parents when the defendant sent him money to come to California. When plaintiff reached Los Angeles, defendant paid for his room and board for about a week until he went to work at the Lankershim Hotel. After that plaintiff was given his meals at the hotel, and also received a salary of $40 a month. The check for his salary he regularly gave to the defendant, who told him he would save his money for him, as he could not keep money himself, being a minor. Defendant also told plaintiff that he would secure a bank book for him, and later showed him a bank book, which plaintiff did not examine. During the eight months that plaintiff worked at the hotel he gave all his salary checks to the defendant, and the defendant paid plaintiff's room rent, which was $6 a month. Defendant also bought plaintiff one $15 suit of clothes, and one $4 pair of shoes. He gave plaintiff no money during this time, and after eight months he told him to come and work for him at his turkish bath establishment at the Athletic Club in Los Angeles. Plaintiff testified that the defendant said to him in connection with this employment:

> "I have four or five others working for me. I will make a lot of money, and you will make the same thing as the others are making. Anything the others make they get 50 per cent. of. They are making $25 or $30 a week, or more. I mean 50 per cent. of the money they take in. If they take in $10, they get $5 of it."

Plaintiff testified that he went to work for the defendant on that understanding.

It was customary at the baths for the employees to sign their own names to the checks of the customers they serve, as a basis for computation of the amounts due them, upon the 50 per cent. basis, at the end of each week. Defendant instructed plaintiff to sign the defendant's name to plaintiff's checks, which he did, and in this way no accurate record was kept of the plaintiff's individual work, and defendant was given the money earned by them both. Plaintiff testified that during the 3½ years that he worked for the defendant at the baths defendant gave him in all $80, $75 at one time and $5 at another; that during this time plaintiff slept at the baths and bought his meals with the "tips" which he received from his customers, which amounted to something over $15 each week.

It was stipulated, among other things, that during plaintiff's employment at the baths he delivered to defendant two checks given by the Athletic Club to plaintiff as Christmas presents, which amounted to approximately $200. It was also stipulated that the average earnings, exclusive of tips, of the men employed by the defendant on a 50 per cent. basis during the period of plaintiff's employment was about $90 a month. There was introduced by the plaintiff the testimony of several employees of the establishment to the effect that the plaintiff did as much work as the other employees of the baths; that he was skillful and successful with his work and worked long hours; that many of the customers called for him personally. It also appears in the record that while the defendant was in Washington for a period of about eight or nine months plaintiff managed his business for him. Under these facts the court found that the reasonable value of plaintiff's services during the period from January 1, 1915, to July 17, 1918, was $3,870. Obviously this computation was made in accordance with the stipulation regarding the average earnings of other employees at the establishment.

The court also found that there was due the plaintiff $520, the amount of the salary checks and Christmas checks belonging to plaintiff which he had turned over to the defendant. The court then deducted the sum of $1,142 as money paid on account, which included all sums spent by defendant for the plaintiff of which there is any evidence at all, including traveling expenses from Asia Minor to Los Angeles, spending money advanced to him, room rent paid, etc., leaving a balance of $3,248, for which judgment was given.

[3] Apart from the contention regarding the domestic status of the parties, appellant objects to the method of proof of the amount found due to the plaintiff. He contends that, as plaintiff testified to an express contract to pay him 50 per cent. of his earnings, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove definitely the amount of the checks signed by him representing his work, and that the reasonable value of his services cannot be based upon the agreed average earning capacity of the other employees of the establishment doing similar work. If there was any error made by the court in basing the estimate of reasonable value upon the agreed average earnings of other employees, it was one favorable to the appellant under the facts in evidence here, because, if this basis were not adopted, then the record upon this subject contains only the testimony of the witnesses who testified that the reasonable value of plaintiff's services was from $110 to $125 a month.

[4, 5] There remains then only the question whether, under the proof, which appellant contends shows an express contract, recovery can be had for the reasonable value of the services, which is the theory of the complaint. Conceding that the proof showed that the inception of the business relations of the parties was in an express contract, this would not defeat a recovery by the plaintiff upon a quantum meruit basis. It is the privilege of an infant to repudiate an express contract for his services and recover for the same upon quantum meruit. See note to Tennessee Mfg. Co. v. James, 15 L. R. A. 211. The filing of the action for a recovery upon quantum meruit would be a sufficient notice to the defendant of a disaffirmance of the contract under the holding in the case of Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 303, 304, 104 Pac. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49, where the Supreme Court refers to the fact that it has been held that a deed of a minor may be disaffirmed by his subsequent conveyance to a third person.

We find no errors in the record which are prejudicial to the appellant.

RYAN et al. v. BUSICK, Judge, et al. (Civ. 2203.)

Injunction 🔑223(1)—Violation of temporary restraining order after determination of suit held not contempt.

Even if a temporary restraining order in mandamus proceedings against a judge remained in force for 30 days after the entry of the judgment denying the prayer of the petition, the judge and other officers of the court are not in contempt for violating the restraining order within that time, where they acted after full consideration of the question and with a bona fide intent to carry on the mandate of the court.

Mandamus proceedings by Ella Ryan and another against Hon. C. O. Busick, Judge, and others. On application by petitioners for an order declaring respondents in contempt of court for failure to observe terms of restraining order. Order to show cause vacated, and proceeding dismissed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Hughes, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding auxiliary to a matter pending in this court wherein the above-named petitioners prayed for a writ of mandate against the superior court and Hon. C. O. Busick, judge thereof, which prayer was denied on August 25th last. In that proceeding a restraining order pendente lite was issued. A few days after the entry of judgment denying the prayer of the petition the respondents proceeded to enforce the decree in the original action, the subject-matter of the application for the writ and restraining order.

Petitioners filed in this court their affidavit on proceedings to bring respondents into contempt for failure to observe the terms of the restraining order. An order to show cause was issued on August 30th last, and the matter has remained on the calendar since that date awaiting the filing of briefs by the respective parties. The matter ripened for decision only on November 10th.

The petitioners contend that, as the judgment of a District Court of Appeal does not become final until the lapse of the constitutional period of 30 days after rendition, the temporary restraining order which accompanied the alternative writ of mandate in this case continued in force for a like period. At the hearing on this contempt proceeding it was freely conceded by counsel for the petitioners that the respondents intended no contempt. In truth, it is wholly obvious that they were merely acting as officers of the law in the discharge of what they conceived to be their duty. It was shown that they examined into the matter with great care before proceeding. It clearly appears that, if any contempt was committed, it was purely technical. Even conceding that there existed a technical contempt, we conceive that the ends of justice and the dignity of the court would be conserved by discharging the order. However, we have examined the entire record with care, and we are persuaded that respondents are not in contempt.

The order to show cause is vacated, and the proceeding dismissed.

BRAGA v. PONTE. (Civ. 3557.)

1. Malicious prosecution 🔑64(2) — Evidence held not to show full disclosure to prosecuting attorney.

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence held not to show that defendant, who understood and spoke English imperfectly, had made a full disclosure of all the facts to his counsel and to the prosecuting attorney, on whose advice he instituted the prosecution.

2. Trial 🔑260(6)—Requested instruction as to disclosure to prosecuting attorney held covered.

In an action for malicious prosecution, where defendant relied on advice by the prosecuting attorney, the refusal of defendant's requested instruction that if he communicated to the district attorney all the material facts and acted upon the advice of the district attorney, malice was rebutted, and the jury should find for defendant, was not erroneously refused, where the court's instructions gave defendant the full benefit to which he was entitled from the fact that he consulted his own attorney and the district attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by James Braga against Joe Ponte. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. F. Lopez and Frank Kauke, both of Fresno, for appellant.

J. O. Traber, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff to recover damages for malicious prosecution. The facts of the case were, briefly, these: The plaintiff, in February, 1918, sold to one Joe T. Silva certain personal property, consisting of cows, horses, harness, a derrick, some milk cans, and 15 tons of hay, executing to the latter a bill of sale of said property, and delivering the same to him, and taking back a mortgage upon such of said personal property as was mortgageable to secure the payment of the purchase price thereof, which was to be made at the rate of $50 monthly on the 15th day of March, 1918, and continuing with interest until the whole amount was paid. Silva took the property in question, with some further personal property of his own, to the premises of the defendant herein, leaving the same in the latter's custody. A few months went by, when Silva, finding himself unable to keep up his payments, practically gave up his contract and went away to parts unknown. Before going he told the defendant to tell the plaintiff to come and get his property, and this information the defendant conveyed to the plaintiff, who acted upon it and went over to the premises of the defendant to get said personal property. When he arrived there the defendant was not at home, but came before plaintiff went away. In taking said property it appears that the plaintiff also took away certain small articles, such as a carpenter's level, a hammer and staples, a washtub and kettles, a set of harness and a hay derrick, which had not been included in his contract. The defendant, after making some effort to have these articles returned to him, went to see an attorney named Lopez, who, after hearing his story, advised that the matter be placed before the district attorney, whereupon the defendant and his attorney went to the office of the district attorney, and there saw one of the deputies, to whom he made some statement as to the facts of the case, and upon said statement was advised that he should swear to a complaint, charging the plaintiff with the commission of grand larceny. He thereupon made such complaint, charging the plaintiff with having stolen the aforementioned articles, which were not covered by his contract with Silva, and which were alleged in said complaint to be of the value of $60. The plaintiff was arrested, but upon his preliminary examination before the magistrate was discharged. He thereupon commenced this action against the defendant for malicious prosecution.

The main defense pleaded and attempted to be proven on the part of the defendant was that in causing the arrest of the plaintiff upon said charge he had acted without malice and upon the advice, not only of his personal attorney, Mr. Lopez, but also upon the advice of the deputy district attorney, after he had made to the latter a full and fair statement of the facts of the case, and upon such statement had been advised to make and prosecute said charge. Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff relied, not only upon the facts as narrated by him concerning the taking of the property in question from the premises of the defendant, but also upon the fact that he had been discharged by the committing magistrate. The defendant in his own behalf offered evidence tending to show that prior to making the arrest he had consulted his own attorney, and had stated to him all the facts of the case, and had also and upon his advice consulted the deputy district attorney of the county, and had made to him a full and fair statement of the facts of the case. Upon the submission of the cause the trial court gave certain instructions to the jury relative to the plaintiff's proofs and the defendant's aforesaid defenses. The jury retired, and presently returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $750 damages, for which judgment was presently entered, and it is from such judgment that the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The appellant makes two main contentions upon this appeal. The first of these is that the uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that before making the complaint charging the plaintiff with grand larceny the defendant in this case fully and fairly stated all of the facts of the case to his own attorney and also to the district attorney, and upon such statement was advised to make said complaint. As to this contention we are satisfied that the evidence was sufficiently in conflict with reference to the defendant's statement of the facts of the case to his counsel and to the deputy district attorney to justify the jury in finding that the statement which the defendant made to his attorney and to the district attorney prior to the filing of said complaint was not such a fair and full statement of all of the facts of the case as would suffice to relieve defendant from liability in the event of a dismissal of said charge. The evidence in the case shows that the defendant both spoke and understood the English language indifferently, and that in making whatever statement he did make to his attorney and to the deputy district attorney he failed—possibly for this reason—to make that full disclosure of the facts of the case which he should have done, and, it may be, would have done had he understood and spoken the English language better. Further than this, it appears that upon his statement of the case to his personal attorney he was not advised by him to make a criminal complaint against the plaintiff herein, but was advised to see the district attorney. Furthermore, it appears that Mr. Lopez did not appear as a witness in the case to testify that the defendant's statement to him was such a full and fair disclosure of all of the facts of the case as would have relieved the defendant of liability. The testimony given by the deputy district attorney, when tested by the plaintiff's cross-examination, brought forth a number of details affecting the merits of the case which were not conveyed to that official at the time his advice was sought. Evidently the jury did not believe that the defendant had made such a full and fair disclosure of the facts attending the taking of the property in question from the defendant's premises as would suffice to protect him against an action for malicious prosecution. The finding of the jury in that regard will not, therefore, be disturbed upon appeal.

[2] The defendant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in refusing to give the following specific instruction requested by him:

> "I instruct you that if the defendant before he commenced criminal prosecution against the plaintiff communicated to the district attorney all the material facts affecting the question of the guilt of the plaintiff about to be accused which were known to him, or of which he had notice, and he then acted upon the advice of the district attorney, the presumption of malice is rebutted and this action against him for malicious prosecution has failed, and you should find for the defendant."

We are of the opinion that the defendant was not injured by the failure of the trial court to give the specific instruction which he requested, for the reason that the instructions which the court did in fact give sufficiently and correctly stated the law upon the subject, and in doing so gave to the defendant the full benefit of any advantage or protection, to which he would otherwise be entitled, growing out of the fact that he consulted both a deputy district attorney and his own private counsel prior to making said criminal charge against the plaintiff. Under the instructions which the court gave, had the jury determined that the defendant had made a full and fair disclosure of the facts of the case either to his own counsel or to the deputy district attorney, their verdict would have been in his favor, and he cannot therefore be said to have been injured by the refusal of the court to give the instruction in the more limited form requested by him. As to the other strictures which the appellant makes upon the court's instructions, we do not find them of sufficient merit to require particular comment. The instructions of the court upon the whole informed the jury quite fully and very fairly as to the law relating to actions for malicious prosecution.

Finding no error in the record before us the judgment is affirmed.

STROMBERG v. TANFORAN et al.

1. Judgment ⚷590(5)—Conclusive as to entire cause, notwithstanding erroneous requirement of election.

An action to set aside a deed for fraud and duress is a single cause of action, though the fraud and duress were alleged in separate counts, and a judgment for defendant, after the trial court erroneously required plaintiff to elect to proceed on the first count alone, was conclusive against a second action to set aside the deed for duress, where it had been affirmed on the ground that the error in requiring the election was harmless, because the plaintiff had introduced her entire evidence and failed to establish duress.

2. Cancellation of instruments ⚷37(7)—Complaint held to show that duress did not cause execution of deed.

A complaint charging defendant with threats and duress against plaintiff to procure a deed, but alleging that plaintiff resisted the duress and did not execute the deed until induced by misrepresentations after the duress had ceased, shows that plaintiff cannot set aside the deed for duress.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Stella Stromberg against Frank C. Tanforan and others to set aside a deed. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph K. Hawkins, of San Rafeal, and Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought by plaintiff to set aside a deed.

To the plaintiff's complaint, alleging several grounds, to be hereafter referred to, as the basis of her cause of action, the defendants filed an answer containing specific denials thereof and pleas of the statute of limitations as a bar to said action. They also alleged, by way of affirmative defense, a state of facts in support of their plea of res adjudicata. The history of the litigation between the parties as thus shown by their pleadings may be summarized as follows:

Prior to the month of February, 1909, the plaintiff, whose name was then Stella Tanforan, and the defendant, Frank Tanforan, were husband and wife. Domestic troubles had arisen between them, which led to an agreement of separation and to the execution of a deed from the wife to her husband, both of which instruments were executed on the 18th day of February, 1909. The deed covered certain undivided interests in three parcels of property in Marin county, which constituted the separate estate of the wife, and were subject to a life tenancy of her mother, who was then living, and who died in the year 1913. Subsequently, and in the year 1910, Stella Tanforan commenced an action against her former husband, Frank Tanforan, to set aside said deed upon several grounds. In the first count of her amended complaint in said action she alleged that said deed was procured by said defendant through direct fraud in the making of certain misrepresentations of fact, in reliance upon which she had executed said deed. In the second count of her said amended complaint she charged said defendant with having procured said deed through actual duress consisting of menace and threats. The defendant in that action appeared and denied the averments of both counts of said complaint, and the cause came on for trial. At the commencement of such trial the court, upon the suggestion of the defendant, declared that the plaintiff's two counts were inconsistent, and that the plaintiff would ultimately be required to elect upon which one of said counts she would stand before the defendant would be required to put in his case. The court, however, stated that he would not compel such election until the plaintiff had introduced all her testimony. When the plaintiff had done this and had rested her case, the defendant moved that the plaintiff be required to elect upon which of the counts she would stand, and plaintiff thereupon elected to stand upon the first count in her said amended complaint. At the close of the trial the court made its findings in favor of the defendant, and entered its judgment accordingly, awarding the plaintiff no relief. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, and urged upon said appeal that the trial court was in error in requiring her to make an election. The cause on appeal was heard and decided by the Supreme Court in Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 159 Pac. 709. In passing upon the point urged by said plaintiff upon said appeal the Supreme Court decided that, while the trial court was in error in requiring the plaintiff to make an election between the two counts in her complaint, it was an error without injury to said plaintiff for the reason that the ruling of the trial court to that effect was made after all of the plaintiff's testimony in support of her whole case had been received, and when the record showed that no evidence whatever had been introduced by her in support of the averments of the second count in her said complaint charging the defendant therein with duress. The judgment was accordingly affirmed; and after said judgment had become final by such affirmance the plaintiff commenced the present action.

In her amended complaint in this action the plaintiff again seeks to set aside said deed, and in so doing undertakes to set forth in a single count substantially the same matters as those embraced in the two counts of her amended complaint in the former action. It is to this complaint that the defendants interposed the plea of res adjudicata, setting forth the rendition and finality of the former judgment. The trial court sustained said plea, and again rendered judgment in the defendant's favor, and from such judgment so rendered upon said ground this appeal has been taken.

[1] The main contention which the appellant urges upon this appeal is that the former judgment cannot be availed of by the defendants in bar of the present action, for the reason that in part at least the present action is founded upon the restatement of the facts set forth in the second count of her former action, and that since the trial court in such action had compelled her to make an election between the two counts in her amended complaint in said action, and to thus abandon the second count in said complaint, the judgment rendered in said action cannot be made the basis of a plea in bar of this action in so far as the same is based upon the defendant's alleged duress. This contention on the part of the appellant is founded upon the conception that, since her amended complaint in said former action contained two counts, it therefore contained two separate causes of action, one of which she was compelled to abandon in that action, and is therefore entitled to reassert in this one.

We are of the opinion that this is a mistaken conception on the appellant's part; that she had originally but one cause of action against the defendant, Frank Tanforan, namely, a cause of action to cancel and set aside her said deed to him upon whatever grounds she might assert as the reasons for its invalidity. She chose in her amended complaint in said former action to embody these grounds in two separate counts, but she did not thereby create two separate causes of action; and while the trial court in said cause was in error, as the Supreme Court in Tanforan v. Tanforan, supra, has stated, in requiring the said plaintiff to elect upon which count she would stand, it was an error which was harmless, for the reason that it was not committed until after the plaintiff had had her full opportunity to present all of the evidence she possessed in support of both counts of her complaint; and since she presented none in support of her second count in her said complaint the ruling of the trial court in that regard amounted to nothing more than its finding that there was no evidence before it to sustain the averments of said second count. It is true that the Supreme Court in its decision of said cause upon appeal made use of some loose language to the effect that the election which the trial court required amounted in effect to a nonsuit as to that count; and the plaintiff's insistence in the present action is largely based upon that statement. The record in the former case shows that the plaintiff therein not only failed to produce any evidence in support of the averments which were embraced in the second count of her complaint therein, but that she also failed to produce sufficient evidence to support the averments of the first count in said complaint; and she thus upon the trial of said action, with the full opportunity so to do, failed to support her cause of action, which was, as we have seen, an action to set aside said deed upon the grounds of fraud, misrepresentation and duress. Having thus had her full opportunity to present her single cause of action upon the merits thereof, and having failed so to do, and having suffered a judgment to be taken against her sustaining said deed against her assault upon these grounds, she cannot again be heard to assert either or any of said grounds in a new action against said defendant brought to set aside said conveyance.

It is not necessary to cite authorities upon the general subject of the applicability of the doctrine of res adjudicata to cases of this character; nor is it necessary to comment in detail upon the cases which have been referred to by the appellant as upholding her claim further than to say that in each of the cases relied upon by her two distinct and separate causes of action were embraced in the earlier suit, but one of which was decided upon its merits. In such cases, of course, there is no basis for the plea; but such cases are not analogous to the case at bar, in which, as we have seen, the plaintiff had originally but one cause of action, upon which the judgment of the trial court against her would operate as a bar to a further prosecution of that cause of action.

[2] It may be stated, however, that we are of the opinion that the judgment in the instant case should be affirmed upon another ground, which is that the amended complaint in this section, while setting forth a cause of action to set aside said deed upon the ground of fraud, wholly fails to state a cause of action to set aside said deed sounding in duress, since said amended complaint expressly alleges that while the defendant Tanforan did exercise toward her certain acts of menace and duress, she steadfastly refused to execute said deed while under the influence of such menace and duress, and that such deed when finally executed by her was so executed after the cessation of such menace and duress, and that the same was executed by her by reason of and under the influence alone of a mistake of fact arising out of the defendant's misrepresentations to her. This being the state of the plaintiff's own pleading, we are constrained to hold that her present action amounts to nothing more than a restatement of her former cause of action in so far as the same sounded in the defendant's alleged fraud and misrepresentation, and as to these grounds the judgment of the trial court in the former action is conclusive.

This determination of the main point urged by the appellant upon this appeal against her contention renders unnecessary a consideration of the question as to whether this action was not also barred by the statute of limitations.

Judgment affirmed.

In an action for injuries occasioned by an automobile negligently operated, the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case by showing that the automobile belonged to the defendant; and, to successfully rebut the presumption of agency of the negligent operator, evidence must be introduced which carries conviction to the mind of the court.

2. Evidence 🔑588—Court may reject uncontradicted unimpeached positive testimony.

The court may reject positive testimony, although it is not contradicted or impeached by any direct testimony, since its inherent probability may be such as to deny it all claims to belief, and a witness' manner of testifying may give rise to doubts as to his sincerity, or create the impression that the facts testified to by him are colored or not correctly stated.

3. Master and servant ⚷332(1)—Agency of automobile operator held question for jury.

In an action for injuries in a collision between defendant's automobile and plaintiff's motorcycle, whether the operator of the automobile was an agent for defendant at the time of the accident held for the jury, although defendant testified that the operator was not his agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by William Dierks, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Henry Dierks, against William A. Newsom and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court; WILBUR, J., dissenting.

Cooley & Lachmund, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geo. K. Ford, A. S. Humphreys, and Elliott Johnson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant William A. Newsom from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages resulting from a collision between said defendant's automobile and a motorcycle operated by the plaintiff.

For the purposes of the appeal the parties have stipulated that the evidence introduced at the trial of the case shows that the plaintiff was injured, and damaged to the full amount of the judgment by reason of the negligent operation of the appellant's automobile by his codefendant, Charles Gregory, who while driving the car, ran into plaintiff, who was riding upon a motorcycle, exercising proper care in its operation and guilty of no contributory negligence. The sole question presented for determination is whether or not the appellant, as the owner of the automobile. is responsible for the negligence of said Gregory.

The latter, as a witness upon the trial, testified:

"I am one of the defendants and am 20 years old. I was a student at the Vocational High School in Oakland, and on September 4, 1917, I was driving the defendant Newsom's automobile when I ran into and injured the plaintiff. I was going to Mr. Newsom's home to leave the machine there. I had taken the machine from Mr. Newsom's garage that morning. * * * I took it down to the Vocational High School for the purpose of repairing the starter. * * * It was a frequent occurrence for me to drive Mr. Newsom's machine. On one occasion I believe I drove Mr. Newsom down to Twenty-Third Avenue Station. I think that is the only occasion I ever drove him in the machine, but I had driven it on a number of occasions. The first occasion of my driving that machine was on the invitation of Mr. Newsom's son, Jack Newsom. That was about May, 1917. I had taken the Newsom car down to the school for repairs on two or three occasions prior to September 4, 1917. My memory is not clear as to the number of occasions upon which I took the car down.

"Q. Well, had anybody asked you to take the machine down to the school to be repaired on the occasion other and prior to the one of September 4th? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Who had done that? A. I think on one occasion it was Mr. Newsom.

"Q. And those are the only two occasions prior to this that you had taken the car down? A. So far as I can remember. Jack Newsom asked me to take the car to the school on September 4, 1917. * * * I do not remember Mr. Newsom ever saying anything to me about going to the garage and taking out the machine to have it repaired. He would say, 'Well, Charley, can't you take the machine down to the school to-day and have it greased up?' something of that sort; I don't know his exact words. I took the machine to the school for other purposes than greasing it on occasions previous to September 4th. I might repair a crank case. I did not take the machine out for other purposes than greasing and repairing it, at the request of Mr. Newsom. On the day of the accident, September, 4, 1917, Jack Newsom requested me to take the machine down to be repaired. He did so about 7:30 that morning in Mr. Newsom's yard. I do not know who first told me on this occasion that the machine needed repairing. I do not remember that Mrs. Newsom told me—I have no recollection of that. I was at the Newsom home September 3, but did not talk with anybody in particular, except Mr. Newsom's daughter. Half of the family was out on the porch, and I think I got the idea from their talking between themselves that the car was not running good. Mrs. Newsom and her two daughters were there, but Mr. Newsom and Jack Newsom were not there. * * * My best recollection is that on the morning of the accident, while I was in the car, I saw Mr. Newsom going to the street car, and said 'Good morning' to him."

Appellant William A. Newsom testified as follows:

"Q. Had you authorized or told your son Jack Newsom to have your machine repaired or turned over to Gregory on this occasion? A. No, sir.

"Q. Have you ever at any time given your son authority to have your machine repaired? A. No, sir.

"Q. Mr. Gregory had taken your machine on previous occasions, had he not, to the school to be repaired? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. On those occasions you gave him permission to take it, or gave instructions with regard to repairing it? A. I did. * * * On the day of the accident I was in Fresno, and did not know that any work at all was being done on my car."

On cross-examination he said:

"Mr. Gregory has spoken of repairs on my different machines over a period of three or four years, and it may have been that particular machine might have been fixed by him, but I have no recollection of it. He had always taken my other two cars down to the school to be repaired, with my permission and consent. * * * Gregory had been doing repair work on my machine over a period of two or three years. I had had two other cars besides this one, and he had worked on them. He had taken them to the school—always with my permission and consent. I am not sure about the time this particular machine was taken to the school before—it may have gone once; I could not answer that question to be sure. * * * I remember some 4 or 5 months previous I sent the car down by Gregory. I had had this car about 16 or 18 months. I did not have more than one car at a time. All my cars had been for the general use of the family. I did not drive the car myself. Our boy, Jack, drove the car, with my permission. I did not know anything about the mechanism of automobiles myself, but I took an interest in its mechanical condition, and I certainly knew about it when it was to be repaired. I would find out that the car needed repairs by some one informing me of the fact. The car never went out without my being one of the passengers, hardly. About the only time that the car went out was on Sunday, when I would always be with the family.

"Q. Your boy Jack had permission to take it out? A. Well, if he did—he took it without me.

"Q. If your son Jack had your permission to take that car out, would you go with him, or his mother? A. Well, he would have to get permission at the time, on the occasion he went out.

"Q. He had no carte blanche to take it, and by that, if he had made the request, you would have granted the request? A. When he asked me sometimes I let him take it out.

"Q. What was the arrangement about your wife having the use of this car, the machine? A. Most times, when my wife went out, she would tell me before she went out she was going to take a ride, and Jack was going to take her out.

"Q. She would tell you? A. She would ask me about it; yes. She sometimes went out without my being present. She would ask me if she could have Jack drive her out.

"Q. Did your daughters or your son, with your permission or your consent, take that car out there very much without consulting yourself and your wife? A. No.

"Q. They did not? A. No; they did not.

"Q. Was there any permission granted to Gregory on the day he took this automobile involved in the accident, down to the school? A. No.

"Q. Had there in fact been a permission? A. No—by me, you mean?

"Q. Yes. Well, I might go back on these previous occasions when he had taken it down; did you object to his having taken it? A. No; because I always told him to take it on all previous occasions; I had told him to take it. On the previous occasions when the car had been taken by Gregory to the school to be repaired, I had learned it needed repairs by driving out in the car with my boy Jack, and I would notice something was wrong with the car. I would not know what particularly went wrong with it. I would simply know that the car was not working right. Up to the time of the accident, September 4, 1917, Jack was the only one in the family that knew how to drive the car."

[1, 2] The plaintiff made out a prima facie case against the appellant when he showed that the auto causing the injury by the negligent manner of its operation belonged to the appellant. It has been held in California and other jurisdictions that evidence of the ownership of a vehicle raises a prima facie presumption, amounting to evidence of the fact, that the person operating it is doing so as the agent of the owner. McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 Pac. 417. To successfully rebut this presumption evidence must be introduced which carries conviction to the mind of the court. Here it may be said that the evidence introduced by the appellant made out a complete defense if full credence was given to it by the trial court; but the court was not bound thus to unreservedly accept it, even if uncontradicted. The court saw and heard the witnesses testify, and with this advantage, not enjoyed by us, it was for it to determine the degree of credence to be accorded to this testimony. It is not essential that the credulity of the court should correspond with the positiveness with which a witness testifies. A court may reject positive testimony, although it be not contradicted or impeached by any direct testimony. Its inherent improbability may be such as to deny it all claims to belief. A witness' manner of testifying may give rise to doubts as to his sincerity, or create the impression that the facts testified to by him are colored or not correctly stated. Co. of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 35, 57 Pac. 681; Bellus v. Peters, 165 Cal. 112, 117, 130 Pac. 1186; P. C. F. Co. v. Sheriffs, 31 Cal. App. 137, 159 Pac. 986; Denison v. McNorton, 228 Fed. 401, 406, 142 C. C. A. 631.

[3] But we are also satisfied that there was a conflict in the testimony in an important respect, for Charles Gregory testified that when he took charge of the car in the morning of the accident he saw and spoke to the appellant. If the court believed this testimony it follows that it rejected that of the appellant to the effect that he was in Fresno on the day of the accident; and he may have viewed with distrust other material statements made by him. and have concluded that the appellant, having seen Gregory driving the car on that morning, and, not objecting thereto, ratified his action in taking the car for the purpose of having it repaired. In support of the judgment we are bound to assume that the court took this view of the record.

The trial court having thus concluded upon sufficient evidence that Gregory was authorized by the appellant to take the car for the purpose of having it repaired, its judgment holding the appellant responsible for Gregory's negligence in performing his mission must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SOURBIS v. RHODES et al. (Civ. 2207.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1024(3)—Conflict in affidavits must be resolved in favor of the prevailing party.

Upon an appeal from an order granting a change of venue made under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, requiring cases to be tried in the county in which defendants, or some of them, reside, any conflict in the affidavits must be resolved in favor of the prevailing defendants, for the rule as to presentation of oral testimony for review controls.

2. Venue 🔑62—Unnecessary that all defendants join in motion for change.

Code Civ. Proc. § 395, requires the action to be tried in the county in which at least some of the defendants reside, and the consent of a defendant not residing in the county where the action is brought could not take away from the others not residing there the right to have the cause transferred to their county of residence, so it was unnecessary that all defendants join in the motion for change.

3. Venue 🔑45—A party moving for change may show by affidavits or otherwise that other defendant was fraudulently joined.

Notwithstanding a complaint is sufficient as to all defendants, a defendant moving for change of venue may make sufficient showing, by affidavits or otherwise, that plaintiff has no cause of action against a defendant consenting to the venue, and that he and plaintiff are the only real parties to the controversy, but the court should exercise a wise discretion in deciding whether plaintiff has acted fraudulently in joining the consenting defendant.

4. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of merits on motion for change held sufficient.

An affidavit of meritorious defense upon motion for change of venue, showing that defendant had presented his case fully and fairly to one of his counsel, who is a licensed attorney in good standing, and who advised he had a good and substantial defense on the merits, held a sufficient compliance with the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by John Sourbis against F. F. Rhodes and others. From an order granting a motion for change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Griffin, Boone & Boone, of Modesto, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the motion for change of the place of trial. The action was brought in San Joaquin county, and there were three defendants. Two of these, F. F. Rhodes and Robert L. Dallas, appeared in the action and filed a demurrer, and demanded that the action be transferred to Stanislaus county for trial. In support of their demand they filed an affidavit of merits, containing an allegation that each was a resident of said county of Stanislaus, and that the other defendant S. Leon was not at the time of the commencement of the action or at any time since a resident of said county of San Joaquin. They also based the motion for the change of venue, as provided in section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon the ground:

> "That the said S. Leon was impliedly joined as a defendant in said action, and was made a defendant solely for the purpose of having the action tried where he resides, and that the place of residence of said S. Leon must not and should not be considered in determining the proper county for the trial of the action."

[1] In considering the affidavits used upon the said motion this court is bound by the same rule that controls where oral testimony is presented for review. "If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered established." McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 462, 36 Pac. 8; Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 18, 91 Pac. 1001; Henderson v. Cohen, 10 Cal. App. 585, 102 Pac. 826. So considering the affidavits, we must hold that the moving defendants were residents of the county of Stanislaus, and that said Leon resided in another county than the one where the action was brought. It was proper, therefore, for the court to grant the motion as contemplated by said section 395, which provides that the action "must be tried in the county in which defendants or some of them reside."

[2] Nor was it necessary for all of the defendants to join in said motion. It is unimportant that defendant Leon may have been willing to have the action tried in said county of San Joaquin. The language of said section requires the action to be tried in the county in which at least some of the defendants reside. The consent of a defendant not residing in the county where the action is brought could not take away from the other defendants who did not reside there the right to have the cause transferred to the county of their residence. To hold otherwise would be a violation of the provisions of section 395. Wood Curtis & Co. v. Herman Min. Co., 139 Cal. 713, 73 Pac. 588. See, also, Ludington Exploration Co. v. La Fortuna Min. Co., 4 Cal. App. 369, 88 Pac. 290.

[3] From the allegations of the affidavits

the court was also legally justified in concluding that plaintiff had no cause of action against said Leon, but that the latter was joined as a defendant solely for the purpose of defeating the right of the other defendants to have the action transferred to the place of their residence. Said section of the Code contemplates a case of that kind, and respondents seem to have brought themselves within the spirit and letter of the rule. Of course, upon a hearing of this character it is not proper to have a trial of the cause upon its merits. This has been clearly decided, and must be deemed settled beyond controversy. The rule, however, does not extend to the point of precluding the real defendants from showing, by affidavits or otherwise, that the plaintiff has actually no cause of action against one of the parties, who was made nominally a defendant but was joined simply for the fraudulent purpose of depriving the real defendants of their right to have the action tried in the place of their residence. If the complaint did not state a cause of action against a defendant who was a resident of the county where the action was brought, it is not disputed that the other defendants could have the action removed for trial to the place of their residence. McDonald v. California Timber Co., 151 Cal. 159, 90 Pac. 548. The same result should follow, if, notwithstanding the sufficiency of the complaint, it can be shown that the claim against the resident defendant is a mere pretense and made only for the purpose of having the action tried in the county where the complaint is filed. If the contention of appellant should prevail, it would enable a plaintiff by fictitiously joining a resident of the county as a defendant with the residents of another county, who are the real defendants in interest, to prevent the latter from having the action tried in the county of their residence. We think it is proper in such proceeding for the court to permit a defendant who is moving for a change of venue to make sufficient showing to convince the court that he, in connection with the plaintiff, is the only real party in interest in the controversy. Of course, the court should exercise a wise discretion in passing upon the question whether the plaintiff has acted fraudulently in joining another party defendant.

[4] We are satisfied that appellant's claim, that the affidavit of merits is insufficient, cannot be upheld. The allegation in that respect is:

> "That I have fully and fairly stated the case in this cause, and all the facts of the case in this cause and in the above-entitled action to Frank G. Boone, of Modesto, California, one of my attorneys and counsel, and who is an attorney at law in good standing and licensed to practice in all of the courts of the state of California, and who resides as aforesaid in the city of Modesto, county of Stanislaus, state of California, and that after such statement to my said attorney as aforesaid, I am and was advised by my said attorney and verily believe that I have good and substantial defense on the merits to the said action."

That the above is a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the statute clearly appears from Watt v. Bradley, 95 Cal. 415, 30 Pac. 557, and Nolan v. McDuffie, 125 Cal. 334, 58 Pac. 4.

We think no sound reason has been advanced for a reversal and the order is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN. (Cr. 531.)

1. Embracery 🔑4—Indictment for attempting to influence juror held sufficiently specific.

An indictment charging that defendant corruptly and feloniously requested a juror to hang the jury was sufficient, under Pen. Code, § 95, without stating the words used by accused to the juror.

2. Embracery 🔑5—Conviction of attempting to influence juror sustained by evidence.

A conviction of corruptly attempting to influence a juror, under Pen. Code, § 95, was sustained by evidence of the juror in question that accused requested him to hang the jury.

3. Criminal law 🔑372(1)—Evidence showing general scheme to corrupt verdict admissible.

In a prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence a juror, under Pen. Code, § 95, subd. 1, in that the defendant requested a certain juror to hang the jury, it was proper to admit evidence that the accused approached another juror in the same case and requested him also to hang the jury, on the ground that it showed a general scheme or effort on the part of accused to corrupt the verdict in the case.

4. Criminal law 🔑371(1, 12) — Evidence of other crimes competent to prove intent and motive.

In every criminal trial it is competent for the prosecution to prove both an intent and a motive, and whenever proposed evidence of another crime tends to prove the intent to commit the crime charged, or the motive for its commission, it is admissible, even though it may incidentally show that the person on trial may have committed the other crime.

5. Embracery ⚷5—No error in admitting evidence of honesty and excluding reputation for truth.

Court did not err in permitting evidence on the part of defendant, accused of attempting to influence a juror, to show his general reputation for honesty and integrity, but excluding evidence as to his reputation for truth; the issue being as to the honesty and integrity of the accused rather than his truthfulness.

6. Criminal law ⚷1170(1) — Exclusion of evidence of reputation for truth held harmless, if error.

If court erred in permitting evidence on the part of accused to show his general reputation for honesty and integrity, but excluded evidence as to his reputation for truth, it was too trivial to warrant a reversal.

7. Criminal law ⚷829(3)—No error in refusing to define word properly defined in another instruction.

In a prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence a juror, the court did not err in refusing to give an instruction, requested by defendant, defining the word "corrupt," where such word was properly defined in an instruction given at the instance of the prosecution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

John Martin was convicted of corruptly attempting to influence a juror, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, and E. R. Vaughan, of Santa Rosa (S. Luke Howe, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The appellant was indicted by the grand jury of the county of Sacramento, for the crime of "corruptly attempting to influence a juror, a felony." One Fuski was being tried on an indictment, and after a juror, Manuel J. Lamb, was duly impaneled and sworn, it is charged that the appellant corruptly and feloniously attempted to influence the aforesaid juror by then and there requesting him to hang the jury. The appellant, on arraignment, interposed a demurrer to the indictment upon the ground that the act charged is not stated with such degree of certainty as to state a public offense, nor to enable the court to pronounce a judgment upon conviction. The appellant claims that the indictment does not charge what words were used by the appellant to the juror. Subdivision 1 of section 95 of the Penal Code provides that any person who corruptly and feloniously attempts to influence a juror in respect to his verdict by means of any oral communication is guilty, etc.

[1] The indictment, when it charges that the appellant corruptly and feloniously requested the juror to hang the jury, charges, without other or further language, the crime denounced by the statute. The indictment is sufficient.

[2] The appellant interposed his plea of not guilty and after trial before a jury was duly convicted and sentenced. It is insisted that the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction. But the juror in question testified clearly and distinctly that the appellant requested him to hang the jury. This, beyond question, was clearly sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how this point could be seriously urged.

[3] The chief alleged error, however, relied upon by the appellant, consists in the admission of evidence that the appellant approached another juror in the same case and requested him, also, to hang the jury. This evidence was admitted by the trial court upon the ground that it showed a general scheme or effort on the part of the appellant to corrupt the verdict in the Fuski Case. For this purpose it was highly relevant and pertinent and it was properly admitted. It is true that, in general, a defendant on trial may rest secure in the knowledge that he is called upon to prepare to meet but one charge at a time, and that evidence of other crimes, whether similar or dissimilar, is not admissible. This is a very insistent rule of the law, but it has several well-defined exceptions.

[4] In every criminal trial it is competent for the prosecution to prove both an intent and a motive. Whenever the proposed evidence of another crime tends to prove the intent to commit the crime charged or the motive for its commission, it is admissible, even though it may incidentally show that the person on trial has committed the other crime. In this case, the evidence of an attempt to influence another juror in the same manner and for the same purpose is highly important as showing the guilt of the appellant. It has been held that, in a charge of forgery, evidence of the uttering of other forged notes of the same manufacture and about the same time is admissible (People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 518; People v. Whiteman, 114 Cal. 338, 46 Pac. 99), or to show the motive or intent (People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 Pac. 43), and a long array of cases there cited. The rule is so well established that an extended examination of authorities in its support is unnecessary. It only remains to inquire whether or not this evidence tends to show either motive or intent with reference to the crime for which the appellant was on trial. That it tends to show a corrupt intent to bring about an acquittal or a hung jury in the particular case in which the juror was sitting would seem to be too plain for question; and from a like point of view it tends to show an intent to corrupt the juror Lamb. For the purpose of showing either of these points, the evidence was admissible.

[5, 6] The court permitted evidence on the part of the defendant to show his general reputation for honesty and integrity, but excluded evidence as to his reputation for truth. In view of the close line of cleavage between the characteristics of truth and honesty, the court might well have allowed the offered evidence, though we are not prepared to say that the court erred in excluding it. The issue was as to the honesty and integrity of the appellant, rather than his truthfulness. Moreover, the error in excluding the proffered evidence, if error there was, is too trivial to warrant a reversal. But in People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 Pac. 228, the court says:

> "Evidence is not admissible to prove that the character of a witness [in that case he was the defendant] for truthfulness is good, unless the opposite party has tried to impeach him by showing that his general reputation is bad."

In the Cowgill Case the defendant sought to show his reputation for truth under his general plea of not guilty.

Error is predicated upon the action of the court in striking out the answer of the witness Payne to the effect that he had never heard the reputation of the appellant questioned. The answer was stricken out upon the express ground that it was not responsive to the question. This ruling was right. The witness was subsequently permitted by the court to give even stronger answers upon the same subject. The defendant has no cause to complain of the matter.

The objection that the defendant was not permitted to state his intention in talking with the juror Lamb is not supported by the record. It is true that the court struck out an answer of the defendant concerning his intentions, but it was stricken out on the ground that it was not responsive. The answer was not responsive; but, whether so or not, the defendant, in the answers that followed, was permitted to go into the matter at length.

[7] The final point urged for a reversal is that the court refused to give two instructions offered by the defendant, one defining the word "corrupt," and the other erroneously attempting to set out the definition of a corrupt communication to a juror. The word "corrupt" was properly defined in an instruction given at the instance of the prosecution, and the instruction as to a corrupt communication is not a correct statement of the law.

On the whole case, we are satisfied that the defendant had a fair trial and that he was properly convicted. The crime committed by the defendant is one of the most grave in the whole list of crimes, since, if successful, it corrupts the very fountains of justice and it rightly merits the severe penalties of the law. We see no adequate reason to disturb the verdict.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEVOY. (Cr. 920.)

1. Infants ⚿20—Age of child assaulted must be established by evidence.

It is essential to conviction for lewd acts upon a child under Penal Code, § 288, that the child attacked was under the age of 14 years, and that fact must be established by evidence, the jury not being permitted to guess it from the appearance of the child on the witness stand, especially where the court did not instruct them they must find that fact.

2. Infants ⚿20 — Evidence prosecutrix was little child does not show that she was under 14.

In a prosecution for lewd acts upon a child under 14, testimony by witnesses referring to prosecutrix as a little child or as a little girl does not justify the conclusion that she was under the age of 14 years.

3. Infants ⚿20—Answer to questions to determine qualification cannot prove age before jury.

Answers by prosecutrix to questions by the court before any witnesses were sworn to determine her qualification as a witness are not evidence before the jury from which they can find that she was under the age of 14 years.

4. Witnesses ⚿40(2) — Competency of child a question for court.

The competency of a young girl alleged to have been the subject of a lewd attack was a question within the court's discretion and was not an issue before the jury.

5. Criminal law ⚿1186(4)—Failure to prove essential fact requires reversal; "error resulting in miscarriage of justice."

Total failure of proof of an essential fact, in the absence of which no crime was committed, is not a question of error resulting in a miscarriage of justice within the terms of Const. art. 6, § 4½, but requires a reversal of the conviction.

Frank Levoy was convicted of lewd acts upon a child under the age of 14 years, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lawlor and Olney, JJ., dissenting.

Kenneth M. Green, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Appellant was tried and convicted on information charging him with the violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, which defines as a felony certain lewd and lascivious acts upon the body of a child under the age of 14 years. After the jury was impaneled and sworn to try the case, and before any witnesses were sworn, the court interrogated the little girl who was the subject of the alleged attack for the purpose of determining whether she was qualified to appear as a witness. The court, having satisfied itself that she was competent to testify, instructed the clerk to swear her as a witness. She was thereupon sworn and testified to the facts which were the basis of the prosecution. She was followed by her mother, who corroborated her in certain particulars, and the people rested. The defendant took the stand in his own behalf and denied in particular all the testimony of the prosecution's witnesses. There was no evidence of any character attempting to prove the age of the child, and this is the ground which is assigned for the reversal of the judgment.

[1] Under the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code it is essential that the subject of the attack must be a child under the age of 14 years, and proof of that fact must be made. The answer made to the attack upon the verdict is that the jury had the child before it and could reasonably conclude from what it saw that she was under the age of 14 and that throughout the trial she was frequently referred to as a "little child" or a "little girl." But, if the jury should be permitted to fix the age of the child simply by viewing her while a witness upon the stand, this essential issue of the prosecution might be determined by mere guesswork. Probably no great harm would result to a defendant through this method in a case where the child was apparently under the age of 14 if the court would instruct the jury upon that issue, but no such instruction was given in this case.

[2] On the second proposition the mere reference to a witness as a "little child" or as a "little girl" does not alone justify the conclusion that she was a child under the age of 14 years.

[3] It is also argued that the statements of the child made in answer to the questions of the court before she was sworn as a witness may be treated as evidence of her age. But that interrogation involved only the question of the competency of the girl to testify, a matter which was not controverted by defendant. Her competency was a question within the discretion of the court (People v. Stouter, 142 Cal. 146, 151, 75 Pac. 780; People v. Bradford, 1 Cal. App. 41, 43, 81 Pac. 712), and was not an issue before the jury.

[4] The verdict of the jury must be supported by the evidence produced at the trial, and it is too plain to question that, if a verdict is based upon facts which were not in evidence, it cannot be sustained.

Furthermore, there being no competent evidence of the age of the child, and no attempt having been made by the prosecution to prove that fact, the defendant was not called upon to meet the question of the age of the child as he might have done if such evidence had been presented to the jury. In any event, it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove the fact which was made an essential issue by the Penal Code section.

[5] This is not a question of error resulting in a miscarriage of justice within the terms of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, but is a total failure of proof of an essential fact, in the absence of which no crime was committed under the Penal Code section.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

HOBSON v. SILVEA. (Civ. 2031.)

1. Livery stable and garage keepers ⟴7—Complaint held to allege damage from loss of automobile.

A complaint to recover for the loss of plaintiff's automobile while stored in defendant's garage, which alleged that by reason of defendant's negligence the property of the plaintiff was lost to him in the sum of $1,000, in legal effect alleges damage from the destruction of the automobile, though the word "damage" was not actually used in the complaint.

In a complaint for the destruction of plaintiff's automobile by fire while stored in defendant's garage, allegations that defendant neglected to remove the property from the garage when threatened by fire, and neglected to allow others to remove it, and by reason of his negligence the property was destroyed, are sufficient allegations of negligence.

A tender of the storage charges on plaintiff's automobile is not necessary to a recovery by plaintiff for the destruction of his automobile because of defendant's negligence, though it would be necessary in a suit to replevin the automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by G. D. Hobson against John Silvea. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Roscoe J. Anderson, of Redding, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. In this case the respondent brought his action against the appellant to recover damages for the loss of an automobile stored in the latter's garage. The allegations of the complaint are in substance that the appellant received the automobile for storage in his garage at an agreed monthly rental; that the garage was situated across the street from a large hotel; that the hotel caught on fire and was wholly consumed; that the fire spread and passed across the street and ignited the appellant's garage, and totally consumed and destroyed the automobile. The fire occurred in a small village, and within a few minutes after it was discovered the entire population of the village, including the appellant, gathered at the scene of the fire, and made efforts to suppress it. The appellant had on the same side of the street with his garage and a short distance therefrom a larger and presumably more valuable building, and he devoted his attention constantly to this building to the neglect of the garage and its contents. The precise period of time during which the appellant was at the scene of the fire and before the garage had become so far destroyed as to render a rescue of the automobile impossible is somewhat uncertain, but probably about half an hour. The appellant made no effort to remove the automobile from the garage, nor did he solicit the help of any of the bystanders for that purpose. The door of the garage was locked, and several bystanders, who attempted to force an entrance for the puropse of removing the automobile, were unsuccessful. One of the bystanders went to the appellant and asked for the key to the garage. The answer of the appellant is not known, as the commotion and noise drowned his voice, but he motioned towards the burning hotel. The party then turned towards the hotel to see if he could find any one who had the key. He was unsuccessful in his efforts. The evidence shows that the appellant is an aged man and at the time of the fire was in ill health, and also that he was unable to manipulate the running of an automobile. It is further shown, however, that the exit from the garage and from the point in the garage where the automobile stood, slopes downward, so that a person, whether skilled or unskilled in the manipulation of an automobile, could, by removing some obstructions placed before the wheels, run the automobile out of the garage without turning on the power. The complaint shows that the automobile had a value of about $1,000, although the trial court found that it was not more than $650. The trial court sustained all the allegations of the complaint, and rendered judgment in favor of the respondent for damages. The appellant offered no evidence.

The appellant insists that his demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. We are not able to concur in this view. He complains that it is difficult to describe the complaint by reference to any of the forms known to the common law. The action, however, is an action on the case, and the allegations of the complaint are appropriate to that form of action.

[1] The appellant urges the point that the complaint does not in terms aver any damage to the respondent. It is true that the word "damage" is not actually used in the complaint, but other words, the equivalent thereof, are used. One part of the complaint reads:

> "By reason of the failure, refusal, and negligence of the defendant, as aforesaid, the said properties of the plaintiff became and were wholly lost to the plaintiff herein, in the sum of $1,003."

This, in legal effect, is an averment of damage arising from the destruction of the automobile.

[2] It is further insisted that the complaint does not aver any negligence on the part of the appellant, but a reference to paragraph 5 of the complaint shows that this claim is without foundation. In said paragraph it is expressly averred that the appellant neglected to remove the property from the garage, and also that he neglected to allow others to remove it, and by reason of his negligence the property was destroyed. These allegations in terms show the negligence of the appellant. The demurrer (as to this point) is general, and the complaint is good as against a general demurrer.

[3] Moreover, as to a mere defective allegation, it is the rule that if the complaint, taken as a whole, substantially covers the point, then the defective allegation will not be permitted to defeat the judgment when reviewed on appeal. In this connection the cases of Rooney v. Gray, 145 Cal. 753, 79 Pac. 523, and Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman Co., 6 Cal. App. 58, 91 Pac. 425, are in point.

[4] The next point urged in support of reversal is that there is no allegation in the complaint that the respondent paid to the appellant the agreed monthly storage. This is true, but the respondent is not suing for the property. If he were suing in replevin, a tender of the charges might be necessary. He is not suing for the property, nor is he suing for its value. His action is for damages for a distinct tort, having no reference to the contract of bailment other than that the contract, by its terms, devolved upon the appellant the duty of exercising ordinary care in the preservation of the property. The suit being for a failure to exercise this ordinary care, it can be maintained without reference to the tender of any charges. These observations cover also the point that the respondent made no demand for the property. No demand is alleged in the complaint, and none was necessary. The plaintiff, however, proved a demand for damages.

[5] We think the chief point urged by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court. The evidence in the case is such that findings in behalf of either party could and would be sustained by an appellate court. It is a familiar doctrine that a court on appeal will not interfere with the finding of the lower court if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding.

[6] The evidence does substantially show that the appellant stood by for a period of time ranging from 20 to 30 minutes watching the fire, and without making any effort to remove the automobile from the impending danger. This omission occurred after the danger of destruction of the garage became imminent, and after the attention of the appellant had been drawn to the danger. Under these circumstances it would be difficult to say that the trial court was not justified in finding that the loss occurred through the negligent omission of the appellant, and this is all that is necessary to sustain the judgment.

CARTER v. BRODER. (Civ. 2177.)

1. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of merits sufficient where stating facts which prima facie fully answer action.

Affidavit of merits for change of venue, alleging that defendant stated "his case" to his attorneys, even if construed as an allegation merely that he stated "his defense," is sufficient where containing a statement of facts which, prima facie, fully and completely answer the action.

2. Venue 🔑66—Affidavits of merits considered together.

Two affidavits of merits on motion for change of venue may be considered together for testing the sufficiency of showing of defense on the merits.

3. Venue 🔑66—Affidavits of merits, showing defense to part of claim not admitted, sufficient.

Affidavit of merits on motion for change of venue is sufficient if showing defense to the part of claim in excess of amount admitted.

4. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of merits may be good, though showing unexecuted accord and satisfaction.

An affidavit of merits on motion for change of venue is not bad because setting up an accord and satisfaction, unexecuted by defendant, of the claim sued on; it indicating that such nonexecution was due entirely to plaintiff's fault or omission of a duty imposed by the agreement on him.

5. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of merits not necessarily bad because stating a conclusion of law.

Affidavit of merits on motion for change of venue is not insufficient because of a statement which, taken alone, is a mere conclusion of law; it being buttressed by other declarations of fact not involving conclusions.

6. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of merits need not set out defense in full.

Affidavit of merits on motion for change of venue need not set out in full the defense relied on; but it is enough to show that defendant, on stating the facts to his attorney, was advised that he has a defense that will address itself to the merits, and not merely to matters of form.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence N. Raker, Judge.

Action by C. T. Carter against J. Broder. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. A. Laird and E. C. Bonner, both of Alturas, and Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jamison & Wylie, Daly B. Robnett, and Oscar Gibbons, all of Alturas, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Modoc, denying the motion of defendant and appellant to change the place of trial of said action from the county of Modoc to the city and county of San Francisco. The defendant and appellant at the time of the filing of his demurrer also filed his demand in writing that the trial of said action be had in the proper county, and accompanied said demurrer and written demand with affidavits of merits and a notice of motion to change the place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco as the proper county for the trial.

Defendant's motion was heard on the 12th day of November, 1919, counsel for plaintiff and for defendant being personally present in court, and said motion was presented upon the complaint of the plaintiff and demurrer of the defendant as well as the defendant's written demand for change of place of trial and his notice of motion and accompanying affidavits. No counter affidavits or testimony in opposition to said motion were offered. The court denied defendant's said motion. Appellant contends that he was entitled to have the action tried in the city and county of San Francisco upon making the proper written demand and filing his affidavit of merits at the time he filed his demurrer, and that the court erred in denying his said motion.

The respondent contends that the affidavit of merits filed in the case at bar states that the defendant has fully and fairly stated his case, etc., that this is not a sufficient or proper affidavit of merits, and is only equivalent to stating his defense, etc., to his attorney. Respondent further contends that the affidavits of one Sumski, and the defendant, both disclose two reasons why there is not a sufficient defense upon the merits, viz. that both disclose the fact that there is only a partial defense relied upon, and also disclose the further fact that an accord without satisfaction is relied upon.

The complaint sets out that plaintiff sold certain cattle to defendant at an agreed price; that part of the cattle were taken, slaughtered, and paid for by the defendant; that thereafter the parties made a new agreement under which defendant should pay the plaintiff the freight of the cattle to Modesto, plus the difference between the agreed price and the amount which plaintiff could obtain for the balance of the cattle, if there should be a difference. Plaintiff accepted and sold the cattle, and the action is for the difference and freight. There remained the sum of $800 due under the original agreement, and the cattle not taken by the defendant for his own use were sold for $500 at Modesto, leaving an unpaid balance of $300 and a freight bill for $50, for which sum ($350) the action was commenced.

The affidavits of merits were by the defendant and one I. Sumski, both residents of the city and county of San Francisco. In his affidavit, the defendant deposed that—

> He was "at the time of the commencement of this action, now is, and for more than three years last past has been, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. * * * That all the transactions involved in the action herein occurred either in the city and county of San Francisco, or in Stanislaus county, state of California. That there has been a full and fair settlement and agreement had between the parties to this action in the city and county of San Francisco, at and by which settlement had between the parties, in the presence of one I. Sumski, it was agreed that the plaintiff in this action should present his bill for the freight mentioned in the complaint at the sum of $50 to said defendant in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and to receive payment for said freight from said defendant in said city and county, * * * and which said freight money was to be paid and taken in full of any and all differences and demands between these parties. That affiant never paid said freight bill for the reason solely he did not know where the plaintiff was to be found, and plaintiff never personally either called for his money or left his address where he could be found. Affiant is not now and never has been a resident of Modoc county, Cal., in which this action was brought and is pending. That he has fully and fairly stated his case to R. A. Laird and E. C. Bonner, his attorneys, who reside at Alturas, Cal., and that he was thereupon advised and is advised by them, and verily believes that he has a good and sufficient defense on the merits to this action," etc.

Sumski, in his affidavit, declared that he is and has been for the past three years acquainted with the defendant, and knows that all of said time defendant was "and is now" a resident of the city of San Francisco, "and not a resident of the county of Modoc"; that he "was present at the settlement (reduced to writing by me and signed by these parties) between the parties to this action mentioned in the affidavit of J. Broder, hereunto annexed, and which affidavit I have read and know that there was a full and fair settlement between these parties, and by which settlement the amount, as then undetermined in amount but for freight only, was to be paid the plaintiff in this action by defendant in San Francisco, Cal., and nowhere else. Particularly Alturas, Cal., was not mentioned in said settlement, or agreement or in any of the talk had in connection with the same."

It will not be seriously contended that, if the motion for the change of venue was made upon a legally sufficient affidavit of merits, the motion for the change should be granted, since it appears without dispute that the defendant is and was at the time of the execution of the transaction constituting the plaintiff's cause of action a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. Code Civ. Proc. § 395.

[1-3] In support of his position that the affidavit of merits made and filed by the defendant is insufficient in law to have entitled the defendant to an order upon his motion transferring the cause as demanded, the respondent first emphasizes the fact that said affidavit merely states that "he has fully and fairly stated his case" to his attorneys, and insists that, upon the authority of People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. 157, and Nickerson v. Cal. Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268, such a statement is equivalent only to the statement that the defendant had stated his defense to his attorneys, which defense might be insufficient since (following the reasoning in the case last above named) it might be a purely technical one that would not touch the merits of the controversy.

There is, however, a marked distinction between the affidavits in the case named and those in the present case. Even if it be true that no other construction can logically be given to a declaration in an affidavit of merits by which a motion for a change of the place of trial is supported that the defendant has "stated his case to his attorney," etc., than that it is the equivalent of saying that he has "stated his defense," etc., a proposition which appears to be seriously questioned, if, indeed, not expressly repudiated in Hughes Mfg., etc., Co. v. Elliott, 167 Cal. 494, 500, 140 Pac. 17, yet the affidavits in this case contain the statement of facts which, prima facie, fully and completely answer the plaintiff's action herein. According to said affidavits, either of which separately or both together may be considered for the purpose of testing and determining the question whether there is a sufficient showing of a defense on the merits (Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44, 63 Am. Dec. 78; Gardner v. Steadman, 31 Cal. App. 447, 160 Pac. 834) the parties to the action had a settlement between them of their differences, resulting in an understanding between them, whereby it was agreed that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $50 only, being the amount of the freightage for the shipping from San Francisco of those cattle of the number taken by the defendant to said city, which he did not accept and use. Manifestly, this constituted a showing that the defendant has available to him a defense that goes directly to the merits of the action. In other words, the facts directly set forth in the affidavits, while not, as they are not required to be, stated with the technical nicety required of a pleading, and do not disclose the precise legal nature of the later agreement, are nevertheless sufficient upon their face as a defense to any claim plaintiff makes against the defendant in excess of the sum of $50. And in this connection it is appropriate to consider the point made by the respondent that where a party seeks a transfer of an action to some other county than the one in which the same is brought, he must show by his affidavit of merits that he has a complete defense on the merits to the cause of action set up in the complaint, and that the affidavits of merits in this case fail to show such a defense—that they, on the contrary, disclose, if anything at all, only a partial defense. Counsel for plaintiff have not made it clear in their brief what they mean by this contention; but if it is their position that there is only a partial defense because the defendant in effect admits an indebtedness to the plaintiff in the sum of $50 (only) on account of the transaction of which this controversy is the outgrowth, we are constrained to reply that there is no legal force to the point. The only issue between the parties is as to the alleged indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff in a sum in excess of that of $50, the defense which defendant shows by his affidavit that he is prepared to set up against any claim of plaintiff against him in excess of the sum of $50 being, as to said amount, in the nature of a plea by way of confession and avoidance, and is therefore a defense which goes to the merits of the only question in the case upon which he and the plaintiff disagree, and, as stated, it would be a full and complete defense to the extent of the only issue between them. There can be no less reason why the defendant should not be entitled to have that issue tried in the county of his residence than there would or could be if his defense were to involve a denial of any and all indebtedness whatever.

[4] But it is insisted by the respondent that the affidavit of merits by the defendant itself discloses that the settlement which it is therein stated was had between him and plaintiff involved an agreement in the nature of an accord and satisfaction (Civ. Code, § 1521), but that, the defendant having failed to execute it, the original agreement was not extinguished, but retained its integrity as an obligation to which the defendant thus virtually admits that he is still bound (Civ. Code, § 1522). The defendant negatives this position by declaring that the new or later agreement constituted a novation. The reply to this controversy is that it cannot be determined from the affidavits what the exact nature, technically, the so-called new or later agreement, was. In other words, it cannot thus be determined whether said agreement or settlement involved an unexecuted accord and satisfaction or a novation or an account stated. The affidavit of the defendant declares, as has been shown, that—

> "There has been a full and fair settlement and agreement had between the parties to this action * * * by which it was agreed that the plaintiff * * * should present his bill for the freight mentioned in the complaint at the sum of fifty dollars to said defendant * * * and to receive payment for said freight from said defendant * * * which said freight money was to be paid and taken in full of any differences and demands between these parties."

Whether, in effecting the "full and fair settlement and agreement" between the parties, the defendant paid to the plaintiff all that he has sued for except the $50 for freight, or the plaintiff, without such payment, agreed to accept the said sum of $50 in full satisfaction of all claims he then claimed to have against the defendant, the affidavits do not show.

But, even assuming that the later transaction was to effect an accord and satisfaction as that proceeding is defined by the Code, still the defendant would have the right to show, if he could, or at least set it up as a defense, that the nonexecution of the accord was due entirely to the fault or omission of a duty imposed by the agreement upon the plaintiff, and not due to any default of the defendant under the terms of the convention. Indeed, upon the assumption just suggested, there is some semblance of ground for this theory disclosed by the defendant's affidavit, wherein it is declared that the plaintiff should present his bill for the freight "in the city and county of San Francisco," and, further, that "affiant never paid said freight bill, for the reason solely he did not know where the plaintiff was to be found, and plaintiff never personally either called for his money or left his address where he could be found."

[5] The point that the statement in the affidavit that "a full and fair settlement and agreement" between the parties was had is a legal conclusion, and therefore insufficient as a predicate for the conclusion of fact that such a settlement had been made, is, as in impeachment of the sufficiency of the affidavit of merits, without merit. It may be true that the statement, taken alone, is a conclusion of law, but it is, as we have shown, buttressed by other declarations of fact in the affidavits which do not involve legal conclusions or conclusions of the affiant. The statement in the affidavit of merits on motion for a change of venue that the defendant "has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to his attorney," etc., really does not rise to a higher dignity than that of the statement of the conclusion of the affiant, but affidavits of merits containing such a statement and very little in addition thereto have often been approved as sufficient.

[6] It must be borne in mind that it is not required that an affidavit of merits, to constitute a sufficient predicate for the removal of a cause on a motion for that purpose, should set out in full the defense upon which the defendant will rely. Nor is it important or of any materiality in the consideration of the affidavit whether the defense may or may not be sustained. It is only sufficient to show that the defendant, upon stating the facts of the case to his attorney, has been advised by the latter that he has a defense that will address itself to the merits of the controversy, and not merely to matters of form, etc., and this we think it clear the defendant in this case has done.

The order denying the motion for a change of venue is reversed.

SNELL v. NEILSON. (Civ. 2103.)

1. Gifts ⚷17—Verbal gifts valid where there is delivery.

A verbal gift is valid only where the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, or where, if the thing is capable of delivery, there is an actual or symbolic delivery to the donee, under Civ. Code, § 1147.

2. New trial ⚷93—To be granted where report of testimony is lost.

Where party desiring to appeal makes demand under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, that reporter transcribe the phonographic report of the trial, and it appears on motion for new trial that the clerk of the court has lost his notes and cannot furnish a transcript of all of the evidence, the motion should be granted, and where a substantial amount of evidence is missing, it is immaterial that the prevailing party make affidavit, or the trial judge decide that the lost testimony had no material bearing upon the issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Hattie M. Snell, as administratrix of the estate of Glenn E. Snell, deceased, against Mabel Neilson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. B. Churchill, of Lakeport, for appellant.
H. V. Keeling, C. M. Crawford, and Ben C. Jones, all of Lakeport, for respondent.

HART, J. Plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Glenn Snell, deceased, brought this action against the defendant in claim and delivery for a Ford automobile alleged to be the property of the deceased, Glenn Snell, at the time of his death. The answer denied ownership in the plaintiff and alleged that the property belonged to the defendant, Mabel Neilson, she having obtained title by gift from the deceased, her fiancé. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and then took an appeal from the judgment under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and demanded of the clerk that he prepare a typewritten transcript.

Glenn Snell died intestate on May 7, 1918, in the county of Lake, state of California, and his mother, Hattie M. Snell, was appointed administratrix of his estate on June 1, 1918, and letters of administration were issued to her. Thereafter she made demand on the defendant, Mabel Neilson, for the Ford automobile and accessories, consisting of spotlight, storage batteries, automobile rims, fire extinguisher, robe, etc. The court found that the Ford automobile had never been delivered, but found that the spotlight had been delivered, and gave judgment to the plaintiff for the Ford automobile and accessories, and judgment to the defendant for the spotlight. The defendant took an appeal under the new method (section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure) within the required time, and demanded that the clerk prepare a transcript of the testimony offered and taken, evidence offered and received, and all rulings and instructions, and all objections and exceptions of counsel. The court reporter made affidavit that he had lost his notes, with the exception of those of the testimony of one witness (the defendant herself), and could not make up the transcript of the testimony required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Counsel for the defendant also made affidavit that he did not remember the testimony of the different witnesses and could not make up a statement of the case for that reason.

Counsel for appellant makes two points for a new trial: (1) Defendant should have been granted a new trial when it was made to appear that the court reporter's notes had been lost; (2) judgment should have been in favor of the defendant, because the evidence presented shows that there was a gift and delivery of the Ford automobile.

Counsel for plaintiff and respondent has filed no brief in the cause.

[1] While the defendant testified positively that the deceased gave her the automobile, it is not clear from her testimony that there was such a delivery of the car to her by the deceased as to constitute it a legal gift. A verbal gift is valid where the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, or where, if the thing is capable of delivery, there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee. Civ. Code, § 1147. The court could apparently have justly found from the testimony of the defendant that the deceased told her that he intended to make her a present of the car as soon as she learned to operate it, but, according to her testimony, the actual possession of the car was at all times in the deceased, he having habitually used it for his own purposes.

[2] But we think that there can be no doubt but that the court should have granted the defendant a trial of the cause de novo on the showing made, on her motion for a new trial, that a considerable portion of the testimony offered and received and the other proceedings in the trial were not available to her for the purpose of making up a proper record either for the motion or an appeal, for the reason that the phonographic report of said testimony and proceedings had been lost, and could not be found by the official court reporter in time for the preparation of such record.

As shown, there were filed and presented on the motion an affidavit by said stenographer and also one by the attorney for defendant showing the loss of the stenographer's shorthand notes of the testimony and proceedings received and had at the trial. The stenographer, in his affidavit, deposed that he officially reported the testimony and the proceedings in shorthand taken and had in the trial of this case, that, after the trial and judgment entered against the defendant, demand, as required by law, was made upon him to transcribe into longhand the shorthand notes of said evidence and proceedings so taken and had, and that "during the meantime deponent moved his office to another location and took with him what he supposed to be all of his documents and papers, but upon making due and diligent search he finds the fact to be that the shorthand notes made at said trial have been lost and cannot be found; and deponent further states the fact to be that the defendant, Mabel Nielson, and her attorney, H. B. Churchill, Esq., or either of them, directly or indirectly, never had possession or control of said shorthand notes, and that said defendant or her attorney is not responsible for the loss of the said shorthand notes, and that no other person is responsible for said loss except this deponent."

The attorney for defendant, in his affidavit, deposed that he made a demand for the transcript by the official reporter of the court of the evidence, proceedings, etc., taken and had in the trial of the case; that he was informed by said reporter that the shorthand notes of said evidence and proceedings had been lost and were beyond recovery; that said defendant intended to appeal from the judgment rendered and entered against her in said case, "but cannot now do so by reason of the loss of said shorthand notes"; that "a great many material witnesses testified at the trial of said cause, and deponent, representing said defendant, relied entirely for the preservation of the testimony given and the proceedings had upon the shorthand notes taken at said trial; that some three months have elapsed since the trial, and by reason of such lapse of time, and by reliance upon said notes aforesaid, a large portion of the material evidence given and of the proceedings had and taken, including objections and exceptions, etc., made and taken, have entirely gone from deponent's mind and memory; and that by reason of the facts aforesaid deponent believes that a record of the testimony given and proceedings taken cannot now be made."

The plaintiff filed adversary affidavits—one by the official reporter and another by the attorney for plaintiff. In the former's affidavit, as in the latter's it is stated that the testimony of the defendant was, immediately upon the close of the trial, transcribed by the reporter at the request of the attorney for plaintiff and a copy thereof given to the latter. It is further stated in said affidavit, upon information and belief, that before the motion for a new trial was made the attorney for defendant knew of the existence of said transcript of defendant's testimony and that it was in possession of plaintiff's counsel, but that the attorney for defendant never at any time requested the former to permit him to examine said testimony or to have the use thereof, although, it is further stated, affiant was "entirely willing at all times to have delivered to said H. B. Churchill for use and examination by him" said transcript and testimony. It is further deposed by plaintiff's attorney that the single issue in the case was as to the ownership of the automobile in dispute, and that defendant's was the only testimony received at the trial on her behalf bearing upon that issue and supporting her defense; "that none of the testimony of the other witnesses upon the trial of said case was, or is, material to the issue involved."

The certificate of the judge by whom the case was tried certifying to the correctness of the record as it is embraced in the transcript before us states that there were nine witnesses (naming each) whose testimony does not appear in the transcript for the reason that the said testimony "has been lost by the stenographer who took the testimony offered at the trial."

Even if it may be proper to assume that the trial court would in any event have denied the defendant's motion for a new trial, we think that, upon the showing made that the official stenographer's notes of the testimony of a large number of the witnesses had been lost before he had the opportunity to transcribe the same into longhand, a new trial should have been granted for the purpose, even if for no other, of enabling the defendant to prepare a proper record on appeal. We are not unmindful of the statement in the affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiff that the testimony not transcribed for the reason stated was not material to the issue, from which statement it is to be inferred that the theory is that, so far as the evidential features of the case are concerned, the defendant, neither in the prosecution of her motion for a new trial before the court below, nor in the prosecution of an appeal from the judgment in the appellate court, could be benefited or aided in any degree by the testimony not transcribed. But it may be assumed that the testimony referred to was regarded by the trial court as being material, since it appears to have been received into the record. At any rate, it became a part of the record of the case, and, whether it was or was not material to the issue made by the pleadings, the defendant was entitled to have it transcribed and duly anthenticated as a part of the record on appeal. Section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, when an appeal is taken according to the method prescribed thereby, it is the duty of the court, upon a demand being made therefor by the losing party after a notice by the latter that he intends to appeal from the judgment, to require the stenographic reporter of the court to transcribe fully and completely the phonographic report of the trial, consisting of "a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate." Thus it is plain that the vanquished party in a trial, if he desires and intends to have the judgment against him reviewed by the courts of last resort under the system established by section 953a, supra, is entitled to take before the Court of Appeal everything that has been done and said under the sanction of the trial court in the trial. The mere statement in an affidavit by the victorious party or even the decision of the trial judge that certain testimony offered and rejected or received has no material bearing upon the issue cannot conclude the losing party as to his right to a full and complete record of the case to support his appeal. Indeed, the very rulings of the court holding certain proffered testimony to be immaterial or otherwise legally objectionable may, as is very often so, involve the very question which it is desired should and which ought to be reviewed. Hence, in the interest of common justice, where, as here, the record of the trial or any substantial portion thereof has been, before it has been properly made up for the purpose of an appeal, and without any fault of the party against whom judgment has gone, lost or destroyed, a new trial should be granted, if such loss or destruction has been, as was the case here, called to the attention of the trial court on a motion for a new trial, or the judgment reversed for a new trial by the court to which the appeal has been taken. There is abundant authority for this conclusion.

In Bailey v. United States, 3 Okl. Cr. 175, 104 Pac. 917, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma has this to say in a case presenting a situation, in its general aspects such as we have here, saying:

> "It seems to be well established, as a general rule, that where a defendant has done all that the law requires in perfecting his appeal, and where the record necessary for a review of the case is lost or destroyed while in the custody of an officer of the court, in order to prevent a possible miscarriage of justice by depriving the defendant of his legal right of appeal, a new trial will be granted."

In Crittenden v. Schermerhorn, 35 Mich. 370, the bill of exceptions was, by stipulation of the parties, settled by the judge who tried the cause after he had retired from office. Objection raised on appeal that a stipulation could confer no such authority was sustained, but the cause was reversed on the ground that the party losing at nisi prius should not be deprived of the benefit of his exceptions for causes for which he was not responsible. "On the contrary," said Cooley, C. J., "where a party has lost the benefit of his exceptions from causes beyond his control, it is proper to give him a new trial; and this we have done in some cases where the judge's term of office expired before exceptions could be settled."

In Borroscale v. Bosworth, 98 Mass. 34, 37, it is said:

> "We * * * have no doubt that, where a party has regularly taken exceptions in a cause, and has lost the benefit of them without fault of his own, a new trial may be granted. He has a right by law to the judgment of the higher court upon the decision by which he feels himself to be aggrieved; and a new trial may be his only remedy."

Richardson v. State, 15 Wyo. 465, 89 Pac. 1027, 1034, 12 Ann. Cas. 1048, is a case in which the official stenographer, after transcribing the proceedings of the trial as required by a statute of Wyoming, lost both the transcript and his shorthand notes of the trial, and after diligent search could not find the same. The case was one of murder, and the appellant had been convicted and sentenced to suffer the death penalty. Reversing the cause because of the inability of the appellant to prepare a proper record on appeal because of the loss of the official court reporter's shorthand notes and his transcript thereof, as above explained, the Supreme Court, among other things, said:

> "Incidental to the power to compel a correct record to be sent up, or a bill of exceptions to be settled, is the power, as it seems to us, of ordering a new trial of the cause, where it is made to appear that the only record in the cause has been destroyed without possibility of substitution through no fault of the appellant, or where, without fault on the part of the appellant or his counsel, but solely because of the neglect or delay of some court official, or some accident or act of Providence for which no one is responsible, it has become impossible for a bill of exceptions to be settled, without which the errors complained of cannot be considered."

See, also, Hume v. Bowie, 148 U. S. 245, 13 Sup. Ct. 582, 37 L. Ed. 438; State v. Gaslin, 32 Neb. 291, 49 N. W. 353; Fire Association of Philadelphia v. McEnerney (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 1053; Barton v. Burbank, 119 La. 224, 43 South. 1014; Tegler v. State, 3 Okl. Cr. 595, 107 Pac. 949, 139 Am. St. Rep. 976; note to Bailey v. U. S., 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

FREEMAN v. GLENN COUNTY TELEPHONE CO. et al. (Sac. 2792.)

1. Corporations 🔑346 — Statute amendment as to director's liability held applicable where action was pending at date of amendment.

St. 1917, p. 657, amending Civ. Code, § 309, relative to the liability of directors of a corporation dividing its capital among the stockholders, to provide that no liability shall exist where all debts have been paid and all the capital stock divided with the consent of all stockholders among themselves, applied to directors against whom suit was pending to recover the amount divided at the date of the amendment but against whom judgment had not been rendered.

2. Appeal and error 🔑870(5)—Ruling on demurrer reviewable on appeal from judgment.

On an appeal from the judgment, defendants have the right to review the entire record including rulings on demurrers to their answer.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1107—Amended statute subsequent to order sustaining demurrers considered.

On appeal from a judgment rendered in a suit to enforce the liability of corporate directors after the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 657) to Civ. Code, § 309, though a demurrer was sustained to the answer before such amendment, the appellate court may consider whether the answer set up a defense when measured by the condition stated in the amendment.

4. Corporations 🔑346—When statute amended after ruling on demurrer, court should have reviewed its ruling.

Where, after the sustaining of demurrers to the answer in a suit to enforce the liability of corporate directors under Civ. Code, § 309, that section was amended by St. 1917, p. 657, the court should have taken cognizance of the amendment and reviewed its ruling on the demurrer.

5. Corporations 🔑334—Directors distributing capital among stockholders by consent held not liable.

Under Civ. Code, § 309, as amended by St. 1917, p. 657, where the capital of a corporation after payment of debts was divided and distributed to the stockholders with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff, and plaintiff's share was paid to one of the directors holding a power of attorney to act for plaintiff in relation to the stock, the directors were not liable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Frank Freeman against the Glenn County Telephone Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

W. T. Belieu and Charles L. Donohoe, both of Willows, for appellants.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against the individual defendants in favor of the Glenn County Telephone Company in an action begun by the plaintiff as a stockholder of said corporation, to recover of the individual defendants as directors thereof, for the benefit of the corporation, a certain sum of money alleged to have been distributed to the stockholders by the said directors, constituting the entire capital stock of said corporation, contrary to the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code. On May 21, 1917, the court below sustained a demurrer to the amended answer of the defendants and, the said defendants failing to amend, their default was duly entered by the clerk. Thereafter, on August 13, 1917, the cause came on for disposition by the court and, notwithstanding the default, the defendants appeared by their attorneys. No additional pleadings were filed, however, and the court proceeded to make findings upon the facts stated in the complaint. It appeared from certain exhibits filed with the said answer, constituting transcripts of the records of the defendant corporation, that the sums given in the complaint were inaccurate in small amounts. The findings constituted a mere reaffirmation of the allegations of the complaint, giving the corrected figures instead of those stated in the complaint. The findings were not filed until October 19, 1917. In pursuance thereof, on October 19, 1917, judgment was entered, directing the said individual defendants to pay into the treasury of the said defendant corporation the sum of $40,833.60 in money, and certain bonds for $10,000, or, in case the bonds could not be returned, to pay into the treasury the said sum of $10,000, and that the plaintiff recover from the individual defendants his costs.

[1] The Legislature of 1917 enacted an amendment to section 309, which took effect on July 27, 1917. This was during the time the court below had the matter under advisement. By this amendment it was provided that—

> "The liability of a director of a corporation heretofore incurred shall not exist in any case where, all of the debts and liabilities of the corporation to creditors having been paid, the capital stock divided, withdrawn, or paid out constituted all of the capital stock of the corporation and the same was paid out, withdrawn, or divided with the consent of all of the stockholders to or among themselves." Stats. 1917, p. 657.

In Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 Pac. 90, the effect of a partial repeal of this statutory liability was under consideration. It was there decided that the liability of directors under this section was purely statutory, and that—

> "Where a right is created solely by a statute, and is dependent upon the statute alone, and such right is still inchoate, and not reduced to possession, or perfected by final judgment, the repeal of the statute destroys the remedy, unless the repealing statute contains a saving clause." 171 Cal. 788, 155 Pac. 94.

There was no saving clause. The result is that this amendment operated as a repeal of the statutory liability formerly existing, in all cases where the distribution of capital stock was made under the conditions stated in the above-quoted part of the amended section, and under the decision in that case the further result is that the repeal operates to destroy the right of action if it occurred at any time prior to final judgment. The act took effect prior to the judgment in this case and it operated as a complete destruction of the plaintiff's case if it comes within the conditions stated.

[2-4] Upon an appeal by the defendants from a judgment they have the right to review the entire record, including rulings on demurrers against them. They have a right, therefore, to review the order of the court sustaining the demurrer to the answer in the present case. Although the repeal took place after the order sustaining the demurrer was made, this court on appeal has power to consider the allegations of the answer in the same light as if the order sustaining the demurrer had been made after the repeal, and we may therefore consider whether or not the answer set up a defense, when measured by the conditions stated in the amendment to section 309. With respect to this court the order sustaining the demurrer cannot be deemed final. The court below had the matter under consideration when the statute took effect, and it also should have taken cognizance of the amendment and reviewed its ruling upon the demurrer.

[5] The amended answer avers that all the remaining stock of the corporation, after the payment of its debts, was divided and distributed to the stockholders thereof, in certain definite proportions as there stated, that the plaintiff's portion thereof was paid over to and is now held by the defendant Barceloux as agent for him under a power of attorney executed by Freeman to Barceloux to act for him in relation to said stock, and that all this was done with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff. It therefore shows that the distribution was made under the conditions stated in the amendment to the section, and that the plaintiff consented to the manner of distribution. This constituted a good defense to the action. Under these circumstances the judgment cannot be allowed to stand. There should be a determination in the court below of the facts set forth in the answer, to ascertain their truth, and if they are true, as alleged, the judgment should be that the plaintiff take nothing and that the action be dismissed.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the answer and proceed in accordance with this opinion.

In re AKERS' GUARDIANSHIP.

1. Guardian and ward ⚷10—Parent presumed competent until contrary shown affirmatively.

In accordance with the general presumption in favor of competency, a parent is presumed to be competent to discharge the duties of guardianship of the child in the absence of an affirmative contrary showing.

2. Guardian and ward ⚷13(4)—Evidence of mother's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity admissible on her application.

Inasmuch as the general moral character of a child's mother applying for its guardianship involves the issue of her fitness, and the particular traits of character relevant to the issue are not clearly defined, evidence of her reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity are admissible.

3. Guardian and ward ⚷13(4)—Admission of remote reputation of applicant rests in court's discretion.

In a guardianship hearing, evidence of the reputation of the applicant mother in another community at a remote time rests largely in the court's discretion, the proper exercise of which depends upon whether, under all the circumstances, such remote reputation tends to establish reputation at the time and place when and where it was in issue.

4. Evidence ⚷317(18)—That decedent had told of wife's confessions of illicit relations held hearsay.

In a guardianship contest, testimony of a chief of police that the applicant mother's deceased husband had said he was bent on killing a certain man because the applicant had confessed illicit relations with him was inadmissible, prejudicial hearsay evidence.

5. Guardian and ward ⚷10—Parent's right not forfeited by act of relinquishment under coercion, caprice, and discouragement.

The right of a parent to the custody of a child cannot be held forever forfeited by an act of relinquishment under circumstances of coercion, caprice, and discouragement, nor should the forfeiture of parental rights be decreed for mere acquiescence in support by other relatives, in a guardianship contest.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

6. Guardian and ward 🔑13(4)—Showing intention to abandon must be made to disqualify mother.

In a contest between a minor's mother and another for its guardianship, the mother's intention to abandon the child must be shown before a finding of abandonment can be rightfully made.

7. Guardian and ward 🔑10—Parents have paramount right to guardianship, unless forfeited by abandonment or unfitness.

In a guardianship contest the benefit of the child is not the sole consideration, since its mother, applying for guardianship, has the right to its control when under 14 years, rather than a stranger, unless she is shown unfit or to have forfeited her natural right by its abandonment.

8. Guardian and ward 🔑10—Competent parent has right to guardianship although child's welfare would be enhanced by appointing another.

In a contest between a parent and a stranger for the guardianship of a child, the paramount question is the parent's competency, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 1751 and Civ. Code § 246, subds. 3, 4 in the absence of a justifiable finding of incompetency the parent must be appointed guardian, though the child's material welfare may be enhanced by committing it to the stranger.

9. Guardian and ward 🔑10—Mother held not disqualified for nonresidence.

In a guardianship contest between a minor's mother and another, an objection that the mother is not a resident of the state is fully met by evidence that she has returned thereto with the intent and purpose of residing therein and regaining the child's custody.

10. Guardian and ward 🔑10—Mother's lack of permanent home does not disqualify her for guardianship.

In a guardianship contest between a mother and a stranger, that the mother has no permanent home of her own, and might be unable to keep the child with her personally for some time, is insufficient to deprive her of the child's legal custody, and her right to select the fit and proper place for its care.

In Bank.

Appeal from the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the person and estate of William David Akers, a minor. From an order of the superior court appointing Mrs. Chrissie Shreve guardian, Grace Akers, the minor's mother, appeals. Reversed.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, and H. B. Churchill, of Lakeport, for appellant.

Edmund Tauszky and Leon E. Prescott, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by Grace Akers, the mother of William David Akers, a minor of the age of 7 years, from an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco appointing Mrs. Chrissie Shreve guardian of the person and estate of said minor. The guardianship proceeding was heard and determined upon the issues raised by the respective petitions for the guardianship of the said minor, and the answers thereto, of Grace Akers, the mother of the minor, and Mrs. Shreve. The issues thus presented involve the questions of the abandonment of the child by the mother and the latter's fitness and competency to have the care, custody, and control of the child. In its findings of fact, the court below found, among other things, that Grace Akers, the mother of the child, in the month of November, 1915, abandoned the child, and then and ever since then surrendered all her parental rights to said child, and, furthermore, that she was not a fit or proper person to have the care, custody, or control of the child, nor a competent person to be the guardian of the person or estate of the child. A reversal of the order is urged upon the ground that these findings are not supported by any competent evidence.

The uncontradicted evidence offered and received in support of the application of the mother shows that Grace Akers was married at the age of 17 years at the home of her mother, in Whispering Pines, Lake county, to Earl Akers, August 8, 1912, and that Earl Akers at that time was about 35 years of age. For a period of four months thereafter she and her husband were domiciled in the home of her mother. From there the couple went to reside in Lakeport, where her husband secured employment on a stage line, and there they remained for a period of five months, when they returned to the home of Mrs. Akers' mother, where the child in controversy was born. When the child was three or four months old, the Akerses removed to Cobb Mountain, where they resided for about five months, Mrs. Akers all the while being employed as a cook for a sawmill crew of seven men. Then the family moved to Napa City, where they occupied a seven-room house for the period of a year or more, and during that time Mrs. Akers, in order to support the family, took in roomers, boarded three men, and took in family washing and ironing. The Akers family returned to the home of the mother of Mrs. Akers, and, after three or four months there, Mrs. Akers secured employment at Adams Springs, in Lake county, her husband and child remaining in the meanwhile at her mother's home. During a small portion of the time mentioned, the husband was incapacitated for work and during most of the time was unable to secure more than occasional employment at his trade, that of machinist. After working four or five months at Adams Springs, Mrs. Akers decided to separate from her husband because of his refusal, or inability, to support her, and she did so, leaving the child with her mother.

Shortly after the separation, her husband forcibly took the child from the grandmother and placed it with his sister in Middletown. Mrs. Akers proceeded to Middletown and succeeded in having the child returned to and placed in the care of the grandmother. The husband again forcibly took possession of the child and placed it in the custody of Mrs. Shreve, at Calistoga, who agreed with the husband to keep and care for the child for the sum of $20 per month. The mother made no further effort to regain control of the child, and moved to San Francisco, where she resided with her sister, a married woman having a family of five children, and in that city supported herself for four years, working under the name of Grace Miller, at times, as a day waitress in restaurants, as a servant in apartment houses, and as a helper in an airplane factory. During these four years she visited the child once at Calistoga, and sent the child handkerchiefs and candy. Leaving San Francisco, she went to Globe, Ariz., where she worked for three weeks as a waitress under the name of Grace Lien (she explained that she was working under assumed names because she did not want her husband to know where she was), and then went to Douglas, Ariz., where she purchased a candy store under an installment contract, and conducted the same in person.

Her husband died in November, 1919. Upon receiving news of his death, Mrs. Akers wrote from Douglas, Ariz., to her mother to get the child, and then came to San Francisco to oppose Mrs. Shreve's application and prosecute her own application for the guardianship of the child. When leaving Douglas, Ariz., she placed the candy store in the hands of an agent to be sold, and decided that she would not return to Arizona save for the purpose of consummating the sale of the store. Mrs. Akers' mother owns and lives on a 600-acre ranch in Lake county, has a comfortable home, is well able to care for the child and its mother, and would willingly provide a home for both.

The ability and fitness of Mrs. Shreve to have the care and custody of the child was not disputed. In support of her application and in opposition to the application of Mrs. Akers, evidence was offered and received in an endeavor to show that Mrs. Akers, some 5 years prior to the institution of the guardianship proceedings, and particularly during the period of her married life when she was living with her husband, was guilty of immoral conduct of so grievous a nature as to render her incompetent to have the care and custody of the child then or at any time since then. Upon that phase of the case, the only competent evidence adduced was to the effect that, when living in Napa City, some 5 or 6 years prior to the hearing of the application for guardianship, the reputation of the mother of the child for "truth, honesty, and integrity was bad"; that at that time she associated with another woman whose reputation for "truth, honesty, and integrity was bad"; that on several occasions she was seen in restaurants at varying hours of the night with this woman and two men; that some three or four men were seen going regularly to her house, and that on one or more occasions she went automobile riding with one of these men. The mother explained, and it was not only not disputed, but it was in effect admitted, that these men were either roomers or boarders, and therefore had a legitimate purpose in going to her home. The automobile rides, so the mother explained, and in this she was not contradicted, were with a man who not only boarded with the family, but was, as well, a particular and intimate friend of the husband from boyhood. She further testified that these rides were had with the knowledge and consent of her husband. It was not shown nor claimed that they were clandestinely taken, nor that they or the visits of the mother to restaurants in company with one other woman and two men were for any but a legitimate and innocent purpose. Mrs. Akers' mother, sister, and nephew, the latter a young man of the age of 18 years, testifying in her behalf, gave evidence tending to show that her reputation before, at, and at all times subsequent to her marriage was in every respect good.

There was uncontradicted evidence to the effect that the mother, after separating from her husband, lived and worked under assumed names because he had threatened to kill her, and therefore she desired to conceal her whereabouts from him. It was also shown in evidence against the mother that some several years before the hearing, and while she was living with her husband, she had written and addressed a letter to one of the men who was boarding with her, wherein she declared that he, meaning her husband, was "getting worse and worse till it is impossible to stand it," and then begged the man to whom the letter was addressed to always remember that he "had the first pure love of one woman." It was, however, an undisputed fact in the case that this letter, evidently written in a moment of caprice, had never been mailed or delivered to the person to whom it was addressed, and that it was written in the presence of the husband.

[1-4] In accordance with the general presumption in favor of competency, a parent is presumed to be competent to discharge the duties of guardianship in the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary. Guardianship of Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 Pac. 51; Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 Pac. 283; Matter of Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 Pac. 352. We may assume that, inasmuch as the general moral character of the mother of the child is involved in the issue of her fitness to have the care of her child, and the particular traits of character relevant to the issue are not clearly defined, evidence of her reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was admissible under that issue. Although it may not be amiss to say that a mere lack of integrity is not sufficient in itself to justify depriving a parent of the natural right to the custody of the child. Matter of Galleher, supra. It may be conceded that the admission of evidence of such reputation in another community and at a remote time rested largely in the discretion of the trial court, the proper exercise of which as a matter of course was dependent upon the question of whether or not, under all of the circumstances, such reputation, despite its remoteness as to time and place, had a tendency to establish the mother's reputation at the precise time and place when and where it was in issue. Coates v. Sulau, 46 Kan. 341, 26 Pac. 720; State v. Lanier, 79 N. C. 622; Snow v. Grace, 29 Ark. 131; Holliday v. Cohen, 34 Ark. 707; Cline v. State, 51 Ark. 140, 10 S. W. 225. While it cannot be said, under the circumstances of the case at bar that the court abused its discretion in permitting proof of the mother's prior reputation for traits of character relevant to the issue of her fitness to have her child, still we are not satisfied that, standing alone, the competent evidence adduced upon this phase of the case would have impelled the trial court to the conclusion that the mother was not a fit and proper person to have the care, custody, and control of her child. Counsel for respondent must have been possessed of the same misgiving when they insisted, despite repeated timely and appropriate objection, upon having in evidence the testimony of the chief of police of Napa City to the effect that the husband of Grace Akers had said to him, some 5 or 6 years before, that he, Akers, was bent on killing a certain man because she had confessed to him (Akers) that she had had illicit relations with that certain man. Hearsay evidence as to the statements of particular persons in regard to the commission of particular acts by a party is inadmissible for the purpose of proving character. Obviously this was hearsay, and its prejudicial effect is instantly manifest. When overruling the objection to it, the trial court made the following comment:

> "No; I want to hear about that. They don't say things like that about good women. You don't assume that a husband would go about telling stories of that kind about his wife if she were a good woman, do you?"

This statement indicates with much certainty that the evidence erroneously admitted contributed materially to, if it did not entirely control, the conclusion of the trial court, ultimately expressed in its findings that the mother was not a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of her child.

It follows necessarily that the error in this particular warrants and requires a reversal of the order, unless it can be said, as counsel for respondent contend, that the finding of the trial court that the mother had abandoned the child is supported by evidence, and that that finding alone will suffice to support the order appealed from.

[5, 6] Upon that phase of the case, the evidence in its entirety does no more than show that, being dissatisfied, if not discouraged, with the prospect of being compelled indefinitely to bear the burden of supporting herself and her husband, the mother of the child separated from her husband, and, after an unsuccessful endeavor to have the child placed with and cared for by its grandmother, left for fields anew, far removed from the "Whispering Pines," to work out her own salvation single-handed and alone. Whether or not she was justified in separating from her husband need not be determined here. Suffice it to say that the right of a parent to the custody of its child cannot be held to be forever forfeited by an act of relinquishment committed under circumstances of coercion, caprice, and discouragement. Norval v. Zinsmaster, 57 Neb. 158, 77 N. W. 373, 73 Am. St. Rep. 500. Nor should the forfeiture of parental rights be decreed against a parent who has merely acquiesced in the support of the child by other relatives. Matter of Forrester, supra; Matter of Galleher, supra. In so far as the record before us shows, the mother did nothing which indicated an intention to abandon the child, and it is well settled in this state that such an intention must be shown before a finding of abandonment can be rightfully made. In re Vance, 92 Cal. 195, 198, 28 Pac. 229; Guardianship of Snowball, 156 Cal. 240, 104 Pac. 444; In re Cordy, 169 Cal. 150, 146 Pac. 532, 534; In re Schwartz, 171 Cal. 633, 154 Pac. 304; Moch v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 471, 179 Pac. 440.

The record reveals that the trial court made the order appealed from largely, if not entirely, upon the theory that—

> "The only purpose in an inquiry of this kind is to determine what is best to be done with the child for its own welfare, and the question as to the character and reputation, fitness, or unfitness, of the mother in a case of this kind, seems to me to be not the most important one."

That this was the attitude of the trial court is evidenced by the further statement:

> "I don't know of any higher law than that this child be cared for, and that it be in the custody of people who are able and willing to support it, and they have done that and shown that for these 4 years."

[7, 8] It is now insisted by counsel for respondent that regardless of the erroneous admission of palpably prejudicial evidence, and apart from the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support a finding of abandonment, the order appealed from should be affirmed upon the theory indicated and adopted by the trial court. This we cannot do, because it is the settled rule of law in this state that the care, custody, and control of a minor child under the age of 14 years must be committed to its parents, rather than to strangers, unless it be shown and found that the parent is unfit to perform the duties imposed by the relation, or has, by abandonment of the child, forfeited the natural right to its custody. In short, in a contest for guardianship, as here, between a parent of a child and a stranger to the child, the paramount question is the competency of the parent to act as guardian, and, in the absence of a justifiable finding of the parent's incompetency, the court must appoint the parent as guardian, despite the fact that the material welfare of the child may perchance be enhanced by committing its care and custody to another person. Code Civ. Proc. § 1751; Civ. Code, § 246, subds. 3, 4; In re Campbell, 130 Cal. 380, 62 Pac. 613; Guardianship of Salter, supra; Matter of Forrester, supra; Guardianship of Mathews, 169 Cal. 26, 145 Pac. 503. The case of the Guardianship of Imperatrice, 188 Pac. 48, is not in conflict with anything now or heretofore held by this court in cases of this character. That case clearly recognizes the rule that primarily the parents of the child have the preferential right to its custody by nature and statutory enactment, and it does no more than hold that this right must give way in the presence of a sufficient showing, as was made in that case, that the mental and moral delinquencies of the parents made them unfit and incompetent to be the guardians of the child in controversy. While the recent case of the Guardianship of Hawkins, 192 Pac. 30, does not in terms make the distinction which obtains in the operation of the rule in question when applied to parents asserting the right of guardianship as against a stranger, nevertheless the decision in that case in effect recognizes the distinction by proceeding throughout upon the theory that the evidence sufficiently showed the incompetency of the parent seeking guardianship, and, of course in that situation the welfare of the child was the paramount point to be considered, in keeping with the rule so concisely and clearly stated in the case of the Guardianship of Allen, 162 Cal. 625, 124 Pac. 237, cited as an authority in the case last referred to.

[9, 10] Finally, it is said that, in any event, the mother should be denied guardianship because it appeared that she was no longer a resident of the state of California. In response to this contention it will be enough to say that the evidence showed that she returned to California with the intent and purpose of residing in California and regaining the custody of her child, and that, if she returned to Arizona, it would be only temporarily and for the purpose of disposing of her business there. In conclusion, it may not be amiss to say, as was said in effect in the Guardianship of Mathews, supra, that, even though it was shown that the mother had not, at the time of the hearing, a permanent home of her own, and therefore might be unable for the time being to keep the child with her personally, nevertheless she should not, for that reason alone, be deprived of the legal custody of the child and the related right of selecting a fit and proper place where he should be kept and cared for.

For the reasons stated the order appealed from is reversed.

NEWMAN v. NICKELL et al. (Civ. 2170.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 20, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑58(4)—Stockholders' liability not extended by renewal note for corporate indebtedness.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, requiring action to enforce a liability against corporation stockholders to be brought within three years after the liability is created, an action against stockholders to enforce their liability for the corporation's indebtedness, evidenced by notes for balance of purchase price of land, was barred three years after the purchase, notwithstanding renewal notes were given for the original notes, where no additional security was given and no new consideration passed.

2. Bills and notes 🔑430—Execution of new note prima facie not payment.

Prima facie the execution of a new note to take the place of an old one is not a payment, unless it is expressly so provided.

3. Corporations 🔑264 — Action to enforce stockholders' liability governed by three-year statute; "liability created by law."

The obligation of a stockholder to corporate creditors is a liability created by law, and Code Civ. Proc. § 359, requiring actions against stockholders to enforce a "liability created by law" to be commenced within three years after discovery of facts on which liability was created, applies thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Peter Newman against L. W. Nickell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. O. Prewett and Downey & Downey, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice. The appellant commenced this action against the respondents to recover from them their proportion of an indebtedness due to him from the Nickell Investment Company, a corporation. The respondents are sued as stockholders of the corporation. The respondents by answer admit the existence of the indebtedness by the corporation and their liability as stockholders and plead the statute of limitations. The facts of the matter are stated in the findings substantially as follows:

In April, 1911, the corporation purchased from the appellant a certain tract of real property situated in the city of Sacramento, for the agreed price of $48,000, and at the same time paid on the purchase price thereof the sum of $13,000 in cash and executed its promissory notes in the sums of $5,000 and $30,000, respectively. As security for the payment of the two promissory notes, it executed its trust deed to trustees conveying the premises purchased. On March 19, 1917, the notes remaining wholly unpaid, the corporation executed to the appellant one new note for the entire indebtedness of $35,000 and secured the payment of the same by the execution of a new trust deed conveying the same premises. The old notes were delivered up and destroyed. The resolution of the directors authorizing the execution of the new note recites:

> "Whereas, the said Peter Newman is willing at this time to renew the entire loan of $35,000 and to accept a new note from this corporation," etc.

The trial court found that the execution of the new note was but a renewal of the original indebtedness, found in favor of the defendants upon their plea of the statute of limitations, and rendered judgment accordingly.

[1, 2] The appellant insists that the finding of the court to the effect that the execution of the new note was but a renewal of the former indebtedness of the corporation to him is not sustained by the evidence, and that, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the execution of the new note was an entirely new and distinct transaction. But this position is untenable. Prima facie the execution of a new note to take the place of an old one is not a payment unless it is expressly so provided. Among a multitude of authorities in this state to the same effect touching this point we will quote from but one:

> "It is a well-settled rule that, in the absence of an agreement to that effect, a promissory note is not paid by the execution of another note, but that the time for payment is thereby merely suspended until the maturity of the new note." White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 108, 77 Pac. 830.

[3] It is equally well settled by a like extended line of authorities that the obligation of a stockholder to creditors of his corporation is a liability created by law and that the three-year limit applies to such obligation, as provided in section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This doctrine has been much discussed in this state, but it is too firmly established to be open to question. Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87; Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 103 Cal. 594, 37 Pac. 499; Wells v. Black, 117 Cal. 157, 48 Pac. 1090, 37 L. R. A. 619, 59 Am. St. Rep. 162; Santa Rosa National Bank v. Barnett, 125 Cal. 408, 58 Pac. 85; Jones v. Goldtree, 142 Cal. 383, 77 Pac. 939; Gardiner v. Royer, 167 Cal. 238, 139 Pac. 75. In the instant case no additional security was given and no new consideration passed. There never was at any time an actual borrowing of money from the appellant, and the whole indebtedness from first to last was merely for the unpaid balance of the purchase money.

This is the only point in the case. The facts are undisputed, the law applicable to the case is free from doubt, and we find no just cause to interfere with the conclusions of the lower court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GARVEY SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. v. SOUTHWESTERN SURETY INS. CO. et al. (Civ. 3435.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Failure to advertise for bids after contractor's default held not to prevent recovery against surety.

Under Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 20, requiring school district contracts to be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement, etc., where a contract so let authorized the district to provide materials and workmen in case of the contractor's refusal or neglect, and, upon the contractor's default, and after notice to the surety, the district, in accordance with the contract, completed the work, its failure to advertise for bids, etc., for the completion of the work did not prevent recovery against the contractor's surety for the excess of the cost above the contract price.

2. Schools and school districts ⚿81(2)—Offer of contractor's surety to complete contract after district had taken charge held not to relieve surety of liability.

Where a school district contract authorized the district on the contractor's default to supply materials and workmen after three days' notice in writing and deduct the expense from the contract price and the district after such notice to the contractor and his surety took charge of the work, the surety's subsequent offer to perform the contract did not defeat recovery of the excess of the cost above the contract price, under Civ. Code, § 2839, providing that an offer of performance exonerates the surety, and section 1490 relative to the time for an offer of performance.

3. Schools and school districts ⚿81(2)—Contractor's surety not entitled to complain where additional expense incurred in completing work was reasonable cost.

Where, after a contractor's default, a school district completed the work in accordance with the contract, the contractor's surety could not complain that it was given an opportunity to complete the building after the contract price was exhausted, or that the work of completion thereafter was done by contract let to the lowest bidder; it having been found that the additional expense incurred was the reasonable cost of finishing the building.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Garvey School District of Los Angeles County and others against the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Hugh Gordon, Asst. Co. Counsel, and Jerry H. Powell, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action on the contractor's bond given to the owner as security for the faithful performance of a contract made with the plaintiff school district by one B. H. Paul for the erection of a school building. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment entered in favor of defendants.

The powers and duties of trustees of common school districts are, among others, the following:

> "To let all contracts involving an expenditure of more than two hundred dollars for work to be done or for materials or supplies to be furnished, * * * to the lowest responsible bidder who will give such security as the board may require or else to reject all bids. * * * For the purpose of securing bids the board must publish a notice calling for bids stating the work to be done or materials or supplies to be furnished, and the time when and the place where the bids will be opened, at least once a week for two weeks in some daily or weekly newspaper, published in the county. * * *" Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 20.

The Paul contract was let in the manner required by law. It was dated August 18, 1915, and by its terms the contractor was allowed 105 working days from that date within which to complete the contract. In other words, the work was to be finished about the middle of December, 1915. It was provided in paragraph 6 of the contract that—

> "Should the contractor at any time during the progress of said works, refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the owner shall have the power to provide materials and workmen (after three days' notice in writing given) to finish the said works, and the reasonable expenses thereof shall be deducted from the amount of said contract price."

The bond was executed by defendant Southwestern Surety Insurance Company. The other defendant company is an insurance company which later assumed the liabilities of the Southwestern Company. It was provided in the bond that the principal contract was therein expressly referred to and made part thereof.

The findings state:

> "That on or about the 16th day of October, 1915, the contractor, B. H. Paul, ceased work on said building, and thereafter continuously and at all times up to about the 12th day of January, 1916, failed to furnish labor and material to carry out said contract."

In fact, he never did anything further on the contract, unless it be held that work done after the date last mentioned, or some part of it, was done by the school district in his behalf. On November 1, November 4, and November 22, 1915, the school district gave to the contractor and to the Southwestern Insurance Company three-day notices framed in accordance with said clause 6 of the contract. The parties notified did nothing in response to those notices, and the school district did not then furnish any materials or cause any work to be done on the building. Again, on the 8th day of January, 1916, the school district gave to the same parties a fourth notice in like form as before. Thereupon the school district, on the 12th day of January, 1916, with the knowledge and consent of the contractor, took entire charge of the work, and after said time furnished all of the necessary materials and workmen, and caused the work of completing the school building to be carried on, and from and after that time the contractor took no part under the contract in the construction of the building, and all of the contracts let for labor and materials were let in the name of the school district and by the school district. Prior to the 16th day of October, 1915, the contractor had earned and had been paid the first and second installments of the contract price, and there remained unexpended of the contract price the sum of $20,535. The contractor remained in charge of the premises until the 12th day of January, 1916.

On the 14th day of January, 1916, the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company offered in writing to the school district that it would furnish all the necessary material and workmen to complete the contract, and would fully and faithfully perform the conditions thereof, and demanded that it be permitted to complete the contract. This offer was refused by the school district, which at that time had taken charge of the work. Between the 12th day of January and the 21st day of June, 1916, the school district expended in carrying out the work for the completion of said building the sum of $20,535, which was the reasonable value of all the material and workmen thus furnished. On June 21, 1916, the school district notified the contractor and said surety company that there had been expended on the school building the sum last mentioned, in addition to the sum previously paid to the contractor, and that the building was not completed, and the school district requested and demanded that the contractor and said surety company proceed to complete the work in accordance with the contract. This the contractor and surety company wholly neglected and failed to do. Thereafter the school district completed the building in accordance with the original plans and specifications, at an additional expense of $3,996.99, to recover which amount together with certain alleged special damages, this action has been prosecuted.

The work done between the 12th day of January, 1916, and the 21st day of June, 1916, whereby said sum of $20,535 was expended, was done by the school district without any publications calling for bids or specifying the time and place where bids were opened; in other words, without any attempt to let contracts in the manner described in the section of the Political Code to which we have referred.

Upon the facts found, judgment should have been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, unless the judgment should be affirmed for one of two reasons which on this appeal are relied upon by the respondents. These contentions are that the judgment should be affirmed (1) for the reason that the school district made expenditures in excess of the statutory amount without advertising for bids as required by law; (2) for the reason that the surety company offered to perform the contract and fulfill all the obligations thereof.

[1] It is contended by respondents that their first proposition is sustained by five decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. Dougherty v. Foley, 32 Cal. 403, and Meuser v. Risdon, 36 Cal. 239, are street assessment cases in which it was held that, where a contractor failed to enter upon the contract or had abandoned the work, it was necessary for the municipality to readvertise for bids. But the statute under which the proceedings in those cases had been conducted in terms provided that there must be a readvertisement for bids under the circumstances stated. In this respect they are different from the statute in question in this case, inasmuch as said section of the Political Code is silent on the subject of readvertisement for bids or reletting of contracts. In Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 Pac. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260, and Matthews v. Town of Livermore, 156 Cal. 294, 104 Pac. 303, the court was dealing with a situation created by the failure of public corporations to comply with the provisions of law governing the letting of original contracts, and not with any question pertaining to the duty or power of the district or corporation to proceed under circumstances like those presented in the case at bar after a contract had been let in accordance with law.

Foxen v. City of Santa Barbara, 166 Cal. 77, 134 Pac. 1142, is the one case in which the facts are closely parallel to those in the case now before the court, with a difference, however, which we think is important. The city of Santa Barbara is a municipal corporation operating under a freeholders' charter in which there are sections which provide an exclusive method for the construction of all public works. Proceeding according to that method, the city entered into a contract for the boring of certain tunnels to develop water for use by the inhabitants of the city. It is stated in the opinion that—

> "Subsequently, with the consent of the defendant, the contractor abandoned the work and the water commissioners of the said city thereafter prosecuted the construction of the tunnels."

This work was done by employing engineers, foremen, bosses, and men to do the work, without attempting to let the contract "to the lowest responsible bidder," as required by the charter. On examining the record in that case we learn that, as set forth in the findings, the contractor "did by and with the consent of said city, relinquish and abandon the said contract or contracts so far as they obligated him to construct the then uncompleted portion" of the described work. Therefore, in passing, we express the opinion that when the court said in the decision that the contractor "abandoned the work," those words were used in the sense of the findings; that is to say, that the contract was abandoned. It was held that under those circumstances the water commissioners did not have power to perform the work on the tunnels by day's labor, and that any contract which they made with the plaintiff in that connection was void.

In the present action the contract was not abandoned by the contractor, nor was it abandoned by the school district. The contractor had failed to complete the work. The school district insisted upon its completion in accordance with its terms. In proceeding to do the work on and after the 12th day of January, 1916, the school district was proceeding in accordance with the terms of a contract still in existence, which had been let according to law, and which by its terms provided for the then existing emergency. The provision thus made was a part of the contract of suretyship. The public interests which were intended to be guarded by the provisions of section 1617, subdivision 20, of the Political Code, were fully protected by this procedure. The surety company was protected because it was first given the very opportunity provided for by the contract to complete the work, of which opportunity it did not avail itself within the time prescribed by the notice given in accordance with the contract, and further because the sum thereupon expended by the school district for carrying on the work was only the reasonable value of the materials and workmen thus furnished.

We have not deemed it necessary to discuss the numerous decisions from other states which are referred to in the briefs, most of which sustain the position of appellants on this question. It is conceded that a few decisions run the other way, notably the case of Chicago v. Hanreddy, 211 Ill. 24, 71 N. E. 834, which is cited in the Foxen Case, supra. We are satisfied that the rule contended for by respondents and indicated in the Foxen Case, even if admitted as the true rule, should not be held to apply, unless the contract has been abandoned and thereby is at an end.

In Bacigalupi v. Phœnix Building, etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 632, 639, 112 Pac. 892, 894, the First District Court of Appeal describes in apt words the purpose and effect of contract terms similar to those contained in section 6 of the present contract which we have quoted. The court said:

> "This paragraph has no application to the case where the contractor entirely abandons the contract, but only applies where he is proceeding under the contract, but fails to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen to complete the contract within the time limited by the contract. It was intended to give the owner the right, under such circumstances and after giving the notice, to take the completion of the contract into his own hands, and to deduct the cost thereof from the contract price. This we think to be the meaning of the paragraph as between the owner and the contractor, and by which the surety was bound."

In legal effect, the work is being done under the contract, and in its performance the owner is acting for the contractor, as it was agreed that he might do under those circumstances.

[2, 3] The offer of the surety company to perform the contract, when considered with relation to the expiration of the time limited in the three days' notice, and in connection with the fact that on January 12th the school district had taken charge of the work, was too late. On the other hand, if such offer be considered with relation to the time when the actual liability of the surety company accrued, it was premature. "Performance of the principal obligation, or an offer of such performance, duly made as provided in this Code, exonerates a surety." Civ. Code, §§ 2839. But "where an obligation fixes a time for its performance, an offer of performance must be made at that time, within reasonable hours, and not before nor afterwards." Civ. Code, § 1490. Upon the facts as they existed on the 12th day of January, 1916, the school district had the right which it exercised to proceed with the performance of the work, and to charge against the contract price the reasonable expense thereof. When this had been done and the full amount of the contract price had been expended by or on behalf of the contractor—that is to say, on the 21st day of June—it was found that the work was not complete. Respondents cannot complain of the fact that at that time they were given an opportunity to complete the building, which offer they declined to accept. Neither can they complain that from and after that time the work of completion was done by a contract let to the lowest bidder after proceedings in accordance with the provisions of the Political Code. The result in any form is in its essence just the same. The liability had accrued, and the amount thereof was to be determined in accordance with the reasonable cost of finishing the building. The additional expense thus incurred is found to have been the reasonable cost thereof.

The judgment is reversed.

CITRUS SOAP CO. v. PEET BROS. MFG. CO. (Civ. 3363.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Sales ⚷181(11)—Evidence sufficient to sustain finding seller's failure to deliver by date set caused by influenza quarantine.

In an action by the seller of glycerine against the buyer for failure to accept delivery, evidence held sufficient to sustain the trial court's finding that plaintiff seller's failure to deliver all of the glycerine prior to the date specified in the contract for complete delivery was caused by an influenza quarantine and consequent delay in production; the contract having been made subject to suspension in case of interference in plant whereby buyer or seller should be prevented from producing or receiving the goods.

2. Sales ⚷81(4)—Seller can perform within reasonable time after date set on suspension in production of which notice given.

Where glycerine was sold, entire delivery to be by December 31st, the contract stipulating for its suspension if any interference in plant prevented production, and December 9th by letter the seller advised the buyer it had been forced to close down by the health authorities due to an influenza quarantine, stating that it was in hopes of being able to deliver the entire order by December 31st, and the buyer did not object to the sufficiency of such notice of suspension of the contract, under its terms the seller was entitled to perform within a reasonable time after December 31st.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by the Citrus Soap Company against the Peet Bros. Manufacturing Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ransey Probasco and Robinson & Sizer, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Bischoff & Thompson, of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for breach of a contract for the sale of merchandise bought by defendant from plaintiff. The plaintiff recovered judgment, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

Under date of November 7, 1918, plaintiff sold and agreed to deliver to the defendant, "Sellers usual good quality soap lye crude glycerine"; the quantity specified being 11 to 12 drums, weighing approximately 1,100 pounds net each. The place of delivery was Berkeley, Cal. The goods were to be delivered "as made, but entire delivery to be completed prior to December 31, 1918." Glycerine was made by plaintiff as a by-product in the manufacture of washing powder.

The contingency of delay in performance of this contract was covered as follows:

> "This contract is made subject to suspension in case of fire, flood, explosion, strike or unavoidable accident to the machinery or the works of the producers or receivers of this material, or from any interference in plant by reason of which either buyers or sellers are prevented from producing, delivering or receiving the goods and in such event the delivery thus suspended is to be made after such disabilities have been removed; otherwise to be fulfilled in good faith. Notice, with full particulars and the probable term of the continuance of such disability, shall be given to the other party hereto, within ten days of the date of the occurrence of such disability."

Under this contract the plaintiff delivered prior to December 31st, three drums which were accepted. The remaining nine drums were shipped by the plaintiff from San Diego as follows: Four drums shipped December 21st, arrived at Berkeley December 31st; three drums shipped December 28th, arrived at Berkeley January 2d; two drums shipped December 30th, arrived at Berkeley January 7th. Acceptance of these nine drums was refused. The damages awarded are the difference between the agreed price of 30 cents per pound and 11 cents per pound, the market value of the glycerine at the time of defendant's refusal to accept and pay therefor.

The court found that the shipments were made and the dates of arrival at Berkeley were as above set forth; nevertheless, the court also found that "said goods were shipped and delivered in all respects in conformity with said contract of sale." Appellant excepts to this finding and claims that there was no evidence to sustain such finding, since it is an established fact that the nine drums which appellant refused to accept did not arrive at the agreed place of delivery before the 31st day of December, 1918.

But the court further found as follows:

> "That the factory and place of business of plaintiffs is in the city of San Diego, state of California. That during the months of November and December, 1918, there was prevalent in the city of San Diego an epidemic of Spanish influenza. That on December 5, 1918, the common council of the city of San Diego, at the request of the board of health of San Diego, to protect the health of the people of San Diego adopted a quarantine Ordinance No. 7587, entitled 'An ordinance establishing a general quarantine within the city of San Diego, Cal.,' providing that all factories and places of business, including the factory and place of business of plaintiff, should be closed for four days. That plaintiff in compliance with the provisions of said ordinance closed its factory and place of business for a period of four days, beginning with December 6, 1918. That on account of such interference plaintiff was further interrupted in the manufacture of glycerine for a period of five days. That said plaintiff on account of said interference was not able to produce and manufacture said glycerine and make delivery of nine drums thereof prior to December 31, 1918. That the failure of plaintiff to deliver said glycerine prior to December 31, 1918, and all the delay in arrival and delivery at Berkeley, Cal., was due to said interference caused by the enforcement of said ordinance."

Appellant contends that there is no evidence to excuse plaintiff's failure to deliver the agreed amount of glycerine prior to December 31st. First, it is argued that the evidence shows without contradiction that the period of interference with plaintiff's manufacture and delivery of the glycerine, to wit, nine days, as found by the court, was not sufficient to prevent the plaintiff from delivering the goods within the agreed period of time if reasonable diligence to that end had been used. The plaintiff's vice president testified:

> "We began to produce crude glycerine for the purpose of fulfilling this contract about November 11, 1918. We commenced the manufacture of glycerine four days after the contract was executed, and we made about three drums a week."

At that rate of manufacture, practically the whole amount required by the contract would have been produced by the 6th day of December, the date when the interference by reason of influenza first occurred. The complete resumption of business by plaintiff is established as of date December 15th. Appellant contends that on these facts, established by the plaintiff's own evidence, the plaintiff's noncompliance with the contract is proved and that there is no evidence sufficient to sustain the contrary finding; that according to this evidence all of the glycerine shipped on December 21st and December 28th must have been on hand prior to December 6th, and should have been shipped at such time, since the agreement was to make shipment of the merchandise as made; that, since business was fully resumed on the 15th of December, no sufficient reason can be shown to exist justifying the delay in shipping the last two drums until December 30th, or even the shipments as made on December 21st and 28th.

[1] On the other hand, there is evidence tending to prove that the rate of production was less than three drums per week, and that, at the time the quarantine went into effect on December 6th, the plaintiff had only two drums on hand. These were not shipped until two weeks later, December 21st, when four drums were shipped, and the others followed as above stated. But the agreement to ship "as made" was not an agreement to ship one drum at a time. A reasonable accumulation for shipment would be allowed. The evidence showed that this was not at all unusual. The conflict in the evidence was such that we are not able to say that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the court's finding that plaintiff's failure to deliver all of the glycerine prior to December 31st was caused by the quarantine and consequent delay in production.

[2] Appellant further contends, however, that the evidence is insufficient to establish another fact essential to respondent's right of recovery, in this, that respondent did not give notice of the interference in operation of its plant, and probable continuance of delivery, as required by the contract. The court found that plaintiff gave notice in writing, in due time, and held that the notice sufficiently complied with the requirements of the contract. Said notice was given in due time, and receipt thereof by appellant is admitted. It was in the form of a letter, dated December 9, 1918, wherein respondent said:

> "Please be advised that we have been forced to close down by the health authorities due to the quarantine established in San Diego against the influenza. The quarantine went into effect Friday morning, the 6th of December, and we may be compelled to take advantage of the contingency clause of our contract. However, we have finished six drums of the glycerine, three of which we have already shipped, and we are in hopes of being able to deliver the entire amount by December 31st."

Appellant claims that this was not the notice required by the contract, because it failed to state the probable term of disability, and because it further stated that respondent hoped to be able to deliver the entire amount by the specified date. While the notice did not in terms set out the number of days of delay in production and shipments which would probably result from the quarantine, it did imply that the delay might carry the time of completion of deliveries to a date later than December 31st, although appellant hoped that this result might not follow. The contract did not require more than that reasonable warning be given of the fact of delay, the nature of the cause thereof, and the probable extent of interference with timely performance of the seller's obligation. The notice given was a reasonable attempt, in good faith, to meet these requirements. It does not appear that appellant objected to the sufficiency thereof, until the point was raised in the defense of this action. We are of the opinion, therefore, that under the terms of the contract, respondent was entitled to perform the contract within a reasonable time after December 31st. Since this was done, the defendant was bound to perform the contract, and should be held liable for its breach thereof.

50 Cal. App. 11

Ex parte DEES. (Cr. 943.)

1. Licenses 🔑7(1)—Ordinance imposing tax on reselling theater tickets invalid.

An ordinance making it unlawful to engage in the business of selling theater tickets elsewhere than at the theater office without a license, and imposing a charge of $300 a month for such license, is an unwarranted interference with the liberty of citizens of the state and the United States not based upon any reasonable consideration of the public health, morals, or safety, nor of the cost of police supervision, and cannot be upheld as an exercise of the police power.

2. Licenses 🔑15(1) — Reselling of theater tickets sale of "goods," and hence not taxable.

Under San Francisco Charter, art. 2, c. 2, § 15, providing that license taxes shall not be imposed upon any person selling goods, wares, or merchandise at a fixed place of business except such as require permits from the police commissioners, the city cannot impose a license tax on the business of selling theater tickets at a fixed place of business, such tickets being "goods."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Goods.]

3. Licenses 🔑5½—Power to license business is not power to prohibit.

A municipal corporation's power to license a business for revenue is not a power to prohibit.

4. Constitutional law 🔑70(3) — Reasonableness of license on business is question for court.

The question whether an ordinance imposing a license tax on a business is so unreasonable in character as to transcend the proper exercise of the lawmaking power is one to be determined by the court.

5. Licenses 🔑7(3) — Ordinance held invalid because of disparity between tax and that imposed on other lines of business.

An ordinance imposing a license tax of $300 a month on the business of selling theater tickets elsewhere than at the theater office, when considered as a taxing ordinance, held unreasonable, oppressive, lacking in impartiality, and unfair in view of the wide disparity between the tax and those levied on other and somewhat kindred lines of business, especially as the business was declared unlawful except upon the condition of prior procurement of the license, and the ordinance sought to reach mere employees of those engaged in the business.

6. Licenses 🔑7(1)—Court must look at substance when ostensible revenue measure is attacked as invalid.

While it will not be adjudged except in a clear case that an ordinance purporting to be a revenue measure is in fact an unlawful attempt to exercise a forbidden police power, courts are not bound by mere forms but must look at the substance of the thing.

7. Statutes 🔑191—Same form of expression as to number of things indicates same purpose and change of expression as to one thing indicates different purpose.

Where one form of expression is used throughout a statute dealing with a number of things, it will ordinarily be adjudged to have been used to achieve the same purpose, and, if one of many things is singled out by a notable change of expression, it is reasonable to determine that a different or modified purpose was intended.

Application by F. A. Dees for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco to secure his release from custody under an arrest for violation of the provisions of a license ordinance relating to resale of theater tickets. Petitioner discharged.

Samuel Knight and F. Eldred Boland, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Mathew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Jos. T. O'Connor, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The determination of this matter depends on the validity of a recent amendment to the San Francisco License Ordinance and particularly to the section thereof relating to the re-sale of theater tickets, for the violation of which the petitioner was arrested.

On behalf of the municipality it is maintained that the provisions of the ordinance were adopted by the local legislative body in the exercise of its admitted power to raise revenue by taxation, and that the courts cannot interfere with the exercise of this power. The petitioner, on the other hand, contends that the provisions in question were not adopted under the power to tax, but constitute an unlawful exercise of the police power, and further that, even considered as a revenue measure, the section of the ordinance under consideration cannot be upheld.

The frequent application to courts of this and other states to adjudicate upon similar license provisions, as well as the common experience of the great mass of people who travel and who attend theatrical performances, have made notorious the fact that it is the custom of so-called ticket speculators to buy in advance numbers of desirable reserved seat tickets for popular performances and to resell them at greatly advanced prices to those who desire to attend the performances, and the equally well-known fact that in large cities at the principal hotels patrons thereof may usually buy reserved seat tickets for the local theaters at a trifling advance over the advertised price of such tickets. However annoying it may be to one desiring to attend a play to be compelled to be satisfied with an undesirable seat, or to pay an excess price for a seat where he may see and hear what is going on upon the stage, it has been said by the Supreme Court that—

> "The sale of a theater ticket at an advance upon the original purchase price, or the business of reselling such tickets at a profit, is no more immoral, or injurious to the public welfare or convenience, than is the sale of any ordinary article of merchandise at a profit." Ex parte Quarg, 149 Cal. 81, 84 Pac. 767, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 117 Am. St. Rep. 115, 9 Ann. Cas. 747.

From the petition it appears, and upon this proceeding it is admitted by the return, that the petitioner at the time of his arrest was employed by the Van Noy Interstate Company, a corporation, and as such employee was in charge of its business, which business was described as conducting, among other things, the news stands or stores located in the Palace and St. Francis Hotels in San Francisco, paying for the privilege of conducting that business; that a part of that business conducted at said hotels is the selling of theater tickets to guests of said hotels for admission to various theaters in San Francisco, as a necessary prerequisite to its occupancy of the news stands; and that it is a convenience to the guests of said hotels. It was similarly alleged and similarily admitted that the corporation charges in addition to the price of the ticket and the revenue tax thereon the sum of 25 cents for each ticket and no more, and that the gross income from the sale of tickets has not been and is not now in excess of the sum of $600 per month.

[1] From a reference in the respondent's brief it appears the same petitioner was arrested, and on a proceeding similar to this was discharged under the provisions of the ordinance prior to the amendment now under consideration. In re Dees, 189 Pac. 1050. It was determined that the ordinance as it then read was invalid. The only difference between the section of the ordinance then under consideration and the section now before the court is that before the change it purported to make it unlawful for any person to sell any theater ticket, except at the office of the theater, without obtaining a ticket peddler's license, and it now purports to make it unlawful for any person to engage in the business of selling tickets elsewhere than at the office of the theater without obtaining a ticket peddler's license. The amount of the license charge is the same, $300 a month. By the amendment, one of the objections to the validity of the former ordinance was met. It was not necessary to the determination of the matter then before the court to consider the other objections, which were then urged and are now urged against its validity. For reasons stated in the former proceeding, the ordinance under consideration cannot be upheld as an exercise of the police power. In re Dees, 189 Pac. 1050. It constitutes an unwarranted interference with the liberty of citizens of the state and of the United States, not based upon any reasonable consideration of the public health, morals, or safety, nor of the cost of police supervision. Ex parte Quarg, 149 Cal. 79, 84 Pac. 766, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 117 Am. St. Rep. 115, 9 Ann. Cas. 747; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152.

> "Any attempt on the part of the state, or of the county as one of the subdivisions of the state, to take the property of an individual for public purposes by way of taxation, must find an express statutory warrant, and all laws having this object are to be construed strictly in favor of the individual as against the state." Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 165, 36 Pac. 400.

[2] The power to impose license taxes is vested in the board of supervisors by section 15, art. 2, c. 2, of the Charter, and is limited by the proviso reading as follows:

> "But no license taxes shall be imposed upon any person who, at any fixed place of business in the city and county, sells or manufactures goods, wares or merchandise, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners as provided in this charter."

There is nothing in the charter requiring permits from the board of police commissioners to sell or resell theater tickets. Rapp v. Kiel, 159 Cal. 702, 115 Pac. 651. Under the rule announced in Merced County v. Helm, supra, the charter power is to be construed strictly in favor of the individual. It is admitted that the petitioner, as the employee of the Van Noy Interstate Company, was selling theater tickets at a fixed place of business. While the Supreme Court in the Quarg Case, supra, in a manner drew a distinction between theater tickets and ordinary articles of merchandise, it did not and was not called upon to consider whether theater tickets are "goods" within the meaning of the phrase, "goods, wares and merchandise." No direct decision upon this question has been found, but there is ample authority for so holding. The word "goods" in the phrase has been defined as "movable property" (Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 600); "every species of property which was not real estate or freehold" (In re Gay's Gold, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 362, 20 L. Ed. 606); "any personal property of which larceny may be committed" (State v. Brooks, 4 Conn. 449); "personal property" (French v. Schoonmaker, 69 N. J. Law, 6, 54 Atl. 225). It has been held to include money (Hall v. State, 3 Ohio St. 576; U. S. v. Candace, 25 Fed. Cas. 280; The Elizabeth and Jane, 8 Fed. Cas. 473; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 608, 22 Sup. Ct. 493, 46 L. Ed. 713); shares of stock (Boardman v. Cutter, 128 Mass. 390; Banta v. Chicago, 172 Ill. 204, 50 N. E. 237, 40 L. R. A. 611); a newspaper (Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 358, 82 Am. Dec. 302); a promissory note (New England, etc., Co. v. Commonwealth, 195 Mass. 385, 81 N. E. 385, 11 Ann. Cas. 678; Baldwin v. Williams, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 367); and, a lottery ticket (Yohe v. Robertson, 2 Whart. [Pa.] 162). The conclusion that the required power to collect the license fee on the business of selling theater tickets, they being goods, not only is not found in the charter, but is expressly withheld from the municipality, finds further support in the fact that a proposal to amend the charter in this particular was defeated at the recent general election.

[3, 4] Even though the power to license for revenue be upheld, it is not a power to prohibit. The question of whether or not the ordinance is so unreasonable in character as to transcend the proper exercise of the lawmaking power is one to be determined by the court. Merced County v. Fleming, 111 Cal. 50, 51, 43 Pac. 392. While as a general rule the power to tax may be exercised by the legislative authority without interference by courts, it is subject to many exceptions. So, also, is the general rule that for the purpose of collecting revenue the Legislature may classify different trades and business activities, and may impose widely variant license taxes. In a case where the ordinance purported to fix a license of $100 per quarter for merchants doing a business of $250,000 per quarter, if their goods were actually in the city or in transit to it, but a license of $2,000 on the same merchants whose goods were not in the city or in transit, the Supreme Court, in determining against the validity of the license, quoted with approval a statement from Dillon's Municipal Corporations, as follows:

> "An ordinance passed under a general authority of this nature must be, first, 'reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state'; second, it must not be oppressive; third, it must be impartial, fair, and general; fourth, it may regulate but must not restrain trade." Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 609.

In a recent case decided by the Supreme Court, in a learned opinion written by Mr. Chief Justice Angellotti, in which the ordinance in question was declared to be a taxing ordinance, and in which both general rules relied on by the respondent here were declared, and their proper limits defined, it was held that the license on merchants operating vending machines was a tax "solely on his mode of making his sales and deliveries, without any reference * * * to the amount of business done." Recognizing the power of the taxing body to classify, it was held to be based on an unreasonable classification. In re Richardson, 170 Cal. 73, 148 Pac. 213.

[5] The ordinance now under consideration is the general license ordinance of San Francisco. By section 1 it provides that every person, firm, or corporation now or hereafter liable to pay a license tax shall be liable to civil action; by section 2, the license tax shall be due and payable quarterly in advance at the office and to the tax collector; by section 3, that licenses shall not be transferred; and there are other general sections applicable to all licenses which have no bearing on the question involved in this application. From sections 78 to 89, inclusive, are definitions of different classes of businesses and specifications of the amounts to be paid for licenses. Section 90 provides for conviction of a misdemeanor for violators of the ordinance, and there are certain other general provisions. It is admitted by the return that the total gross income of the Van Noy Interstate Company from this business was not in excess of $600 per month, or less than $2,000 per quarter. The ordinance provides a license of $30 per quarter or $10 a month to be paid by express agents whose gross profits are between $1,500 and $2,500 per quarter; mercantile agencies, whose gross receipts do not exceed $3,000 per quarter, are required to pay a license of $15 per quarter, or $5 per month; real estate agents, whose commissions are less than $5,000 per quarter, pay a license of $10 a quarter; proprietors of boarding houses, lodging houses, or apartment houses, whose gross receipts are between $1,000 and $3,000 per quarter, pay a tax of $5; assayers, whose gross commissions are less than $6,000 per quarter, pay a tax of $10; auctioneers, whose sales amount to less than half a million dollars annually, pay an annual tax of $200, while ticket peddlers, if they be ticket peddlers, are required to pay $300 a month. The tax of garage proprietors is based on the amount of floor space occupied, and ranges from $12.50 to $25 per quarter; dealers in secondhand automobiles pay a tax of $50 per quarter; proprietors of baseball fields pay a tax of $150 per quarter; merchandise brokers doing business in any amount under $20,000 per quarter pay a tax of $10 per quarter. Stock brokers, whose gross profits are between $1,250 and $2,500 per quarter, pay a tax of $32; cycloramas and various amusement concerns, including skating rinks, pay $20 to $40 per quarter; junk dealers, whose aggregate sales and purchases amount to less than $5,000, pay $12.50; itinerant venders are required to pay $100 per day for a license to be issued daily. There is no definition in this ordinance of itinerant venders, but the provision is declared to be inapplicable to commercial travelers or selling agents, hawkers on the street, peddlers from vehicles, and persons selling fruit, vegetables, butter, eggs, or other farm or ranch products. In the opinion in the former habeas corpus proceeding of Dees it was pointed out that the word "peddler" implied itinerancy or the hawking of articles for sale upon the public streets. There is no suggestion in this case that the petitioner was in any sense a peddler or an itinerant vender. Peripatetic venders are not within the protection of section 15 of article 2 of the Charter. A peddler does not sell at a fixed place of business, and he is required to procure a permit from the board of police commissioners. Charter, § 9, c. 3, art. 8.

Resuming the consideration of the taxes provided by the ordinance, it appears that bond brokers are required to pay $45 a quarter; public passenger vehicles, other than railroad cars, "jitneys" for instance, if limited to the capacity of three passengers, $3 a year, if five, $5 a year, and if from eight to ten persons, $20 a year; general peddlers pay taxes of $12 a quarter; secondhand dealers, $25 a quarter; theaters with a seating capacity of more than 1,450 people pay $600 a year for an annual license, $200 for a quarterly license, or $100 for a monthly license. With a seating capacity of 500 persons they pay a license of $100 per annum, as against a license of $3,600 per annum levied on those who resell theater tickets. Architects, attorneys, engineers, insurance adjusters, oculists, physicians, surgeons, and other professional people whose annual gross receipts are from $7,500 to $10,000 a year are expected to pay a tax of $7.50 per quarter. Stock and bond brokers whose gross profits are less than $2,500 per quarter are taxed at $32; vaudeville houses, whose maximum charge is 31 cents or over, pay a license based on the seating capacity, ranging from $125 per quarter on a seating capacity of 500 to $300 per quarter on a seating capacity of 2,000. It is impossible to consider the wide disparity between a purported tax of $300 per month and the other taxes levied on other and somewhat kindred lines of business, without reaching the conclusion that, considered as a taxing ordinance, it is unreasonable, oppressive, lacking in impartiality, and unfair under the rules approved in Ex parte Frank, supra.

[6, 7] While it will not be adjudged, except in a clear case, that an ordinance purporting to be a revenue measure is, in fact, an unlawful attempt to exercise a forbidden police power, "courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty, indeed, are under the solemn duty, to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the Legislature has transcended the limits of its authority." Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 78, 79, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152. In addition to the apparent excessive amount of the license fee imposed on this single line of business, when compared with every other license fee charged, the wording of the section relating to the sale of theater tickets is so different from that concerning other lines of business as to warrant the conclusion that it was designedly changed. It is fundamental that where one form of expression is used throughout a statute dealing with a number of things it will ordinarily be adjudged to have been used to achieve the same purpose. It is no less clear that, if one of many things is singled out by a notable change of expression, it is reasonable to determine there was a different or modified purpose intended. In regard to every other kind of business the ordinance simply provides that those engaged in it shall pay a license tax. If they continue in business without paying the tax, it may be collected as a debt, or the dealer may be punished as for a misdemeanor for violating the ordinance. In section 70, alone, under the heading "Ticket Peddlers," it is declared in the first instance that "it shall be unlawful for any person * * * to engage in the business or occupation of selling any theater ticket at any other place than the office of the management of said theater," without first having taken out and obtained a license to be known as a "Ticket Peddler's License." The license is to be issued by the tax collector at the rate of $300 per month for each license. The section then provides that—

> "Every person having a ticket peddler's license, every person engaged in the business of peddling theater * * * tickets, shall, on the demand of any officer of the tax collector's department, or any peace officer, produce and exhibit the same."

Not only was the unlawfulness of the business first expressed, but it was sought by another deviation of the language used in other sections to reach mere employees of those engaged in the business. For instance, section 67 of the ordinance provides that "every person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of slaughtering cattle" shall pay a license, but there is no attempt thereby to collect multiple taxes for the same general business by collecting similar taxes from every one engaged in the occupation of slaughtering cattle. This is not an immaterial distinction. In the present case it appears by the petition, and it is admitted by the return, that the petitioner was an employee of the Van Noy Interstate Company, and was arrested for engaging in the business and occupation of selling theater tickets in violation of the terms of the ordinance. In this connection, under the admitted facts, it may well be doubted whether it can be said in any proper sense that either the Van Noy Interstate Company or the petitioner was engaged in the business or occupation in terms prohibited except upon the condition of obtaining a ticket peddler's license. It is a matter of common knowledge that photographic hand cameras are sold at stationers', opticians', and drug stores. The practically universal use of such cameras, and their frequent exchange for new or different ones, have led to equal notoriety of the custom of such dealers to accept old cameras, which are resold at reduced prices. No one would seriously suggest that, by thus rendering accommodation to the public, the well-known business of a drug store, or of an optician, or of a stationer, was converted into that of a dealer in secondhand goods, and liable to payment of the license tax imposed by section 63 of the ordinance on persons "engaging in the business of buying, selling or exchanging secondhand goods."

The question of whether the provisions of section 70 constitute it a tax measure or not, in view of the enactment that the business shall be unlawful, except upon the condition of prior procurement of the ticket peddler's license, seems to have been answered adversely to the municipality, in a case where the question arose as to whether an exaction upon foreign corporations was or was not a tax, and the Supreme Court announced the principle that laws cannot be declared unconstitutional unless clearly so, but said:

> "This principle is not disputed, * * * but it must not be pressed so far as to amount to an abdication of its functions on the part of the court, nor a denial of justice to suitors. If we can clearly see that the law is beyond the power of the Legislature, we must so declare.
> "It is claimed that this is a sum paid by the corporation for the privilege of acting as such in this state, and therefore not a tax. The plausibility of the claim consists in apparently identifying this case with cases in which it is clear the exaction is a condition, and from which this is made to differ only in degree. If the condition had been that the corporation should pay a fixed sum for the privilege before it was allowed to do business at all, it would no doubt be held a condition, and not a tax; so perhaps if the license were required to be renewed at stated periods. * * * So the two classes of cases, one of which is plainly taxation, and the other a sum paid for a permit, may be approximated until it is difficult or impossible to say to which class a given case may belong. These difficulties to discriminate the principles underlying different cases constantly included in different classes, and to which the same rule of decision cannot be applied, constitute the perpetual debating grounds of the law, and occasion much of the confusion in the decisions. But, as was remarked by Judge Marshall, because we cannot easily draw the line does not prove that there is no difference in principle. No one fails to note the contrast between the light of day and the darkness of night, but no one is able to draw the line between daylight and darkness, or note the precise instant when one ends and the other begins." San Francisco v. Insurance Co., 74 Cal. 120–121, 15 Pac. 380, 382 (5 Am. St. Rep. 425).

It was held the particular exaction was a tax and not a provision for payment as a condition for doing business. The decision was based on an examination of all the circumstances, concluding that the enactment purported to be a revenue measure. In the present case upon a similar examination the conclusion is reached that section 70 of the ordinance does not provide for a tax, but seeks to establish a condition for carrying on a business which has been adjudged to be lawful. Considered as a police regulation, the enactment was beyond the power of the supervisors. As a tax measure it is based on no reasonable distinction; it is unfair and oppressive, if not in fact prohibitory. Theater tickets being within the definition of goods, under the charter the board of supervisors, though vested with power to license ticket peddlers, is without power to exact such a tax on those selling such goods at a fixed place of business, and it cannot enlarge its powers by designating men as peddlers who are not such in fact. The section under consideration is invalid.

The petitioner is discharged.

BRICE v. WALKER et al. (Civ. 2983.)

1. Election of remedies 🔑14—When "waiver by election" occurs.

Waiver by election occurs where a party having one or more different or coexisting modes of procedure and relief allowed by law on the same state of facts, which are inconsistent with each other, elects to pursue one of these remedies.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Election; First Series, Waiver by Election.]

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑255—Commencing suit on note does not waive right to foreclose.

The mere commencing, in a jurisdiction in which the property is not situated, of an action on a note secured by chattel mortgage, which was subsequently dismissed without the court having acted thereon, does not waive the right to foreclose the mortgage, though prosecuting such action to judgment would waive such right under Code Civ. Proc. § 726.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑172(3) — Mortgagor cannot recover possession after foreclosure is waived without paying debt.

A mortgagor of a chattel or his donee with notice of the mortgage cannot recover possession of the chattel from the mortgagee even if the latter has waived his right to foreclose the mortgage without offering to do equity by paying the mortgage debt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Lena Mae Brice against Howard Walker and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. T. Quinn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner and entitled to the possession of a certain automobile, brought this action to recover possession thereof. Judgment having been entered in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

On the 17th day of November, 1916, the plaintiff's father, Charles P. Brice, being then and there the owner of said automobile, made and delivered his note of that date at Los Angeles, Cal., due six months after date, for the sum of $300, to the Western Union Life Insurance Company, together with a mortgage of the automobile as security for payment of the note. The note and mortgage passed by assignment to the defendant First State Bank of St. Joe, Idaho. On the 18th day of March, 1918, the First State Bank commenced an action in the state of Arizona in a court of competent jurisdiction against Charles P. Brice on sundry obligations, including said note. Thereafter, and after the commencement of the present action, but prior to the trial thereof, defendant bank so amended its complaint in the action in Arizona that the count on the said note was omitted from that action. After the 31st day of May, 1918, but prior to the 10th day of June, 1918, Charles P. Brice, by gift inter vivos, presented to the plaintiff herein all of his right, title, and interest in and to the said automobile. This transfer was without consideration and without the knowledge or consent of and without notice to the defendant bank. At the time of said transfer the plaintiff knew of the existence of the chattel mortgage. Defendant has been in peaceable possession of the automobile ever since the 21st day of May, 1918.

[1] Appellant contends that by bringing the suit on the note in Arizona the defendant bank waived its mortgage lien. In general terms, waiver by election occurs when a party having two or more different and coexisting modes of procedure and relief allowed by law on the same state of facts, and, the one being inconsistent with the other, elects to pursue one of those remedies. Appellant calls attention to section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as found in the chapter on actions for foreclosure of mortgages, and providing that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter," and argues that, by electing to proceed in an action at law on the note alone in a court foreign to the situs of the mortgaged property, the defendant bank waived not only the right to foreclose the mortgage, but abandoned the lien itself. She therefore contends that, since the automobile was given to her by the owner thereof while the action on the note was pending in the state of Arizona, she took the property free from the lien of the mortgage, and that this is true, although such action in Arizona was thereafter dismissed so far as said note was concerned, and never proceeded to judgment.

[2] In the case of Ould v. Stoddard, 54 Cal. 613, the payee of the note, which was secured by mortgage on property in this state, first obtained a judgment upon the note against the maker, in a court of competent jurisdiction in the state of Ohio, and then prosecuted an action in this state to foreclose the mortgage. The Ohio judgment had not been paid, and an execution issued thereon had been returned wholly unsatisfied. In the foreclosure case it was decided that by electing to bring the action on the note alone in the state of Ohio the plaintiff waived the security of the mortgage. Referring to section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, the court said:

> "It is not difficult to discover the policy which dictated the enactment of this statute. The tendency of modern legislation is to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and no one doubts the wisdom of it. In order to give to this statute the force and effect which the Legislature intended it should have, we must hold that, by prosecuting an action upon the note secured by the mortgage to final judgment, the plaintiff has exhausted his remedy upon both the note and the security. To hold otherwise would be to hold that there may be two actions, where the statute declares there can be but one."

Counsel for appellant insists that the mere commencement of the action on the note in the Arizona court was a complete and irrevocable election to substitute that remedy for the remedy by foreclosure of the mortgage. Our attention is called to several decisions relied upon as supporting this proposition. These were conditional sale contracts in which, upon default in payment by the purchaser, the vendor had the right to bring an action for the purchase money, and had the alternative right to retake possession of the property. It was held that the vendor could not retake the property and also sue for the purchase price thereof. In George J. Birkel Co. v. Nast, 20 Cal. App. 651, 129 Pac. 945, the court said:

> "The legal effect of such election was, immediately upon the filing of the complaint, to transfer to and vest in defendant title."

In Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 42 Pac. 435, referring to a similar contract, and the same alternative remedies, the court said:

> "These remedies being inconsistent, the plaintiff could elect which he would pursue, but he could not have both."

Parke, etc., Co. v. White River L. Co., 101 Cal. 37, 35 Pac. 442, referred to the same alternative remedies, and the court said that—

> "The pursuit of one remedy necessarily excluded the other. It was not entitled both to the purchase price and the property, and an action brought to recover the purchase price, as was done in this case, is a ratification of the sale."

In each of the two cases last above cited it appeared that the alternative remedies first used by the plaintiff had been carried to judgment before the plaintiff commenced his second action. In Geo. J. Birkel Co. v. Nast, supra, the plaintiff was seeking to hold by attachment the property which by conditional sale contract had been delivered to the defendant. In none of these cases was it necessary to determine that the commencement of an action, followed by the voluntary dismissal thereof by the plaintiff without any judicial action by the court, and without any special proceeding by attachment or otherwise against the defendant's property, constituted an irrevocable election of the prior remedy. In J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Copren Bros., 187 Pac. 772, 775, referring to the doctrine of election between remedies, the Third District Court of Appeal said:

> "The cases where that principle has been successfully invoked are generally where a party, having two different and distinct remedies available to him for the enforcement of a single right or obligation, has adopted one of the remedies and through it has pressed his action to final judgment, and, finding that he has failed to adopt the course or the remedy which would have rendered the execution of his judgment the more effectual, attempts to invoke the other remedy."

In Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53, the plaintiff was the owner of a note secured by mortgage. Two days before the day when plaintiff's right of action would have been barred by the statute of limitations he filed a complaint on the note without reference to the mortgage. Four days later he filed an amended complaint which, in addition to the matter alleged in the original complaint, counted also on the mortgage. The mortgagor moved to strike from the files the amended complaint on the ground that it wholly changed the cause of action, which motion was denied. He then demurred on the ground that the right of action counted upon in the amended complaint was barred. This demurrer was overruled, and thereafter judgment of foreclosure was entered. The judgment was affirmed. The Supreme Court held:

> That "the cause of action set up in the original and that set up in the amended complaint was simply the obligation sought to be enforced—that is to say, the obligation to pay the money agreed to be paid—and that the only change that took place was in the remedy by which it was sought to enforce the obligation."

Since the cause of action was not changed, the time to which the statute of limitations ran was the time of filing the original complaint. While the doctrine of election was not discussed in that opinion, it was an implied element in the decision; for, if the mere commencement of the action as an action at law on the note constituted a complete election which barred the lien of the mortgage and the right to foreclose the same, then the mortgagee would not have been permitted to pursue his remedy by foreclosure. We are of the opinion that on the facts of the case at bar the lien of the mortgage has not been lost, and the right of foreclosure continues in existence.

[3] Respondents contend, and with this we agree, that even if by reason of its conduct in having commenced an action on the note in Arizona it would now be precluded from foreclosing the mortgage in the courts of this state, nevertheless the judgment should be affirmed because the plaintiff simply stands in the position of her donor, she having paid no consideration for the property, and that she, like her donor, is not entitled to recover possession of the automobile unless she first does equity by paying or offering to pay the note to secure which the mortgage was given. Defendant bank has possession of the automobile, which possession was peaceably obtained from the owner, and under the terms of the mortgage is entitled to such possession until the mortgage debt has been paid. In Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314, where it appeared that the mortgagee had taken possession of mortgaged premises with the consent of the mortgagor, it was held that the grantee of the mortgagor could not maintain ejectment against the mortgagee in possession without first paying the mortgage debt. The court said:

> "Whenever a mortgagor seeks a remedy against his mortgagee, which appears to the court to be inequitable, whether it be to cancel the mortgage as a cloud upon his title (Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271), or to enjoin a sale under the power given by him in the security (Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298), or to recover from the mortgagee the possession of the mortgaged premises, the court will deny him the relief he seeks, except upon the condition that he shall do that which is consonant with equity."

In Burns v. Hiatt, 149 Cal. 617, 87 Pac. 196, 117 Am. St. Rep. 157, after making the same quotation above given from Spect v. Spect, the court says:

"It was further declared in that case that the fact that the debt is barred by the statute of limitations is immaterial in such a case, the statute barring the remedy only, and not extinguishing, or even impairing, the obligation of the debtor. As long as the obligation to pay the debt exists, it is not equitable that the mortgagor should have relief against the mortgage given to secure the same, and such relief can be given only on condition that he discharges the obligation."

No distinction can be made between the case at bar and the case of an obligation which has been barred by the statute of limitations, for in the latter case the Code provides that the lien is extinguished. Nevertheless, although the lien may be extinguished, the debt is not satisfied by mere lapse of time. So here the utmost that could be claimed by the plaintiff or her donor, even if that claim were sustained, would be that the right to foreclose the mortgage has been extinguished. The debt remains unsatisfied. This being so, the plaintiff cannot recover possession of the property without first paying the debt on account of which the mortgage was given.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENT v. DANZIGER et al. (Civ. 3427.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 30, 1920.)

Partnership ⚿101—Partner paying judgment not entitled to contribution in view of agreement.

Where copartnership agreement provided that particular partner should not be liable for debts incurred or moneys expended, such partner was not liable for contribution to a copartner who paid judgment rendered against all partners in favor of third person for services rendered the copartnership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by J. M. Kent against J. M. Danziger and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Danziger appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Anderson & Borton and F. E. Borton, all of Bakersfield, and Barnhill & Pratt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In substance, the facts out of which this controversy arose are as follows: In the year 1910 plaintiff, defendant Danziger, and E. A. Wiltsee associated themselves under the fictitious name of Lost Hills Syndicate in a joint venture for the purpose of locating and developing certain prospective oil lands in what is known as the Lost Hills district in Kern county, Cal. It was agreed between the parties that Danziger and Wiltsee were to advance and pay all moneys required in the operations to be conducted. Kent was to contribute no money, but in consideration of devoting his time and service to the business he was to receive a share of any profits derived from the venture. The association employed W. H. Callahan as superintendent, who brought an action against the Lost Hills Syndicate, J. M. Danziger, E. A. Wiltsee, and J. M. Kent, as copartners doing business under such fictitious name, to recover for services rendered, and obtained a judgment against all of them. This judgment on appeal was affirmed, and thereafter Danziger, in consideration of the full amount thereof by him paid to Callahan, caused it to be assigned to George W. Price. An execution was issued thereon, and, as a means of enforcing contribution, a levy was made upon plaintiff's property. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action to have the execution recalled and all proceedings had and taken thereunder vacated and set aside, and the sheriff enjoined from taking any action under or pursuant to the execution against his property.

Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant Danziger has appealed.

In the trial of the Callahan case it was made to appear that Callahan commenced work in October, 1910, and continued work until December, 1911, at an agreed compensation of $5 per day. It further appears from the judgment roll in that case, which was received in evidence in the instant case, that Kent testified to the effect that about July 6, 1911, he received a letter from Danziger wherein Danziger stated to him that he was not going to put up any more money in the venture; that he was away ahead of Wiltsee in putting up money; and that Wiltsee had stated to him that he would take care of all matters from that time on. That pursuant to this notice Kent testified that he notified Callahan that Danziger was not going to put up any more money and would not be responsible for any more bills contracted, and that he (Kent) was out when Danziger quit and would have nothing more to do with it. Other testimony to the same effect and tending to show that both Danziger and Kent severed their connection with the operations, and so notified Callahan, was introduced at the trial of the Callahan case. Notwithstanding such testimony so given by Kent, the court, upon sufficient evidence, decided adversely to the contention and gave judgment in favor of Callahan. Upon the trial of the instant case, Kent gave like testimony to that by him given in the Callahan case, notwithstanding which fact the trial court in effect held that Kent was not liable to Danziger for any part of the judgment obtained in the Callahan case. Under this statement of facts the position of appellant is, as we understand it, that conceding the agreement made between Danziger, Wiltsee, and Kent was that the latter should contribute no money therein, nevertheless the Lost Hills Syndicate was dissolved on July 6th, at which time Kent communicated to Callahan the fact that Danziger stated he would contribute nothing more to the expense of continuing operations, and therefore for any expense incurred subsequent to said date Kent was liable for his share thereof. It may well be questioned whether or not Danziger's letter constituted a dissolution of the syndicate. The purport thereof is that he had, in the prosecution of the work, contributed more than his share; that he would not contribute more; and that Wiltsee was to take care of all matters from then on. Apparently he contemplated a continuance of work, the expense thereof to be borne by Wiltsee. However this may be, at the trial of the Callahan case the court determined that the syndicate continued to exist during all the time that Callahan was engaged in doing the work for which he had judgment. This being true, it follows, we think, that there was no change, readjustment, or modification of the contract between Kent and his two associates with respect to his liability as a member of the syndicate and under which it was agreed that as between them Kent should not be required to contribute any money in doing the work. While Danziger concedes that Kent is not liable to contribution for Callahan's services prior to July 6th, he insists that he should contribute to the payment of that part of the judgment covered by services performed by Callahan from July 6, 1911, to some time in December following; the sole ground therefor being the alleged dissolution of the syndicate and notice to Callahan that he would not be responsible for further payments to him.

The fact that it was not dissolved, but continued up to the time when Callahan terminated his employment, was determined in the Callahan case, and, this being true, it must follow that, notwithstanding the fact that as to Callahan plaintiff, Kent, might be liable as a copartner in the venture, nevertheless his liability to Danziger and Wiltsee for any part of the compensation due Callahan for services rendered was controlled by the agreement, and since this provided that, as between themselves, Kent should not be liable for debts incurred or moneys expended in prosecuting the work, it necessarily follows that upon Danziger paying the judgment obtained by Callahan no right to contribution exists as against Kent.

ROWE v. WURSTER. (Civ. 2173.)

1. Easements ⚿36(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding of private way by prescription.

Testimony by plaintiff, by his predecessors in title and by disinterested witnesses, that he and his predecessors had used a private right of way for more than 50 years, held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff was the owner of the right of way and entitled to restrain its obstruction.

2. Easements ⚿10(1)—Private right of way may be acquired by prescription.

A private right of way is an interest in the land to which the easement is annexed, and may be acquired by prescription within Civ. Code, § 1007.

3. Appeal and error ⚿1171(2) — Objection that evidence does not sustain award of $10 incidental damages is trivial.

In an action to restrain obstruction of a private right of way claimed by plaintiff, where it was manifest that the principal object of the action was the establishment of plaintiff's ownership of the way, and that the claim for damages was merely incidental thereto, an award of $10 damages was merely nominal, and the judgment will not be reversed because the evidence does not sustain that award, though it did show some damage.

4. Easements ⚿61(12)—Judgment held to establish only easement over lands owned by defendant.

Where the complaint, the findings, the conclusions, and the decree did not refer to the fee or the title to the land over which the easement was claimed, and the decree merely stated that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession of the private right of way as described in the complaint, which description stated the easement was over the lands of defendant, the decree is not objectionable as vesting the fee to the described lands in the plaintiff.

5. Easements ⚿61(8)—Proof of right by prescription admissible under allegation of ownership of easement.

An allegation in a complaint that plaintiff is the owner of a private way therein described is sufficient to justify evidence that the easement was acquired by prescription, since a title by prescription is a legal title under Civ. Code, § 1007.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by Andrew E. Rowe against George Wurster to establish an easement for a right of way. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for appellant.
Collier & McNamara, of Yreka, for respondent.

HART, J. This controversy arises over an alleged private right of way. Plaintiff and defendant are the owners of adjoining ranches. Plaintiff's ranch is known as and referred to in the complaint as the Patterson ranch, J. R. Patterson being his immediate predecessor; and defendant's ranch is referred to as the Carpenter ranch, he being the successor in interest in said ranch of James Carpenter. Plaintiff claims a right of way extending from his ranch across the lands of other parties not sued herein, and across certain lands of defendant, for a distance of about 486 feet to the main public highway. Plaintiff contends that the said private right of way is appurtenant to the Patterson ranch, and has been used by the plaintiff and his predecessors for a period of more than 50 years prior to the filing of his complaint, and that the use of said way has not been interrupted, except once or twice for short intervals, until the months of September, October, and November, 1918, when defendant obstructed the way by building a gate across it and claiming the right to continue said obstruction, thereby preventing plaintiff from enjoying his said way as he was accustomed to use and enjoy it. Plaintiff seeks by his action to establish his right to said private way and to compel defendant to remove the obstruction therefrom, and also prays for damages in the sum of $500. Judgment was for plaintiff, and the damage was assessed at $10, from which judgment defendant appeals.

Two general points are advanced against the validity of the judgment, and they are that the evidence is insufficient to support the vital findings and that the judgment is against law, inasmuch as by said judgment the absolute title of the land to which the easement in question is thus attached is given to the plaintiff, thereby depriving the owner of all right to use said land.

There are nine specifications involving the claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings therein specifically referred to; but all of these, with the exception of the charge that the finding as to the small amount of damages assessed against the defendant is without evidential support, assail the findings that—

"The plaintiff is now and he and his predecessors in interest have been for 50 years and more last past the owners in possession and entitled to the possession of a private right of way 20 feet wide and being 10 feet on each side of the following described line," describing the same as the way is described in the complaint, "and has the right to pass and repass over the same on foot, with team, automobile and wagons," and that "defendant, on or about the months of September, October, and November, 1918, and at other times thereafter and before the filing of this action, wrongfully obstructed said way by building a gate across the same, and that said defendant does still continue to maintain said obstruction, thereby preventing plaintiff from enjoying said way."

[1] An examination of the testimony embraced in the record before us can leave absolutely no doubt in the mind of any candid person that the findings derive sufficient support from the evidence. It is not thought to be necessary to reproduce herein a detailed statement of the testimony presented by the plaintiff to support his claim that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of the right of way described in his complaint over the defendant's lands, likewise described. It is enough to say generally that there were, besides the plaintiff himself, who bought the Patterson ranch in the year 1900, from and continously since which time the way in question remained unobstructed until in the later months of the year of 1918, 14 witnesses produced by the plaintiff, some of whom had at times owned or been connected with the Patterson and Carpenter ranches for many years before the plaintiff and the defendant became the owners, respectively, of those ranches, and others of whom had lived in the neighborhood of said ranches practically all their lives, who testified that the way in question had been habitually and continuously used by the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest (Patterson and others) for upwards of 50 years down to the time the use of the way was obstructed by the defendant by the erection of a gate thereon in the year 1918. One of the witnesses (a son of Patterson, plaintiff's immediate predecessor in interest) testified that his father had continuously and uninterruptedly for many years, and until he sold the ranch to the plaintiff, used the road in question for the purpose of getting to his own place or ranch, and that no objection was ever made to the use of said road, either by the defendant or any of his predecessors. Another witness testified that, while he was the owner and in the possession of the Carpenter ranch, and before the defendant became the owner thereof, he erected a gate on the roadway, but immediately removed it because Rowe (plaintiff) objected to the maintenance of a gate on the roadway. It is also in evidence that whatever improvements were made on the road were made by the plaintiff. There is testimony, also, to the effect that there was another road leading from the Patterson ranch to a place called Edgewood, and which road connected with the highway, but that said road passed over and through a very hilly country and could be used only by light vehicles carrying no loads of any kind, and that the road in question was the only one leading to the highway from the Patterson ranch over which heavily loaded vehicles could pass. In brief, and in a measure to recapitulate, the testimony clearly shows that the way in controversy has been continuously used for approximately 50 years, except when obstructed by the gate erected on the roadway in 1918 by the defendant, by the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest in the land to which said roadway leads from the highway, and that its use by plaintiff for the purposes of his farming business is absolutely necessary.

[2] It is well settled—indeed, so well settled as to transfer the proposition beyond the realms of controversy—that a private right of way is an interest in the land to which such easement is annexed, and may be acquired by prescription. Patchett et al. v. Pac. Coast Ry. Co., 100 Cal. 505, 509, 35 Pac. 73; Civ. Code, § 1007.

[3] As to the finding upon the question of damages sustained by the wrongful act of defendant in obstructing the highway, as already indicated, it is sufficient to state that the plaintiff testified that, while the gate erected by the defendant was maintained, he was compelled to go to an expense by reason of said obstruction which otherwise would not have accrued to him in getting to his place wood and other articles necessary for his domestic use, etc. It is true that there is no testimony disclosing precisely the actual detriment he suffered as a result of the obstruction of the roadway in question. It is obvious, however, that the main relief sought by this action was to establish in the plaintiff the right to an easement on the lands of the defendant in the form of a right of way over said lands, and that the claim for damages was only incidental and secondary to such relief. The damages awarded (and the testimony shows that the plaintiff did sustain some damage through the act of the defendant in maintaining an obstruction on the roadway) are infinitesimal in amount, particularly so when considered in the light of the proposition that the principal and more important relief sought by the plaintiff was to have his title to the right of way quieted, and are to be regarded, as certainly they are, as mere nominal damages. Therefore the maxim, de minimis non curat lex, applies to this point.

[4] The second point made by the defendant, viz., that the effect of the decree is to divest the defendant of the fee in or title to the lands over which the private way in controversy passes, is not well founded or justified.

The complaint is in two counts, in each of which it is alleged that the private right of way claimed by plaintiff is over the lands of the defendant, and the relief asked is, as seen, that the plaintiff's title to said way be determined and quieted as against any adverse claim thereto by defendant, and that defendant be enjoined from interfering with the plaintiff's right thereto. Neither the findings, nor the conclusions of law, nor the decree, anywhere refer to the fee or the title thereto, but the court merely finds, concludes as a matter of law, and adjudges that the plaintiff "is now and he and his predecessors in interest have been for 50 years immediately last past and prior to the filing of plaintiff's complaint herein, the owners in possession and entitled to the possession of a private right of way as set out and described in paragraph I of these findings," said private right of way being the one described in each count of the complaint as being over and on the lands of the defendant—in other words, over and on lands the title to which is in the defendant. We do not see how the court could have made it any clearer than it is made to appear in its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment that the plaintiff was entitled only to the easement upon defendant's lands, which are with equal clearness described in the complaint as the latter's lands. In short, it is perfectly clear that all the complaint asked and all that the court has decided is that plaintiff is entitled to a private right of way on and over defendant's lands, and it is equally clear that should the plaintiff, or any other person who might succeed to his interest in his land to which the easement in controversy is annexed, ever abandon or surrender said right of way, the defendant would, under the plain terms of the decree, still have and own in the particular portion of his lands the actual use of which is essential to the enjoyment of the right of way the fee free from the burden of said easement.

[5] There is another point made by defendant and that is, in effect, that the findings and the judgment transcend the claims of the complaint, inasmuch as a prescriptive title to a right of way on and over defendant's lands is not pleaded. A conclusive answer to this proposition is to be found in the case of Myers v. Berven, 166 Cal. 484, 137 Pac. 260, wherein Mr. Justice Shaw, at page 490, sveaking of a like contention, says:

> "Appellant insists that the cross-complaint does not allege title by prescription, and hence that it is not in issue. Such particularity of pleading is not required in actions of this character. The allegation is that Berven is the owner of the way described. This is sufficient. Hesser v. Miller, 77 Cal. 193, 19 Pac. 375. This allegation may be sustained by proof of title acquired in any legal mode. A title by prescription is a legal title. Civ. Code, § 1007; Wachumna W. Co. v. Ragle, 148 Cal. 764, 84 Pac. 162."

We have discovered no legal objection to the decision herein by the court below, and the judgment is, for the reasons above given, affirmed.

WELLMAN v. CONROY. (Civ. 2112.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 20, 1921.)

1. Novation 🔑1—Acceptance of rent from assignee of lessee of personalty does not alone prove a novation.

Acceptance by lessor of personal property of rent from assignee of lessee with knowledge of the assignment does not prove a novation or a release of the lessee.

2. Novation 🔑1—Essentials to making assignment of lease of personalty operative as novation.

To make the assignment of a lease of personalty operative as a novation, there must be some evidence of agreement or contract on the part of the lessor to relieve the lessee from any liability.

3. Novation 🔑3—No consideration to support contract to release lessee of personalty.

A conversation between lessor and lessee of personalty, after lessee had assigned lease with consent of lessor, wherein lessor stated that the assignment automatically released the lessee, if considered as a promise to release the lessee from liability for rent, had no consideration to support it.

4. Bailment 🔑31(3)—Evidence sufficient to show lessor of personalty did not release lessee, who assigned the lease.

In an action against lessee of personalty to recover rent, evidence held to warrant a finding that lessor did not agree to release the lessee at the time the latter assigned his lease to third parties.

5. Principal and agent 🔑99—Principal bound by ostensible agent only as to one incurring liability.

A principal is bound by agent under a merely ostensible authority only when a third person has in good faith and without want of ordinary care incurred a liability or parted with value upon the faith thereof, under Civ. Code, § 2334.

6. Bailment 🔑20—Lessee of personalty not released by agreement between creditors of sublessee.

The liability of a lessee of personalty for rent was not affected by an agreement between creditors of an assignee of the lease, whereby the lessor and other creditors agreed not to bring suit, etc.; lessee not being party to such an agreement and his liability being several.

7. Sales 🔑5—Instrument held lease with option to purchase.

Instrument designated lease of personalty held not to constitute a sale of the personal property, but to be a contract of lease with an option on the part of the lessee to purchase.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by J. H. Wellman against M. J. Conroy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Rush, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry K. Norton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought by the assignee of the lessor for the recovery of rent upon an alleged lease of personal property, and judgment was for plaintiff. The written instrument under which defendant took possession and continued for some time in the use of said property was executed December 27, 1913. On September 15, 1914, Conroy assigned all his interest in said contract and in the property to a partnership composed of George H. Forster and Elmer Stoner, who in writing agreed to "assume all liability on the said contract or lease, agreeing to perform all the terms and conditions thereof as agreed to by M. J. Conroy." Thereafter Forster and Stoner entered into possession of the property and continued to use it until April 24, 1915, when it was transferred to certain trustees for the benefit of the creditors of said Forster and Stoner. The contentions of appellant are two: First, that at the time of said assignment to the partnership the lessor released the lessee and accepted Forster and Stoner in his place, thereby creating a novation; and, second, that the so-called lease was really a contract of sale, and that by virtue of an action in the superior court brought to recover the possession of said property, plaintiff exercised an election between two inconsistent remedies and was thereby precluded from urging the claim of or to any rental.

[1-4] It is admitted by plaintiff that his assignor had knowledge of said assignment and recognized Forster and Stoner as succeeding to the interest of Conroy in the lease, but it is claimed that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court that said assignor did not "release the defendant Conroy of and from any of the obligations of said contract." We are satisfied that respondent's position in this respect is entirely sound. It is not contended that any written release of any kind was ever given to Conroy or that his contract was canceled and a new one issued to Forster and Stoner as was usually done when the company intended to release the original lessee. Neither was there any transfer of the ledger account to the assignee, it remaining in the name of Conroy with this notation: "Forster & Stoner, Suc. 11—12—14." It is true that respondent admits that the lessor received certain payments from the assignee. But this circumstance in connection with said knowledge of the assignment does not prove a novation. Many decisions announce this rule of evidence. We may quote from the syllabus of Brosnan v. Kramer, 135 Cal. 36, 66 Pac. 979, as follows:

> "A written contract of lease can only be altered by a written contract or an executed oral agreement. The mere acceptance of rent from a subtenant of the lessee in possession by the lessor, and recognizing him as a tenant, cannot have the effect to alter the contract or release the lessee from his liability for unpaid rent. The lessee cannot by an assignment of the lease rid himself from liability under its covenants. The effect of the assignment is to make the lessee a surety to the lessor for the assignee, who, as between himself and the lessor, is bound as principal, while he remains assignee to pay the rent and perform the covenants."

To make the assignment operative as a novation, there must be, of course, some evidence of an agreement or contract on the part of the lessor to relieve the lessee from any liability. The most significant circumstance upon which appellant relies in this connection is found in the testimony that Conroy asked Simpson—

> "if they would take them, take these two gentlemen, on what I owed them and release me. Mr. Simpson asked them if they were intending to buy and would make a payment. They told him, 'Yes.' Mr. Simpson told us to go right ahead; that he would accept them; that he had looked them up and they was considered good risks. He told us to go right ahead and make our transaction, and when we did to come back he would have the papers ready for us to make the assignment."

But conceding that this promise was sufficiently definite to support appellant's claim, and that adequate consideration existed for it within the rule announced in Jordan v. Scott, 38 Cal. App. 739, 177 Pac. 504, we need go no further than to say that it was positively denied by Simpson that any such conversation took place, and we must assume that Simpson told the truth. Appellant also attaches some importance to the testimony of a conversation between Conroy and one Marshall Cruse, in which the latter told the former that he was "automatically released the very minute we take these other new customers on." But this was simply an announcement of the understanding by Mr. Cruse of the effect of said assignment, and it was not a promise to release Mr. Conroy from liability. Moreover, the conversation was subsequent to said assignment, and, hence there was no consideration to support it. Jordan v. Scott, supra. Aside from the foregoing, the trial court was entirely justified in ignoring any statement or promises made by Cruse, on the ground that he had no authority to bind or to represent the lessor in the release of any claim against said lessee.

The reasons for holding that Cruse lacked such authority are fully pointed out in the brief of respondent, and, as no attempt is made by appellant to meet the argument, we dismiss this point without further consideration.

[5] Nor can it be said that application may be made of the principle of ostensible agency. From the evidence the court was not required to find that the lessor intentionally or by the want of ordinary care caused Conroy to believe that Cruse was authorized to execute a release on behalf of the company. Besides, the principal is bound by the act of an agent under a merely ostensible authority only when the third person has in good faith and without want of ordinary care incurred a liability or parted with value, upon the faith thereof. Section 2334, Civ. Code. The record does not show that Conroy, in the execution of said assignment, was influenced at all by the consideration of any release from the lessor. It is fair to say that said assignment was not made upon the faith of any such act by Cruse. It is true that he naturally wanted to be relieved from any further liability, but it does not appear that without it he would have declined to assign his interest to Forster & Stoner. Indeed, that he did not rely upon any such release, and that in fact no release was made, appears from his statement made after said assignment to Cruse, as follows:

> "I would like to have a release letting me out of this, inasmuch as you have got new parties to look for your payments."

[6] Another point is made that the Collender Company was estopped to urge this suit by reason of the creditors' agreement, to which we have referred. Therein this claim was scheduled and the agreement was signed by Cruse for the company. The creditors agreed to extend the time of payment of their claims until—

> "such time as the same can either be paid by the profits of the business conducted by trustees herein named or by a sale of the business, as provided under said assignment so made by the owners of said Montana Bar."

It may be stated that no sale of the property was had. Said agreement further provided:

> "It is further covenanted and agreed that neither or any of the creditors undersigned shall or will bring suit upon any claims herein scheduled until such time as said trusteeship is discharged or terminated."

Appellant contends that the Collender Company was bound by the terms of said agreement—

> "and while thereby it could, as it subsequently did, elect to repossess itself of the property mentioned in the agreement, it could not, in violation of the terms of said agreement bring this action upon its scheduled claim."

Respondent replies:

> "A complete answer to this is that Conroy's liability was and is several and unimpaired. The company had a right to pursue either or both avenues of recovery. Forster & Stoner were merely additional sureties on the lease."

It is apparent that Conroy's liability was not affected by this creditors' agreement. He was not a party to it, and, manifestly, he parted with nothing of value upon the faith or strength of said agreement. It was, in fact, executed for the benefit of the creditors, and they alone, if any one, could complain of this independent action brought against Conroy. It is doubtful whether said agreement could be enforced by reason of the uncertainty of its terms, but, at any rate, we cannot perceive how it can operate as an estoppel in this action against Conroy.

But it is admitted by appellant in his closing brief that his main point is that the agreements between Collender Company and Conroy constituted a conditional sale and not a lease, and much of the final brief is taken up with a discussion of this consideration.

The character of said instrument may be disclosed by the following provisions:

> "The said party of the first part [the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of California], being the owner of the hereinafter described personal property, has leased and does by these premises, lease and rent unto the party of the second part [M. J. Conroy], the following described personal property * * * for the term of eighteen months and no days from the date hereof, on the following terms and conditions, to wit: $2,500, payable in cash at or before the ensealment of these presents, and the further sum of $400, payable at the office of said company in Los Angeles, to be paid on the 27th day of each and every month ensuing, commencing January 27, 1914, until the full term of seventeen months shall have expired, said payments being for the rental, use and wear of said property.
> "The said party of the second part agrees that he will carefully use and keep in good order the said articles of merchandise hereinbefore described at No. 527 South Main street, Los Angeles, and not elsewhere, except with the written permission of the said party of the first part had and obtained.
> "And it is further agreed by and between the parties hereto, that whenever said party of the second part shall fail to pay said rent, or any part thereof, as it shall become due and payable, or shall fail to keep and perform any of the agreements, conditions or undertakings, in this contract contained, especially as to the place where said property shall be kept, or whenever the said the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of California, shall deem it necessary in order to secure itself against loss, although no breach of contract shall have been committed by said party of the second part, then, and in either of such events, the said the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of California, may demand, take and repossess said property with or without process of law, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.
> "And the party of the second part hereby agrees to pay the rent aforesaid at the several times hereinbefore set forth, and at the expiration of the term for which said merchandise is rented and released, to return and deliver the same to the said the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of California, in good order, reasonable wear and tear thereof excepted; it being specially agreed and understood that the title to all of said property is and shall remain vested in the said party of the first part."

Then follows a covenant that the party of the first part may keep the property insured at the expense of the second party and that the latter shall pay interest on the "rent at installments and shall pay all taxes and assessments against said property," and the concluding clauses are as follows:

> "In the event of said party complying with all the terms of this agreement, the said the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of California shall be required to sell and transfer said property hereinbefore described, to said party of the second part as hereinafter agreed and set forth. * * *
> "In consideration of one dollar and other good and valuable considerations, to us in hand paid, we hereby agree to and with M. J. Conroy, the said party of the second part to the foregoing lease, that in the event that he shall on his part, well and truly perform and fulfill all the conditions thereof, and pay, as they become due, the different installments of rent, and all other sums therein and herein agreed to be paid, that we will on the 27th day of June, 1915, provided that the said M. J. Conroy shall so desire, sell and convey the property described in said lease to the said M. J. Conroy for the sum of eight hundred and $^{95}/_{100}$ dollars, then in cash to be paid us, as hereinbefore set out and agreed upon.
> "It is expressly understood and agreed, however, that time shall be of the essence of this contract, and that unless all the conditions of the foregoing lease shall have been fulfilled by the said M. J. Conroy and the sum of ninety-three hundred dollars paid, as aforesaid, then this agreement of sale shall be null and void and shall not bind either party hereto."

[7] We think the language of the parties compels the conclusion that they intended a contract of lease with an option on the part of Conroy to purchase the property. Indeed, it would be difficult to select language more apt to express such intention. The terms they used are peculiarly appropriate to instruments of hiring and leasing, as said in Harron v. Wilson, 4 Cal. App. 488, 88 Pac. 512. They referred to it as a "lease" and designated the payments as "rent." To negative any possible contention that the instrument constituted a sale, we have but to recall the aforesaid provision in reference to the right of the lessor to recover the possession of said property whenever it was deemed necessary and the express understanding "that the title to all of said property is and shall remain vested in the said party of the first part." Moreover, to clinch the matter, it is sufficient to recall the fact that the lessee did not promise to purchase the property; he did not obligate himself to pay the additional sum required to obtain the title, but, on the other hand, the lessor was "required to sell and transfer" the property to the lessee "provided that the said M. J. Conroy shall so desire." These expressions indicate clearly that the instrument constituted a lease, with the option on the part of the lessee to purchase by the fulfillment of all the covenants of the lease and the payment of the additional sum therein specified. Applying the fundamental principles of interpretation to the instrument, we are satisfied respondent is right in his contention. If the evidence showed clearly that the parties by their subsequent conduct had treated the instrument as constituting a sale we might follow their interpretation. But such is not the condition of the record, and without making a contract for the parties we cannot say that they intended otherwise than the plain import of their language indicates. Since, therefore, the conditions of the lease were not observed by the lessee and no attempt was ever made to exercise said option to purchase, no inconsistency existed between the action to recover the possession of the property and the other suit against Conroy for the unpaid rent.

Some decisions are cited by both parties in support of their views as to the interpretation of this instrument, but it could hardly be said that any of them is controlling herein. The principles they enunciate must, indeed, be recognized and applied, but there is some difference in the facts, which cannot be ignored.

Respondent confidently relies upon said Harron Case, supra, and Harron v. Cutting, 19 Cal. App. 780, 127 Pac. 827. The instruments in those two cases were identical and quite similar to the one before us, and it was held that each instrument constituted a lease and not a contract of sale. To the contrary appellant cites Wiley B. Allen Co. v. Wood, 32 Cal. App. 76, 162 Pac. 121; Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 56 Pac. 339; Lundy Furniture Co. v. White, 128 Cal. 170, 60 Pac. 759, 79 Am. St. Rep. 41; Perkins v. Mettler, 126 Cal. 100, 58 Pac. 384; Muncy v. Brain, 158 Cal. 300, 110 Pac. 945; Bradley v. McDonald, 36 Cal. App. 807, 169 Pac. 427.

In the Wood Case it was not controverted that there was a sale of the piano, the whole dispute being as to the payment of the sum of $300 on said property.

The question in the Van Allen Case was whether the contract was an absolute or a conditional sale of the property. That it was one or the other could hardly be doubted in view of this covenant on the part of the vendors: "Van Allen and Boughton hereby agree to sell at the sum of seventeen hundred and fifty dollars to William M. Langton" the property described—and this promise on the part of the vendee:

> "William M. Langton hereby agrees to buy said press as above specified, and to pay therefor on receipt of press cash three hundred and fifty dollars, and the balance in payments evidenced by seven notes bearing legal interest, 7 per cent. as follows."

In Perkins v. Mettler, supra, the instrument designated the parties as vendor and vendees, and provided, "The vendor agrees to sell to the vendees, and they agree to buy from him," etc., and the only question was whether it constituted an absolute or conditional sale.

In Muncy v. Brain the contract was quite similar to the one herein, but the court said:

> "The question whether or not the transaction was, in legal effect, a lease or a conditional sale, is not necessarily involved in the determination of this appeal, and therefore we need not consider it."

It is true that in the Bradley Case, supra, this court spoke of a similar contract as follows: "This contract in effect provides for a conditional sale," etc. But it is admitted by appellant that this was dictum, the court stating that the question to be determined was whether the finding of payment was supported by the evidence.

It is apparent that these cases cited by appellant furnish no guide for the determination of this cause.

McCollough v. Home Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 659, 102 Pac. 814, 18 Ann. Cas. 862, cited in the opening brief, comes nearer supporting appellant's contention; but the court was justly anxious to support the claim of plaintiff, who had acted in good faith in having his home insured and who had made nearly all the payments as provided by the instrument, which the court held to constitute a conditional sale. It is to be observed, also, that the Supreme Court held that the vendee had in effect promised to purchase and pay for the premises. This, in connection with the covenant of the vendor to convey, would, of course, make the instrument a contract for the sale and purchase of the property.

After an examination of the entire record, we cannot say that the decision of the trial court was inequitable or in contravention of any principle of law.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Sales ⚷32—Facts held not to show a completed contract.

Where plaintiff had a road building contract with the state, requiring the state to furnish sand and gravel, and defendant proposed to plaintiff that it secure a modification whereby the sand and gravel could be obtained from defendant's quarry, and the contract was modified to permit plaintiff to so obtain such materials, but to provide that if they did not come up to the specifications or were not promptly furnished the state might revert to the original contract, defendant was under no contract to furnish the materials, though in correspondence with plaintiff and the state it had stated that it would guarantee to furnish such material if the state placed orders for all the sand and gravel required.

Action by the Marin Rock Company against E. B. and A. L. Stone Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for appellant.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant after an order granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit as to the first count in the plaintiff's complaint.

The action was one sounding in damages for the alleged breach of certain contracts alleged to have been entered into between the parties, and having relation to the supplying by defendant to the plaintiff of certain road-building material for the construction of certain sections of the state highway in the county of Santa Clara, contracts for which had been entered into between the plaintiff and the department of engineering of the state of California.

The facts upon which the plaintiff relied for a recovery under the first count in his complaint may be briefly stated as follows: On July 27, 1915, a written contract was entered into between the said department of engineering of the state of California and the plaintiff herein for the construction by the latter of a portion of the state highway in Santa Clara county between Los Gatos and San Jose. Under the terms of this contract the state, through its said engineering department, agreed to furnish all sand and gravel needed for the work f. o. b. on cars at railway points nearest the section of highway to be constructed. The plaintiff was to unload said material from said cars and haul it to the point of use at its own expense. The defendant was at the time operating a gravel quarry near the town of Campbell, not far from the line of the highway which the plaintiff was to construct; and, learning that plaintiff had been awarded said contract, proposed to plaintiff that it should secure a modification of its contract with the state, whereby the necessary sand and gravel for the construction of said section of highway could be obtained from the defendant's quarry at Campbell. The advantage to be gained by the plaintiff from such modification of its contract with the state was such as would result from the elimination of the expense to it of the unloading of freight cars; and the advantage to be derived by the state would be that it would be relieved from the payment of the freight charges of shipping the material by railroad to the points nearest its place of use. The defendant suggested that the state would probably agree to turn over to the plaintiff such sums as it would otherwise be obliged to pay for such freight charges. The plaintiff was apparently agreeable to the plan as outlined by the defendant, and thereupon took the matter up with the state officials by letter, stating that it was willing to have its contract changed so as to provide for the delivery of said material at the defendant's bunkers at Campbell if the state would allow the plaintiff, in addition to its contract price, the amount of the freight charges which the state would otherwise have to pay. The state officials consented to this modification, and thereupon a supplemental contract was entered into between the state and the plaintiff on August 31, 1915. This contract, after reciting the fact of the existence of the earlier agreement between the parties, set forth in full the letter from the plaintiff to the state highway commission, embodying the suggested modifications thereof, and then proceeded with the agreement that the original contract should be modified in accordance with the plaintiff's proposal. It then contained the following clause:

"However, it is mutually agreed that in the event the above sand and gravel does not come up to the specifications of said contract No. 146, or if said materials are not promptly furnished or delivered, or if said parties of the second part abandon or default in the performance of said contract No. 146, that the party of the first part [the state] may declare this supplemental agreement null and void, and revert to the terms of the original contract No. 146."

This supplemental agreement having been executed, the defendant herein proceeded to furnish sand and gravel at its Campbell bunkers, and the plaintiff proceeded to haul the same to the state highway where the work was being done. This continued for but a short time when, by reason of breakdowns at the defendant's Campbell plant, and also by reason of the fact that the gravel furnished by it was below the standard required by the contract between the plaintiff and the state, its engineering department refused to accept further deliveries from the defendant, and proceeded to furnish material to the plaintiff from the sources and by means of the railway cars as provided in the original contract. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant, and in the first count of its complaint alleged that it had been damaged by the defendant's failure to carry out the terms of its suggestion and proposal to the plaintiff which had led to the modification of the latter's contract with the state. The items of damage which the plaintiff specified under this count in its complaint were those arising from the excess of cost to it of unloading the material from the railroad cars and hauling it to the place of its use, over the cost to which it would have been put if the material had been obtained at the Campbell bunkers, and also the loss to it of a sum equal to that which would have been paid as freight by the state had its contract with the stae not been modified, and which under its modified contract the plaintiff would have been entitled to receive.

The defendant in its answer resisted these claims through the averment that no contractual relation existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that no such relation existed between the defendant and the state as would have required the latter to purchase material for the road construction in question from the defendant, and hence that there was no basis upon which the plaintiff's claim of damages could be predicated.

Upon the trial of the cause the foregoing facts appeared; and it further appeared that there was some correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant, and also between the plaintiff and the officials of the state highway commission, the purport of which was that the defendant was desirous of procuring from the state orders for the supply of all sand and gravel required in the construction of said section of the highway; and in case it procured such orders was willing to guarantee to the plaintiff that it would furnish the required sand and gravel from its Campbell quarries; or, if these from any cause should fail, from its gravel pits at Coyote. The plaintiff appears to have relied largely upon the defendant's so-called guaranties in this correspondence for its recovery. At the close of the plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was made by the defendants upon the ground that no such contractual relations existed between the parties as could give rise to the plaintiff's claim of a guaranty and of its breach, and hence that no liability on the part of the defendant had been shown. The court granted the said motion for a nonsuit, and from the judgment thereupon entered in the defendant's favor the plaintiff has prosecuted this appeal.

We are satisfied from an examination of the record that the trial court committed no error in granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit. Whatever contracts there were in relation to the supplying by the defendant of material for the construction of the section of the highway in question were those existing between the plaintiff and the state, by the terms of which the latter, if it saw fit to do so, might order such building material from the defendant herein. Such orders, however, were entirely dependent upon whether or not the state officials were satisfied with the quality of the defendant's said material and with its delivery of the same. There was no agreement between the plaintiff and the state, or between the defendant and the state, by which the state was bound to order, or the plaintiff bound to receive, any such material from the defendant other than that which the state saw fit to order; nor was there any existing agreement between the parties by the terms of which the defendant had agreed to guarantee anything. Upon this subject there had apparently been no meeting of minds between the plaintiff and the defendant and the state, since by the very terms of the defendant's correspondence it at best only offered to guarantee that it would furnish such material provided the state placed its orders for all of the sand and gravel required in the construction of said section of the state highway. The state, however, on its part entered into no such arrangement with the defendant as would require it to continue giving orders to the defendant for such material after its first supply thereof had proven unsatisfactory. It was for these reasons that the trial court held—and we think held correctly—that there was no such arrangement between the parties to this action as could form the basis of the claim of damages which the plaintiff asserted in the first count of its complaint. The order for nonsuit was therefore properly granted, and the judgment based thereon should therefore be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1920.)

1. Sales ⚷32—Correspondence held to create contract to furnish materials needed in building road.

Correspondence between defendant and plaintiff, who had a contract with the county for construction of a road, held to constitute a contract by defendant to furnish all of the rock and sand needed for the work.

2. Sales ⚷172—Buyer held not to have broken contract by obtaining materials from third persons because of seller's delay.

Where defendant contracted to furnish plaintiff all the rock and sand needed in the construction of a highway, and, after repeated attempts to obtain delivery without delay, and after the county officials had threatened to take over the work, plaintiff ordered materials from third persons, whereupon defendant refused to make further deliveries, the contract was broken by defendant, and not by plaintiff.

3. Sales ⚷418(3)—Measure of damages for seller's refusal to deliver stated.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354, the measure of damages for breach of a contract to furnish all the rock and sand needed in the construction of a highway was the excess of the cost of the material in the nearest market over the contract price.

4. Sales ⚷417—Evidence held to support recovery for excess of price paid by buyer over contract price on seller's breach.

In an action for breach of a contract to furnish all the rock and sand needed in the construction of a highway, evidence that before placing its order plaintiff consulted firms engaged in supplying such materials, and was quoted the price it was required to pay, supported a recovery for the excess above the contract price.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Marin Rock Company against E. B. and A. L. Stone Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant corporation from a judgment awarding plaintiff the sum of $598.35 as damages for breach of contract.

From the pleadings it appears that plaintiff entered into a contract with the county of Santa Clara for the construction of a county highway between the towns of Sunnyvale and Cupertino in said county. It is alleged in the complaint that defendant thereafter agreed with plaintiff to sell and deliver to it for a stipulated price all the crushed rock and sand required by plaintiff to perform its contract with the county; that defendant delivered to plaintiff a portion of such rock and sand, but failed and neglected, notwithstanding the demand of plaintiff, to furnish 1,945 tons thereof necessary to the completion of the work; that the plaintiff on account of such default was compelled to and did purchase said amount of rock and sand elsewhere, and paid therefor the sum of $499.31 in excess of the price at which defendant had agreed to sell and deliver the same to plaintiff; that because of said default of defendant plaintiff was damaged in the sum named, with interest thereon. By its answer defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and, further answering, set up a separate defense, the substance of which is that it merely gave plaintiff a quotation of prices for the material to be furnished from one of its plants known as the Campbell plant, and that under this offer of quoted prices plaintiff purchased from defendant a large number of cars of sand and gravel. It further alleged that because of an objection made by a deputy county inspector to the Campbell material, defendant substituted a more expensive kind from another of its plants, known as the Coyote plant, at no greater cost to plaintiff, and at a great loss to defendant, and that when plaintiff began to construct another section of the highway which called for the Coyote grade of rock, plaintiff, without notice to or demand on defendant, purchased 17 cars of material from a competitor, in consequence of which defendant refused to further deal with plaintiff, whereupon plaintiff purchased 22 additional cars of material elsewhere. The number of tons referred to in the complaint consisted of these two trainload lots.

The trial court, Hon. John Hunt presiding, found that the parties had entered into the contract as alleged by plaintiffs, and that defendant refused to deliver the 1,945 tons of material, notwithstanding plaintiff's demand, and rendered judgment in the sum above named.

Appellant relies for a reversal upon two grounds: First, that there was no contract between the parties; second, that even if a contract existed, plaintiff was the one who breached it, and therefore defendant was relieved of liability thereon.

[1] There is no merit in either contention. The record discloses that at about the time plaintiff received the contract from the county it applied to the defendant for quotations on rock and sand, and that thereupon oral negotiations and written communications were had between the parties, which culminated in a contract in part oral and in part written. The written correspondence is somewhat voluminous, and a full recital thereof would unduly lengthen this decision. In substance, this correspondence confirms certain oral negotiations, and reveals the fact that plaintiff ordered from defendant all the rock and gravel necessary for the work. The first writing had between the parties was a letter from defendant to plaintiff which contained assurances that defendant's rock was first class in character. Then follow a series of letters dealing with prices, shipments, and other details covering the manner and time of payment, the mode and place of measuring the rock, the appointment of an umpire in the event of a dispute, and the payment of freight charges, all of which conclusively show that the parties intended to and did enter into a contract for all the rock and sand necessary to complete plaintiff's contract with the county. One of these letters, written by defendant's sales manager, evidences that a conference was had between the representatives of the parties in relation to the contract, and it concludes with the following language:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "We wish to thank you for the order which you requested us to enter to-day for the material you will require for this work."

Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with certain paragraphs contained in this letter, wrote to defendant for an explanation thereof, and in reply thereto defendant answered with what it denominated a substitute letter, which contained a confirmation of certain conversations relative to all the points and details covering prices, shipments, and other matters heretofore mentioned. Defendant concludes this letter as follows:

> "If there is anything stated * * * not in accordance with our understanding * * * kindly advise us."

No further suggestions being made by plaintiff, defendant thereafter commenced to and did supply all the rock and sand that entered into the construction of the highway according to the terms of the agreement had between the parties except the last 1,945 tons used, the excess cost of which forms the basis of this action.

In addition to these facts and circumstances the oral evidence in the case with reference to the breach of the contract confirms and supports the conclusion of the trial court that a contract existed for the entire work.

[2] In urging its second ground for reversal, appellant assumes the existence of such a contract, but attempts to justify its breach upon the ground that plaintiff went into the open market and purchased material without first giving defendant an opportunity to supply it. The evidence upon this subject, while conflicting, fully supports the finding that defendant committed the breach. It appears therefrom that plaintiff made every effort to get the material from defendant. Its engineer in charge of the work testified that the county officials were complaining of the slow progress being made with the work, and that he spoke to defendant's superintendent daily concerning the matter, and that he made numerous trips to defendant's plant to endeavor to have it make deliveries faster, and had even supplied a man at plaintiff's expense to visit defendant's plant for such purpose, but without avail. It is also in evidence that plaintiff had advised defendant by letter of the delays, and had requested permission to order from other parties. The situation not having been remedied, a county supervisor and the engineer of the work made a final threat to take the work over, whereupon plaintiff ordered 17 carloads of material from Niles, in consequence of which A. L. Stone, vice president of defendant corporation, refused to make further deliveries.

We do not deem further discussion of the evidence necessary. It is sufficient to say that upon both of the questions here presented there was abundant testimony to sustain the finding of the existence of the contract, and also the further finding that plaintiff gave defendant every opportunity to supply the material before purchasing elsewhere.

[3, 4] Further complaint is made as to the amount of damages allowed. The measure of damage was the excess of the cost of the material in the nearest market over the contract price. Fairchild, etc., Co. v. Southern, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 264, 110 Pac. 951; sections 3308, 3354, Civ. Code. It is in evidence that before placing the order plaintiff consulted firms engaged in supplying the material involved, and was quoted the excess amount plaintiff was required to pay. There is therefore no merit in this objection.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

WENDT et al. v. SMITH. (Civ. 3481.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 1, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 27, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑331(2) — Ousted tenant cannot recover both share of crops and value of services.

A tenant under a lease giving him a share of the crops, who was ousted by his landlord before the crops were harvested, cannot recover as damages both the value of his share of the crops less the cost of producing them, and the value of the services he performed before he was ousted.

2. Trial 🔑311—Cost of producing crop must be proved, though jury were farmers.

In an action for damages for ouster of a tenant entitled to a share of the crop, where the measure of damages was the value of such share less the cost of producing the crop, the tenant cannot recover without proving the cost of producing the crops, even though the majority of the jurymen were farmers familiar with such work, since their experience could not enable them to judge the amount of labor necessary to produce that particular crop, nor was their experience a matter of record.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑331(2) — Amount earned by tenants after ouster not set off against share of crops.

A landlord who ousted his tenants is not entitled to have credited, against their recovery for the value of their share of the crop less the cost of producing it, the amount earned by the tenants after their ouster.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by H. H. Wendt and others against W. R. Smith. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellant.

Henry G. Bodkin and Jos. P. Sproul, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for $3,990 upon a verdict of a jury. The action was brought for damages for the breach of a contract for a lease of land. The contract provided for the leasing to plaintiffs for one year of 220 acres of land in the county of Imperial. Plaintiffs agreed to pay, as rent therefor, an undivided one-half of all crops raised on the premises; it being understood that cotton, corn, and alfalfa should be planted. The defendant agreed to furnish all seed, stock, tools, implements, wagons, water, and materials necessary for the planting, maintaining, and harvesting of all crops; also to furnish all feed for stock used on the premises out of his half of the alfalfa produced. The plaintiffs agreed to furnish all labor necessary to the planting, irrigating, and harvesting of all crops and the labor necessary to maintain all ditches, borders, gates, checks, and fences on the premises, and to farm the land in proper manner. The defendant agreed to furnish any new material necessary for the maintenance of the ditches, fences, etc. It was also provided that the defendant had the right at all times to enter and view the premises and the improvements thereon and, in the event the lessees failed to properly care for the crops, the lessor should have the right to take charge of the farming operations himself and care for the crops and deduct the expense thereby incurred out of the share of the crops belonging to the plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs alleged that they went into possession of the property during the month of December, 1917, under this lease and performed all the covenants and agreements by them to be performed, and that on and after March 19, 1918, the defendant refused to allow them to work upon the premises and compelled them to leave the premises, threatening their lives if they remained. They then asked as damages the value of one-half of the crops grown on the premises during the year, which they alleged amounted to $8,000; and also that they be awarded the value of their labor performed during the four months of their occupancy of the premises, which consisted of plowing, irrigating, maintaining borders, gates, checks, fences, etc. This labor was alleged to be worth $500, making a total of $8,500 damages prayed for.

Defendant denied that he refused to permit plaintiffs to proceed with their work on the premises or that he ordered them to quit the same or threatened their lives, and alleged that by reason of the incompetence of plaintiffs and their inexperience in farming they were unable to carry out the terms of the contract; that by reason of the unskillful handling they endangered the alfalfa crop on the land and defendant was obliged to enter upon the premises and assist plaintiffs in saving said crop from being flooded while plaintiffs were irrigating the land; that upon his protest and remonstrance with reference to this incident plaintiffs voluntarily abandoned the premises. Defendant also denied that plaintiffs had suffered any damage. The case was tried before a jury, resulting in a verdict for plaintiffs.

Appellant objects to the instructions of the court with reference to the question of damages, and also contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove any damage whatsoever and that the verdict of the jury is therefore entirely unsupported by the evidence.

[1] The court instructed the jury that, if the respondents were entitled to recover, the measure of damage should be one-half of the value of the crops which they could have grown upon the ranch during the year, less the cost of raising, cutting, and harvesting the same. In addition to this the jury was instructed that, if the respondents were entitled to damages, they were also entitled to judgment for the value of the labor of plowing, irrigating, maintaining gates, etc., performed by them upon the land in connection with the farming of the same during the period of their occupancy. Obviously this was error. By the terms of the lease respondents were entitled to one-half of the crops, and in return therefor were to furnish all the labor necessary to produce and harvest them. They cannot recover as damages for a breach of the contract both the value of the crops which they were to receive and also the value of the labor which they were to give in payment therefor.

The jury acted upon these instructions, and its verdict was for $3,490 in damages and $500 for labor. Respondents meet this objection to the instruction by a suggestion that, in the event this court should determine that judgment for both these items is improper, a modification of the judgment be ordered to the extent of the $500 allowed for labor. This would be a proper course if the verdict was otherwise proper. But the appellant's objection as to the insufficiency of the evidence is well taken. The record before us is lacking in evidence upon important facts which should properly enter into an estimate of damages in an action of this nature.

[2] It is claimed by appellant and tacitly admitted by respondents that there is no evidence of the probable cost of raising and harvesting the crops upon the land. Respondents seek to overcome this defect in the evidence by the argument that the jury was composed of ranchers from the vicinity who were probably aware of the cost of producing these products. But vital evidence may not be supplied in this irregular and uncertain manner. The only testimony on this subject is the indefinite statement of the appellant that he did not know the amount of expense incurred by those who completed the respondents' work in raising and harvesting the crop of 1918, but he knew there was some expense incurred in connection therewith. Evidence upon this subject should have been before the jury, as, under the lease, respondents were entitled to one-half the crops less the labor expended. The case is not controlled by Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 Pac. 625. There the jury was permitted to determine from its own knowledge the value of services rendered by a day laborer. But evidence had been offered showing the character of the services rendered and the time of performance. The reasonable value of the services was fixed upon the basis of the usual and customary wage paid for like services. Whatever may be said as to the soundness of the rule of that case, it does not apply here. Respondents were to be charged with the cost of raising and harvesting three different kinds of crops—alfalfa, corn, and cotton. In addition to this, they were to be charged with the cost of maintaining ditches, fences, borders, etc., and to do all necessary irrigating. No evidence was offered touching upon any of these subjects. Furthermore, it is not sufficient for counsel to say that all the jurors were farmers of experience and hence had independent knowledge of these costs. Their experience does not appear of record.

[3] Appellant further contends that he should have been given credit for any amount which the respondents earned at other work from the time of the breach until the expiration of the life of the contract. This contention is not well founded. Under the instructions of the trial court and the holding of this court, respondents will be charged with the full and complete cost of doing everything they undertook to do under their contract. This will include the work done by them and the allowance to appellant for the work that was necessary to be done from the time of the breach. The lease did not require that respondents should personally labor upon the land. It was not, therefore, a contract for personal services. This being true, appellant would have no further claim upon their time or services, and their earnings, if any, would not be involved in a consideration of the damages resulting to them from a breach of his contract.

The measure of damage in the present case is the simple and usual one in cases of a breach of contract of this nature. It is one-half of the proceeds of the crops which the respondents would have received out of the contract, less the amount they would necessarily have expended under the contract to produce and harvest all the crops.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1) — Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Finding based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Attorney and client ⚷81—No implied authority to employ detective.

An attorney of record, merely by virtue of his employment and in absence of express authority so to do, has no power to bind his client upon a contract for employment of a detective, and, even if the attorney did have such implied power, the engagement could not extend beyond what would be a reasonable compensation for the employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by E. P. Davis against Carrie Kunz Mackay. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. P. Nevitt, of Phœnix, Ariz., and Geo. L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, as assignee of Bert H. Franklin, sued to recover a sum of money alleged to be due from defendant for services rendered as a detective.

Judgment went for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

As appears from the findings, the action was based upon a written contract dated November 1, 1918, executed between Bert H. Franklin of the first part and the persons whose names are signed thereto as parties of the second part, who at the time were attorneys for defendant in an action then pending in the superior court of Maricopa county, Ariz., wherein defendant was the proponent for probate of the will of her deceased husband and as to which will a contest had been entered by a brother of deceased. The contract is as follows:

"This agreement made and entered into this 1st day of November, 1918, by and between Bert H. Franklin, of Los Angeles, Cal., party of the first part, and Joseph P. Lacey and Townsend, Stockton & Drake, attorneys for Carrie Kunz Mackay, of Phœnix, Ariz., parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas Carrie Kunz Mackay has filed for probate an instrument alleged to be the last will of her husband, Angus R. Mackay, and

"Whereas a contest has been filed by one Edward Mackay alleging himself to be a brother of Angus R. Mackay, deceased, and

"Whereas Carrie Kunz Mackay and Joseph P. Lacey and Townsend, Stockton & Drake of her counsel, deemed it wise to secure the services of party of the first part in preparation of proponent's case and in preparation for the trial of the issues raised by the contest, and

"Whereas party of the first part has rendered valuable services to Carrie Kunz Mackay and has been continuously devoting his entire time and attention to the aforesaid work since October 11, 1918, and has employed certain assistants who have rendered valuable service, same having been done with the consent and approval of parties of the second part;

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises recited and such services as party of the first part may render to Carrie Kunz Mackay, it is agreed that party of the first part shall receive as full compensation for his services aforesaid the sum of fifteen dollars each day and his expenses and the expenses and salary of his assistants employed with the knowledge, consent and approval of the aforenamed counsel for party of the second part, and if the instrument filed and sought to be probated, is admitted to probate, said party of the first part shall receive for his services and the services of his assistants, the additional sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) and one hundred dollars ($100.00) per day for each day he works with the knowledge and consent of the aforenamed attorneys for Carrie Kunz Mackay. It is agreed that the fifteen dollars per day and expenses and the salary and expenses of the said assistants of party of the first part shall be paid when and as rendered and incurred in cash. The balance of compensation, if said instrument is admitted to probate, shall be paid only when the administration of the estate is in condition to make possible a sufficient distribution so to do. In event of settlement $2,500.00 and $100.00 per day in addition to the fifteen dollars per day and expenses and the salary and expenses of assistants shall be paid.

"It is agreed that the total sum due party of the first part for his fifteen dollars per day and his expenses and for the salary of his assistants and their expenses to and including this date is $1,157.87 and party of the first part hereby acknowledges receipt of the sum of $650.00 on account thereof. Bert H. Franklin, Party of the First Part. Joseph P. Lacey, Party of the Second Part. Townsend, Stockton & Drake, by Fred Blair Townsend, by A. Henderson Stockton, by Earl F. Drake, Parties of the Second Part."

In addition to the findings that the contest of said will was settled, that Franklin, between October 11, 1918, and November 1st following, satisfactory to said attorneys, performed 21 days' service in which he laid out for expenses and his salary and that of assistants, $842.87, and that no part of the amount set forth in said agreement, other than $650, had been paid, not by defendant, however, but by Joseph P. Lacey, one of her attorneys, it was further found:

"That the defendant never authorized her attorneys to enter into the aforesaid agreement with the said Bert H. Franklin." "That the defendant never ratified said agreement after it was so entered into by her said attorneys after she had knowledge of the same." "That said Bert H. Franklin did not work in the service of said defendant excepting by and under the authority and direction of her attorneys." "* * * That the services so rendered by said Bert H. Franklin was not rendered at the special instance or request of the defendant. That the said Bert H. Franklin was not employed by the defendant to investigate and secure evidence for said defendant in the preparation of said defendant's case, or for the trial of the issues raised by the contest of a certain will offered for probate and alleged to be the last will of her husband, Angus R. Mackay, deceased, pending in the superior court of the county of Maricopa, state of Arizona, but was only employed as aforesaid by her attorneys of record as more fully appears from said contract heretofore set out." "That the defendant did not promise to pay the said Bert H. Franklin if a settlemement was made of said contest, the sum of $2,500.00 and $115.00 per day, or any other sum, for each day he worked thereon, or for any other time, or at all, either with the knowledge and consent of the attorneys of said defendant, or otherwise, nor did the defendant promise to pay his expenses and the salary and expenses of his assistants."

And as a conclusion of law the court found that plaintiff was not entitled to recover judgment against the defendant, and not entitled to have anything by reason of his complaint.

The contention of appellant is: First, that the findings made by the court in favor of defendant are not supported by the evidence; second, that the contract was made and entered into by her attorneys of record and that in so doing, and conceding an absence of express authority, they were acting within the scope of their powers as agents of and for and in behalf of defendant in making the contract with Franklin as a detective—both of which contentions are controverted by respondent, who, as a further defense, insists that the contract must be deemed void as against public policy.

[1, 2] The most that can be said as to the first contention, based upon the asserted insufficiency of evidence to support the findings made adversely to plaintiff, is that the testimony touching the question was conflicting. While that of Mr. Stockton, one of defendant's attorneys, called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, was to the effect that when Mr. Lacey suggested to defendant that it was necessary to employ Franklin as a detective to assist in securing evidence and preparing the case, she replied, in substance, "Do whatever is necessary," the testimony of defendant is equally strong as tending to prove that she never employed nor authorized her attorneys to employ Franklin or any other detective, and never at any time said anything to them which could be construed as authorizing them as her agents to execute such contract for her and on her behalf. Moreover, the character of the contract under which the attorneys rendered the service is inconsistent with any express authorization given.

The chief contention of appellant is that defendant's attorneys, in the absence of express authority to make the contract, acted within the scope of their powers in the making of the same. In support of this contention appellant relies largely on the case of Kast v. Miller & Lux, 159 Cal. 724, 115 Pac. 932. In that case it appears that certain persons were being prosecuted for the alleged larceny of stock belonging to Miller & Lux, which corporation retained Judge Ostrander to assist the district attorney in the prosecution of the charges. As attorney, he employed a detective to gather evidence in behalf of the prosecution, and in an action brought by the detective to recover for services rendered he had judgment, which on appeal was affirmed, not, however, upon the ground of Ostrander's implied authority, but for the reason that the evidence adduced at the trial disclosed that he was in express terms authorized to employ the detective. Not only was it made to appear that the business agent of the corporation was present when Judge Ostrander engaged the detective, but he thereafter made payments of money to him for the services rendered. It thus appears that, since the decision in that case was not based upon the fact, as claimed, that an attorney, by virtue of his employment as such and in the absence of express authority, may employ a detective and make a contract with him for the payment of a specific sum of money, and thus bind his client therefor, it furnishes no support for appellant's contention. In Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Clarke, 106 Fed. 794, 45 C. C. A. 635, the court says:

> "It is elementary law that an attorney in a particular case has no general authority, by virtue of his retainer, to employ other counsel, either by way of substitution or as assistant or associate counsel, at the expense of his client."

To the same effect are Lathrop v. Hallett, 20 Colo. App. 207, 77 Pac. 1095; Young v. Crawford, 23 Mo. App. 432; Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 Pac. 899.

If an attorney of record has no implied authority to employ an associate counsel at the expense of his client in the litigation in which he is engaged, it must, we think, follow that he is equally without such implied authority to employ a detective at the expense of his client to assist him in securing evidence and preparing his case for trial.

In this case the services of the detective covered a period of some 21 days, for which, under the contract, if plaintiff is liable, he is entitled to recover from her $5,107, in addition to the $650 theretofore paid him by defendant's attorney, Joseph P. Lacey. Clearly the act of the attorneys in making the contract for the payment of such a large sum of money by their client cannot be deemed within the well-recognized rule that an attorney, by virtue of his retainer, may in behalf of his client incur the usual and necessary expense for the orderly conduct of the litigation. Such contracts for the employment of detectives are not only unusual, but as a rule wholly unnecessary.

We have no hesitancy in saying that, in our opinion, an attorney of record, merely by virtue of his employment and in the absence of express authority so to do, has no power to bind his client upon a contract for the employment of a detective such as here involved. Even were it conceded that the employment of a detective was within the scope of such implied power of an attorney, the engagement should not extend beyond what would be reasonable compensation for the employment. People v. Board of Supervisors, 35 App. Div. 239, 54 N. Y. Supp. 782.

ALCIATTI et al. v. ORIGLIA. (Civ. 3540.)

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑84—Contract for sale of personalty void because not in writing.

A contract for the sale of wine of value in excess of $200 was void under Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 1739, where it was not in writing and there was no note or memorandum in writing subscribed by the seller or agent; purchasers never having received or accepted any part of the wine and having paid no part of the purchase price.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑95(1)—Acceptance of money by agent held not part payment under statute.

Acceptance of a check by an agent for sale of wine was not the payment of part of the purchase price of the wine under Civ. Code, §§ 1624 and 1739, where such agent was not authorized to do anything more than find a purchaser for the wine at a certain price on terms to be determined by the seller, and the seller returned the check to the purchaser.

3. Brokers 🔑51—Minds of seller and buyer must be brought together.

Where broker was to sell wine at a certain price on terms acceptable to principal, his right to a commission did not accrue until the minds of the principal and intending buyers were brought together on the terms on which the sale was to be made.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Brokers 🔑86(1) — Evidence held insufficient to show broker's right to commission.

In an action by assignee of a broker to recover commission for obtaining purchasers for wine, evidence held insufficient to sustain a conclusion that any right of the broker to a commission under the terms of the contract had accrued, notwithstanding an acknowledgment by the owner of the wine that the broker had earned it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Secondo Alciatti and others, copartners, doing business under firm name and style of the New Piemonte Wine Company, against Antonia Origlia. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals. Reversed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

William H. Johnson, of San Jose, for appellant.

Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover for the alleged breach of a contract to sell a quantity of wine, and for the commission claimed to be due for the sale of the same. They recovered a general judgment based upon both counts, and the defendant appeals.

The defendant, a wine grower, signed and delivered to U. Grossini a paper reading as follows:

"Morgan Hill, Cal., Dec. 2, 1918.

"I have this day agree to allow U. Grossini, wine broker, to sell my wine of about 35,000 gallons of red wine, for the price of 50 cents per gallon f. o. b. station Morgan Hill, Cal., this option to run 10 day from date; also white wine of about 4,000 gallons, 2½c commission.

"[Signed] Antonia Origlia."

At the same time she gave Grossini samples of the wine, which he submitted to several parties, including the plaintiffs. The samples were satisfactory, and the plaintiffs prepared a form of contract, in duplicate, for the defendant to sign, which they gave to Grossini together with a check for $1,000, payable to Mrs. Origlia, as a deposit on the purchase price. The agreement, as prepared by the plaintiffs, specified that the defendant agreed to and did sell to plaintiffs 32,000 to 33,000 gallons of red wine, and 3,800 gallons of white wine, as per "samples furnished by A. Grossini, broker, and the price is fixed at 50c a gallon f. o. b. Morgan Hill, Cal." the plaintiffs agreeing "to pay for the wine bought, as soon as same is delivered," deducting from the total the deposit of $1,000, and to accomplish the withdrawal of the wine from the defendant's winery not later than the middle of March next succeeding.

Grossini did not enter into any contract on the part of his principal, or in her name. He told the plaintiffs that it was "necessary to get her signature," and sent the proposed agreement and check for the deposit to the defendant by mail, with a letter in which he stated that he hoped that it "will be satisfactory." She returned them to him four or five days later, with a letter in which she stated that, while she was willing to sell at the price stated, it was not convenient for her to keep the wine until March and insure it until that time; that she needed money and desired the purchaser to pay for the wine at once. She accordingly refused to execute the contract. A representative of the plaintiffs and Grossini visited the defendant, and attempted to come to some agreement with her for the purchase of the wine upon terms which would be satisfactory. The defendant demanded cash in advance upon making the sale, and refused to sell upon any other terms. The plaintiffs, after demanding that the defendant fulfill an alleged sale to them, took an assignment from Grossini of his claim for commissions for making the sale, and brought this action with the result already noted.

[1, 2] In support of their claim for damages for breach of the alleged contract of sale, the plaintiffs, who are the respondents here, take the position that a sale was actually made by Mrs. Origlia to them, and that it was accomplished by and through Grossini. In both of these contentions the respondents are mistaken. The value of the wine was many times in excess of $200, and no agreement for the sale, or any note or memorandum thereof, was in writing, or subscribed by Mrs. Origlia, or by Grossini, assuming that he was appellant's agent for that purpose. The respondents never received or accepted any part of the thing sold, and they paid no part of the purchase price. Consequently the purported sale was void. Civ. Code, §§ 1624 and 1739. The respondents argue that part of the purchase price for the wine was paid. That is not so. Neither Mrs. Origlia nor Grossini regarded the latter's agency as authorizing him to do anything more than find a purchaser for the wine at the price fixed by the writing, on terms to be determined by Mrs. Origlia. The evidence established that fact very clearly. Grossini's action in sending the contemplated agreement for the sale of the wine to Mrs. Orgilia for her execution, and her rejection of the offer upon the ground that the terms were not satisfactory, are in accord with such understanding. During the subsequent negotiations the appellant wrote Grossini that she had given him an option of 10 days within which to sell her wine, "reserving the condition that when you have found a buyer you would have come up and established the terms." The conduct of all the parties to the transaction indicates that the whole matter of the sale of the wine rested in treaty with Mrs. Origlia, and that she never accepted the proffered terms. The mere fact, therefore, that Grossini took from the respondents the check for $1,000 and sent it on to Mrs. Origlia, who promptly returned it, did not constitute a payment of a part of the purchase price under the circumstances established by the evidence. The finding of the trial court, that the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a contract for the sale of the wine is therefore unsupported, and the judgment must be reversed.

[3] In anticipation of another trial of the case, we deem it expedient to consider the other point made by the appellant. The lower court found that the defendant was indebted to Grossini in the sum of $450 for services rendered in procuring the sale of certain wine. This finding can only be responsive to the claim that Grossini earned that sum in bringing the parties together in the manner already shown. Unless the finding rests upon certain statements made by the appellant during the negotiations between the parties, it has no support in the evidence. The duty assumed by Grossini in the matter was to bring the minds of Mrs. Origlia and the intending buyers of the wine to an agreement for a sale and the price and terms on which it was to be made. Until this was done his right to a commission did not accrue. Ayres v. Thomas, 116 Cal. 140, 144, 47 Pac. 1013; Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 29, 34 Pac. 636; Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 512, 17 Pac. 642. Grossini did not accomplish that end. There is evidence in the record to the effect, however, that while the parties were endeavoring to reach an agreement as to the terms of payment for the wine, Mrs. Origlia acknowledged that Grossini had earned his commission, and that she would pay it, but that she would not sell at that time. If that declaration is to be construed as an acknowledgment that Grossini had completed his part in the transaction, the appellant became liable to pay Grossini the stipulated sum for his services in the matter (Ayres v. Thomas, supra), and the court's finding has meritorious support in the testimony. Our observation in this particular is called forth by the fact that appellant appears to be an Italian and the translation of her words into English, without further explanation of the conversation, may not have carried her exact meaning. On a retrial the matter should be more explicitly examined into.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a rehearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appel late District, Division 1, is denied.

[4] In denying the application we deem it proper to say that we are entirely satisfied with the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal, as substantially expressed in the opinion, to the effect that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain a conclusion that the right of Grossini to a commission under the terms of the contract had accrued; in other words, the evidence was not sufficient to support a conclusion that he had accomplished the thing which under the terms of the agreement would have entitled him to a commission. An acknowledgment by Mrs. Origlia that he had earned his commission would, of course, be entitled to consideration as evidence in connection with the other evidence in determining the question of fact, but in this case, in view of the other uncontroverted facts and circumstances, such acknowledgment, even if made, is of little or no importance.

E. D. Martindale, of Los Angeles, and John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin A. Meserve and Harry W. Hanson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered in the superior court in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,600, damages for fraud and deceit practiced by the defendant in a transaction concerning a lease on certain oil lands in Ventura county.

It is alleged in the complaint that, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to enter into a lease on the premises, defendant falsely represented to plaintiff that it was the owner in fee simple of the property, upon which there was an oil well capable of producing 50 barrels of oil per day, that all of the leased land was proven oil territory, and that there was located on the property a standard oil rig, boiler and engine, in good condition, with a complete outfit of tools and 1,600 feet of casing. Before the execution of the lease defendant showed the plaintiff certain land upon which there was a drilled well, and stated that it was the land proposed to be leased and that the well was capable of producing 50 barrels per day. It was impossible to examine or test the well prior to the making of the lease, by reason of it being full of water, but defendant agreed to pump out the water, cement the well, and demonstrate its capacity. Plaintiff relied upon these representations, and entered into the lease, paying the sum of $2,000 down, and agreeing to pay the further sum of $13,000 in installments thereafter. As a further consideration for the execution of the lease, defendant agreed to deliver to plaintiff 10,000 barrels of oil within six months from August 18, 1909, to be repaid out of the first product of wells to be sunk on the leased property. This oil was not delivered in accordance with the agreement, and the court assessed the damages therefor at $3,000.

Defendant was not in fact the owner of the land covered by the lease, but had only a mining claim, which had been located prior to the discovery or development of oil, or any effort to do so. The premises covered by the lease signed by the parties had no drilling rig, boiler, engine, or drilling tools, and there was not located thereon a producing oil well; nor was the well shown to plaintiff before the execution of the lease a producing well, but, in fact, proved to be a water well only.

The court found that, although the defendant represented to plaintiff that the well so shown was on the land described in the lease, and that it was capable of producing 50 barrels of oil per day, and that both representations were untrue, nevertheless defendant believed the representations to be true. The court further found that, because of defendant's failure and refusal to deliver a lease covering property owned by it in fee simple, in which was located an oil well of 50 barrels daily production, and because the lease did not embrace the standard rig, boiler, and engine in good condition, drilling tools and casing, plaintiff was damaged in the further sum of $2,600.

After the discovery by plaintiff of the falsity of the representations regarding the capacity of the well and the condition of the title to the property, negotiations were commenced looking toward a settlement of the differences without success. Following this, defendant notified plaintiff that its board of directors had passed a resolution withdrawing all propositions with relation to the leasing of the property, and requested plaintiff to return the leases, which had been submitted for his consideration. Plaintiff did not comply with the request, but instead instituted this action for damages, with the result noted.

Appellant contends that, as plaintiff neither alleged nor proved performance, or offer to perform, or rescission on his part, he cannot recover.

[1] It is well settled that one who has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract has a choice of remedies. He may rescind the contract, restoring to the other party what he has received under the contract, as provided by section 1691 of the Civil Code, or he may elect to stand upon the contract, retaining all the benefits thereof, and recover whatever damages he may have sustained by reason of the fraud. Westerfield v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 129 Cal. 68, 58 Pac. 92, 61 Pac. 667. If the contract be executory, and the defrauded party choose to affirm and pursue his remedy of suing for damages, he must be prepared to assume all the burdens imposed upon him by the agreement. He must stand ready and willing to pay the full consideration called for by the contract, in which event, if the damage be greater than the balance due under the agreement, such balance must be deducted from any award of damages made in the action. However, as a condition precedent to this right of recoupment, the plaintiff must allege and prove that he is willing and able to perform the contract according to its terms. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729.

The complaint in the instant case sounds in damages alone. There is no allegation of rescission after discovery of the fraud; nor is it averred that plaintiff has offered or is willing to carry out the conditions of the contract on his part to be performed. From the findings in this case we are unable to determine if the court, in rendering its judgment, took into consideration the fact that under the contract there was due from plaintiff the sum of $13,000 in unpaid installments. It is somewhat significant that the amount allowed as damages for failure to deliver a fee-simple title is the equivalent of the amount paid by plaintiff at the time of the execution of the lease contract, with interest thereon; and it may well be inferred that it was the intention of the court to compel the defendant to restore the amount it had received on the purchase price of the lease, without any rescission by the plaintiff on discovery of the fraud. This inference is fortified by the circumstances that there is no testimony in the record before us upon which to base a finding that the sum so assessed was the actual damage sustained, except so far as the amount agreed to be paid might be considered as evidence of the value of the property had it been as represented.

Plaintiff seeks to excuse performance or offer to perform on the theory that the failure of defendant to comply wtih its contract obviated the necessity of compliance on his part while defendant was in default, citing sections 1439 and 1440 of the Civil Code as authority for his position. These sections deal with the reciprocal duties of the parties to a contract, and each must fulfill or offer to perform every obligation imposed upon him before he can demand or require performance from the other, except where such other party has given notice that he will not comply with his part of the contract. Thus, before plaintiff can maintain an action based upon his contract, he must allege and prove that he has fulfilled all the obligations thereof, or is able and willing to do so, or that the defendant has notified him that it will not be bound by the contract. None of these necessary allegations appears in the complaint herein. It proceeds, apparently, upon the theory that, because he had complied wtih his obligation up to the time of the discovery of the fraud, plaintiff could immediately proceed to recover his damages, without further compliance or offer to perform. This he cannot do, under the rule enunciated in Hines v. Brode, supra, which was decided after this action was commenced.

For the reasons stated, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] We do not approve those portions of the opinion which declare that it is essential for a plaintiff in an action for damages on the contract, whereby the contract is affirmed, to allege or prove his willingness and ability to perform the contract according to its terms. The law as to the amount that may be recovered in such an action and what must be set off against any damage proved is sufficiently declared in Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729.

The statements referred to are not essential to the decision of the District Court of Appeal.

The application for a hearing in this court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

HUNT, County Treasurer, v. EMPIRE SECURITIES CO. et al. (Civ. 3228.)

Highways ⚷113(1)—Lien claimants cannot sequester county funds payable to contractor.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, does not apply to contracts for the improvement of streets or highways, so that a stop notice, given pursuant to that section, does not sequester funds payable under such a contract in the hands of the person charged with their disbursement, as would occur in the case of a private contract or a contract for the construction of a public building.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Interpleader by John N. Hunt, as County Treasurer of the County of Los Angeles, against the Empire Securities Company and Robert Beyrle and others, to determine the ownership of certain bonds. From a judgment ordering the sale of the bonds to satisfy the claims of defendants Beyrle and others, the Empire Securities Company appeals. Reversed.

Donald Barker and George W. Crouch, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Edward T. Bishop, Deputy Co. Counsel, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff and respondent Hunt.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for defendant, cross-complainant, and respondent Beyrle.

Jensen & Jensen, of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co.

W. E. Evans, of Los Angeles, for respondent City of Glendale.

W. T. Casey and Wm. J. Hanlon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Donegan.

Albert J. Sherer and Clarence J. Walker, both of Los Angeles, for Pacific Rock & Gravel Co.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondent Tropico-Glendale Land Co.

Walton J. Wood and Leland J. Allen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Rasich & Allen.

WELLER, J. This action of interpleader was instituted by the county treasurer of Los Angeles county to compel the defendants to litigate among themselves their claims to certain bonds held by him in his official capacity and representing the contract price of road work done by George L. Carroll, as contractor, under the provisions of the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 806).

The controversy here arises between the Empire Securities Company (assignee of Carroll, the contractor) and various parties who furnished materials and labor in the performance of the contracts with the county, hereinafter designated as lien claimants. These lien claimants base their rights to payment from the funds in the custody of the county treasurer upon the fact that they served stop notices on the proper officers, in accordance with the provisions of section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, and thereby effected an equitable garnishment of such portion of the contract price as might be necessary to satisfy their demands. This contention was sustained by the superior court, and the Empire Securities Company appeals from the judgment ordering the bonds sold and the proceeds of such sale applied first to the liquidation of the amount found due the lien claimants, subordinating the claim of appellant to the payment of their demands.

No complaint is made as to the validity or regularity of any of the claims, and the sole question to be determined is, Which of the parties is entitled to priority?

The facts in the case under consideration are identical in all material respects with those set forth in the decision of our Supreme Court in Slayden v. O'Dea, 189 Pac. 1066, in which it is held that section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to contracts for the improvement of streets or highways, and that therefore a stop notice, given pursuant to that section, under such a contract, does not have the effect of sequestering the funds in the hands of the person who is charged with their disbursement, as would occur in the case of a contract between private parties or for the construction of a public building. The rule thus enunciated is applicable to the instant case, and it follows that the superior court erred in adjudging the rights of the lien claimants to be paramount to appellant's claim to the bonds held by the county treasurer.

Judgment reversed.

FONG SING et al. v. O'DELL et al.
(Civ. 2189.)

1. Partnership 🔑244 — Surviving partners must liquidate affairs on death of one partner.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, where there is more than one surviving partner on death of a partner, those who are left must individually proceed to liquidate the affairs of the partnership, and deliver the residue to the parties entitled thereto, including the administrator or executor of the deceased partner.

2. Partnership 🔑245(1)—Surviving partners have cause of action against deceased partner's administrator taking possession of partnership property.

Surviving members of a partnership, being entitled to the possession of the partnership property under Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, have a cause of action against a deceased partner's administrator, who takes possession of some of the property and refuses to deliver it to the survivors.

3. Partnership 🔑258(1)—Surviving partners' action against deceased partner's administrator who has taken possession is in claim and delivery.

An action by surviving partners against a deceased partner's administrator, who has taken possession of partnership property and refuses to deliver it to the survivors, is in claim and delivery, and not in equity for an accounting.

4. Judgment 🔑249 — Form unimportant, if facts justifying relief are stated.

The form of the action is unimportant if sufficient facts are stated to justify any relief.

5. Replevin 🔑61—Failure to allege demand cured by showing that it would be unavailing.

In a suit by surviving partners against a deceased partner's administrator to recover partnership property of which he had taken possession, failure to allege demand for its delivery was cured by showing that such demand would be unavailing, especially where it alleged a demand for an accounting and an omission and refusal to account.

6. Partnership 🔑258(7)—Complaint by surviving partners against deceased partner's administrator held to state cause of action for possession.

In a suit by surviving partners against a deceased partner's administrator, a complaint, alleging the partnership, the death of one partner, the appointment of the administrator, the partnership's ownership of described property, that the administrator had taken possession of a designated part of such property and claimed it and denied the right of the firm and asserted title therein, and also showing that a demand would be unavailing, stated a cause of action for possession of the property.

7. Partnership 🔑258(7)—Complaint in action by surviving partners against others who were claiming title held good.

In a suit by some of the surviving members of a partnership against others, a complaint, alleging as to each defendant that he had taken into his possession and retained described property of the firm and claimed it as his own, and denied the right of the firm and of the partners therein, and refused to account therefor, stated a cause of action for an accounting.

8. Pleading 🔑64(2)—Complaint by surviving partner against others and deceased partner's administrator for accounting and distribution not multifarious.

In a suit by surviving partners against a deceased partner's administrator and other surviving partners, a complaint, alleging that the administrator and each of the defendant partners had taken possession of partnership property, claiming it as his own and denying the title of the partnership, and had refused to account therefor, was not multifarious, as the purpose of the action was single, to subject all of the property of the partnership to an accounting, that the debts might be paid and the residue distributed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action for an accounting by Fong Sing and others against Harvey O'Dell, as administrator, and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed with directions.

Joseph F. O'Malley and C. C. Wing, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Tam & Hawkins, Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, and Von Detten, Henry & Goodrum, all of Stockton, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought for an accounting based upon an alleged partnership, of which plaintiffs, the decedent and the individual defendants were members. Separate demurrers were interposed by the administrator and the other defendants, which were sustained, and, the plaintiffs declining to amend, judgment passed, from which the appeal has been taken. The rights and duties of a surviving partner are clearly set forth in the Code of Civil Procedure and the decisions of the courts. In section 1585 of said Code it is provided that—

> "When a partnership exists between the decedent, at the time of his death, and any other person, the surviving partner has the right to continue in possession of the partnership, and to settle its business. * * * The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay, and account with the executor or administrator, and pay over such balances as may from time to time be payable to him, in right of the decedent. Upon the application of the executor or administrator, the court, or a judge thereof, may, whenever it appears necessary, order the surviving partner to render an account, * * * and the executor or administrator may maintain against him any action which the decedent could have maintained."

In Tomkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 51, it is said:

> "The administrator had no authority to intermeddle at all with the partnership affairs, except so far as he was entitled to call upon the surviving partner to proceed to close up the partnership affairs and account to him for the share of the surplus belonging to the estate."

In Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 168 Cal. 120, 142 Pac. 83, we find this statement of the law:

> "Neither the executor nor the heirs have any right of possession of the partnership property until the surviving partner has proceeded to its liquidation and has delivered it over to them. The executor or administrator has only the right to demand and enforce settlement and payment and delivery over of such part thereof as may remain after final settlement by the surviving partner of the partnership affairs. The surviving partner is the only legal representative of the partnership, at least as between him and the heirs and legal representatives of the deceased member."

[1] Of course, the principle is the same where there is more than one surviving partner. Those who are left must individually proceed to liquidate the affairs of the partnership and deliver the residue over to the parties entitled thereto, including the administrator or executor, as the case might be.

[2, 3] The survivors herein being entitled to the possession of the property of the partnership, it would, of course, follow that they would have a cause of action against the administrator of the estate of one of the partners, who had taken possession for the estate of some of the property and refused to deliver it over to said survivors. Quite clearly, though, the action would be in claim and delivery, and not in equity for an accounting. Plaintiffs apparently proceeded upon the theory that they could compel the administrator to participate in the liquidation and settlement of the partnership affairs, and hence the peculiar form of the action. Plaintiffs seem to think that Raisch v. Warren, 18 Cal. App. 655, 124 Pac. 95, justifies their view of the proper procedure. In that case, however, the point was not made that an action against the administrator of a deceased partner for an accounting could not be maintained. Indeed, the action was for an injunction, and the only point relied upon was that plaintiff was not in a position to bring the suit because he had not reduced the claim to a judgment.

[4] But, of course, the peculiar form of the action is unimportant if sufficient facts be stated to justify any relief. As declared by the Supreme Court in the recent case of Zellner v. Wassman, 193 Pac. 84:

> "It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived the form of relief to which he is entitled."

[5, 6] In the complaint herein are alleged the existence of the partnership, the death of one of the partners, the appointment of his administrator, the ownership by said partnership at the time of said death of certain personal property, described therein, that said administrator had taken into his possession a part of said property, it being designated in the complaint, and that said defendant has claimed, and still claims, the property of his intestate, "and has denied and still denies the right of said firm and the said partners therein and has asserted and still asserts title therein." The only possible omission that could be urged is the failure to allege specifically a demand for the delivery of the property, but this is cured by the showing that such demand would be unavailing. Besides, we find the averment that, before the commencement of the action "plaintiffs demanded of defendants an accounting of the partnership transactions and affairs; that said defendants then and there refused and still refuse, omitted and still omit, to render such accounting." It cannot be doubted, therefore, that the complaint states a cause of action against said administrator for the possession of said personal property.

[7] But a more difficult question is injected into the case by the fact that another cause of action against the other two defendants for the recovery of other personal property is joined in the complaint, indeed in the same count, with said administrator. The allegations as to each are similar, and it is sufficient to exhibit the following:

> "That the defendant Phillip Storey, prior to the commencement of this action, took into his possession, and still retains personal property belonging to and owned by said copartnership [describing it]; that said defendant has claimed and still claims the said property as his own, and has denied and still denies the right of said firm and of said partners therein, and has asserted and still asserts title thereto adverse to said partners and to said firm, and has refused and still refuses to account therefor to said parties."

It is also alleged:

> "That defendants Phillip Storey and Bing Kee refuse to join as parties plaintiff, and for that reason, and for the further reason that they refuse, and each of them refuses, to render an accounting of partnership transactions had by them, and each of them, they are joined as parties defendant."

In 30 Cyc. 445, the governing principle as to the relation of the partners to the partnership property is stated as follows:

> "As firm property is not owned by the partners in severalty, but belongs to the partnership, it follows that neither partner is entitled to exclusive possession of the firm estate, or of any item of property composing it. If a partner wrongfully asserts such exclusive possession, the other partners may obtain relief in equity, but they cannot maintain a purely possessory action at common law."

Among the cases cited to support the text are Stone v. Fouse, 3 Cal. 292; Nugent v. Locke, 4 Cal. 318; Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174.

Respondents have not pointed out any particular in which said allegations against Storey and Kee fall short of stating a cause of action for an accounting. We perceive nothing lacking in that respect. Indeed, whether regarded as in equity, or at law for recovery of the specific part of the partnership property held by them, the complaint states a cause of action against said Storey and Kee. We may add that, in our opinion, since it appears that two of the surviving partners are making adverse claims to a part of the partnership property, it would not be altogether unreasonable to hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of said property for the purpose of settling the partnership affairs and distributing the residue to those entitled thereto. In other words, having repudiated the ownership of the partnership, they are hardly in a position to claim the privilege of possession as partners. By their own conduct they have placed themselves in the attitude of strangers, and probably should be so treated. At any rate, we are satisfied a cause of action is stated against them.

[8] The question remains whether there has been a misjoinder of causes of action or of defendants. If the action were against surviving partners only who claimed an adverse interest in separate portions of the partnership property, there could be no doubt that it would not be open to the objection of multifariousness. The same result would follow if each of the defendants made claim to the same property belonging to the partnership. The problem is somewhat complicated by the fact, however, that the adverse claim is to separate portions, and the action against the administrator is, strictly speaking, in law, and against the other defendants, in equity. But, after all, the purpose of the action is single, to subject all the property of the partnership to an accounting, that the debts may be paid and the residue distributed to the plaintiffs and the defendants according to their respective interests. It is a case for the application of the principle stated in Storey, Eq. Pl., paragraphs 533 and 534, as follows:

> "Where there is a common liability in the defendants, and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims to property, at least, if the subjects are such as may without inconvenience be joined, may be united in one and the same suit; and, further that where the interests of the plaintiffs are the same, although the defendants may not have a coextensive common interest, but their interest may be derived under different instruments, if the general object of the bill will be promoted by their being united in a single suit, the court will not hesitate to sustain the bill against all of them."

In Dimmock v. Bixby, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 368, it is held that—

> "Where one general right is claimed by the plaintiff, although the defendants may have separate and distinct rights," the bill of complaint is not multifarious.

In Wade v. Rusher, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. 537, it was held that—

> "Where suit is brought by one of two partners against the other, to obtain an accounting and payment of a balance justly due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and to set aside as fraudulent a release from liability as such partner executed by the plaintiff to the defendant, a third person who has fraudulently and without consideration obtained from the defendant portions of the partnership property may also be made a party, in order to subject the property so held by him to the payment of any balance due from the defendant to the plaintiff."

The governing principle was said to be that the cause of action was single, namely, the right to an accounting and an application of the partnership property to the payment of the sum due from the defendant.

In Wilson v. Castro, 31 Cal. 421, it was held that a bill in equity to enforce a trust, averring:

> "That plaintiffs' grantors inherited a tract of land as heirs at law of their brother, who received a grant of the same from the government of Mexico, and died intestate, and that two of the defendants afterwards received patents for distinct parcels of the same, and that several other defendants claim the title to separate and distinct parcels of the same derived from the patentees, and that the defendants hold the legal title to the several distinct parcels in trust for the plaintiffs, * * * is not multifarious."

In the course of the discussion the court said:

> "It is the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all parties interested in the subject of the suit, so as to make the performance of the decree of the court perfectly safe to those compelled to obey it, and to prevent further litigation. For this purpose all persons materially interested, either legally or beneficially, in the subject-matter of the suit, ought generally to be made parties thereto, either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all."

In Doudell v. Shoo, 20 Cal. App. 424, 129 Pac. 478, the subject received careful consideration by this court. Therein it was held that, since the principal relief sought was the establishment of the existence of the partnership and for an accounting, the prayer for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver was only in aid of the main relief sought, and that there was no misjoinder of causes of action.

In Bremner v. Leavitt, 109 Cal. 130, 41 Pac. 859, we have this general statement of the controlling principle in such cases:

> "In an action for an accounting between partners, all matters relating to and growing out of the partnership relation of the parties, and for which an accounting is sought, however varied they may be in their nature, taken together constitute but a single cause of action, and may properly be embraced in a single count in the complaint."

The case at bar differs somewhat in its facts from any of the foregoing citations, but we think it presents a similar situation. The technical terminology being ignored, the case is simply one, after the dissolution of a partnership, against several parties who are in possession of some of the partnership property and claiming the same, to have it determined that said property belongs to said partnership and to subject it to the payment of the partnership debts, and to have the residue distributed to those entitled to it. Necessarily we assume that the facts are as stated in the complaint. It may be that after issue joined it would be advisable and proper to try separately the issues that may be raised by the different parties, but we think the defendants should be put to their answer.

We may state that respondents devote nearly their entire argument to the proposition that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and this is all that is said upon the point of misjoinder:

> "We respectfully submit that the amended complaint therefore states no facts giving the plaintiff any grounds for relief against the defendant O'Dell as administrator, and that his demurrer was therefore properly sustained, and that the demurrer of the defendant Storey was also properly sustained upon the ground that he has been improperly joined with defendant O'Dell, with whom he is in no wise united so far as the subject of the action is concerned."

We think they are mistaken, and the judgment is reversed, with direction to the lower court to overrule the demurrers and permit defendants to answer.

KOPPERUD v. COOKSON et al. (Civ. 2133.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes ⟜525—Evidence held to prove purchase of note in good faith.

Holder held to have acquired a note as indorsee in good faith within Civ. Code, §§ 3137, 3140, as amended by St. 1917, p. 1541, making defense of no consideration unavailable against an indorsee in due course who has acquired a note in good faith.

2. Appeal and error ⟜1010(1)—Findings warranted by evidence not disturbed.

Findings warranted by the evidence will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by A. H. Kopperud against S. T. Cookson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. F. McNoble, W. Goodwin Williams, J. Le Roy Johnson, and M. P. Shaughnessy, all of Stockton, for appellants.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought by the indorsee of a promissory note given in consideration of the sale of a certain stallion. The defense is that there was a failure of consideration by reason of the false and fraudulent representations made by the seller as to the age, soundness, and procreative ability of the horse, and that—

> "A pretended indorsement or assignment of said note was made by the said Norm W. Thompson (the payee) to plaintiff, but said indorsement or assignemnt was fraudulent and void; that plaintiff, at the time said note was indorsed and assigned to him, knew that the same was without consideration and void, and knew that the said stallion was unsound and diseased in body, and was worthless to said defendants, and said plaintiff did then and there conspire with said Norm W. Thompson to cheat and defraud the said defendants by having said note indorsed by said Norm W. Thompson to said plaintiff for the purpose of preventing the said defendants from making their defense of want of consideration when suit should be brought upon said note."

It may be that the defendants were "stung," as one of the witnesses expressed it; it is quite probable, indeed, that Thompson perpetrated a fraud in inducing the purchasers to rely upon his representations as to the character of the horse.

But be that as it may, there can be no serious doubt that the judgment of the trial

⟜For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes court must be upheld upon the other ground that plaintiff was "an indorsee in due course," in other words, that he "in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value, before its apparent maturity or presumptive dishonor, and without knowledge of its actual dishonor," acquired the note duly indorsed to him. Section 3123, Civ. Code. The learned trial judge gave to this question careful consideration, as is apparent from his opinion filed in the case. He points out that at the time of the transaction the "Uniform Negotiable Instrument Law" had not become operative, but that no substantial change was effected thereby as far as this question is concerned, and that the case is governed by the principles announced in sections 3137 and 3140 of the Civil Code as amended by the Legislature of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1541). He proceeds:

> "That the plaintiff acquired the note in question in due course is admitted. That he acquired it in good faith is denied, and the basis of denial is placed upon the circumstances that he purchased the note at a 10 per cent. discount, and made no inquiry of the makers of the note as to the consideration and the circumstances leading up to its execution by them."

He declares that if plaintiff had made such inquiry he probably would not have discovered any fact indicating the invalidity of the note, but at most that the defendants had paid for the horse more than he was worth, but that it was worth more than the note which he was about to buy. Thereupon follows this:

> "But the law relating to negotiable instruments does not necessitate any such action on the part of the intending purchaser of such paper. If he knows of any circumstances affecting the instrument, then he is chargeable therewith, and if anything occurs in the course of the negotiation with the persons with whom he is dealing, or if anything appears upon the face of the instrument which would arouse the suspicion of a reasonable person as to the infirmity of the note, then his failure to make inquiry to ascertain the truth concerning the instrument would amount to bad faith.
> "It may be here stated that the court has found nothing in the testimony indicating that at the time of the purchase of the note anything occurred or anything appeared which would have caused a reasonable person, in the situation of the plaintiff, to question the validity of the instrument, or that it was not executed for a good and sufficient consideration.
> "It is urged that the purchase of the note at a 10 per cent. discount was of itself sufficient to cast a cloud upon the transaction, and also the fact that the transaction took place between 80 and 100 miles distant from the place where the note was executed. The apparent reason for Thompson's presence in the city of Oakland to visit his brother-in-law, who was an employee of the plaintiff, answers any objection that may be made as to the transaction occurring in Oakland rather than in Manteca. So far as the plaintiff was concerned, Thompson was there for a legitimate and valid reason. His presence under such circumstances would not call for inquiry or arouse any suspicions. That Thompson was taking notes from farmers where he had sold different stallions is also true. That the different notes ran over a considerable period of time, and thus deprived Thompson of the use of ready money, appears also to be a fact. And, considering that the note in controversy had something over a year to run, and that the use of 90 per cent. of its face value would mean more to Thompson, if paid then, than the full amount of the note obtained after a delay of more than a year, the court cannot very well come to the conclusion that a 10 per cent. reduction was at all out of the ordinary, or such as to raise an inference that the plaintiff knew he was buying, or ought to have known that he was buying, a tainted instrument."

The trial judge then called attention to the distinguishing features of the several cases upon which appellant relies, and, after citing Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873, Blochman Commercial & Savings Bank v. Moretti, 177 Cal. 256, 170 Pac. 419, Citizens' Bank v. Stewart, 22 Cal. App. 91, 133 Pac. 337, as enunciating the rule to be applied in such instances, he concluded:

> "From what has been said, the conclusion is unavoidable that, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, it must be held that he is a purchaser in good faith, that the note was taken in the ordinary and usual course of business a year or more before its maturity, without notice of any defenses, and that an adequate consideration was paid therefor, and is entitled to judgment in his favor, irrespective of any fraudulent practices on the part of Thompson in its procurement."

[1, 2] It seems unnecessary to add anything to what was stated by the trial judge. Even if we concede that the evidence might support a finding that plaintiff was not a purchaser in good faith, it cannot be gainsaid that the court was amply warranted in reaching a contrary conclusion. The trial judge was in a position to gauge properly the testimony of the plaintiff, and it would be presumptuous in us to say that he was misled.

LEACHMAN v. CAGE et al. (Civ. 3290.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Judgment ⚿892—Satisfaction held not conclusive as against claim that payment was on account only.

A writing entitled "Satisfaction and Release of Judgment against Defendant E. S. F.," in the body of which it was stated that $500 had been paid by E. S. F., and acknowledging "full satisfaction of the judgment rendered in the above-entitled action * * * and the clerk of said court is hereby authorized and directed to enter in the proper records full satisfaction of said judgment," held not conclusive as against a claim by the judgment creditor that the $500 was only paid on account of the judgment and not in full satisfaction thereof.

2. Judgment ⚿898(4)—Satisfaction of judgment must be pleaded by defendants in action to renew.

Where judgment was rendered against three defendants on note, and, upon payment of part of the amount thereof by one defendant, a satisfaction in full was filed with the clerk, and the judgment creditor later brought action to renew the judgment as to the other two defendants, it was necessary that defendants in the second action plead such satisfaction and secure findings and judgment thereon, if they wished to rely on it or a satisfaction in full.

3. Judgment ⚿138(1)—Defendant relieved from default only by satisfying condition required by statute.

After a default has been entered against a defendant, he can only be relieved therefrom by satisfying a condition required under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Alonzo Leachman against John M. Cage, Hattie L. Mohrenstecher, as executrix of the estate of George Mohrenstecher, deceased, and others. From an order vacating a default judgment for plaintiff against the executrix and dismissing action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Goodspeed & Pendell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lewis Cruickshank and Vincent B. Vaughan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff takes this appeal from an order made by the trial court vacating a default entry and judgment entered thereon against defendant Mohrenstecher, executrix. An appeal is also taken from an order made dismissing the action.

[1-3] The facts are these: Respondent's testator, one Finney, and three other persons, were the makers of a promissory note of which the plaintiff was the holder. Judgment was entered on that note against all of the defendants and in favor of the plaintiff on the 15th day of July, 1914. Thereafter, on the 11th day of August, 1919, Finney, one of the makers, paid to the plaintiff $500 and plaintiff executed a writing which was entitled "Satisfaction and Release of Judgment against Defendant E. S. Finney," and in the body of which it was stated that, $500 having been paid by Finney, Leachman acknowledged "full satisfaction of the judgment rendered in the above-entitled action, * * * and the clerk of said court is hereby authorized and directed to enter in the proper records full satisfaction of said judgment." At that time a sum considerably in excess of the $500 mentioned was due to the plaintiff under the judgment. Thereafter the plaintiff brought action to renew the judgment as to the respondent and the other makers of the note except Finney, and default was duly entered against respondent for not appearing and answering the complaint. Thereafter respondent moved the court to set aside the judgment on the ground that the judgment in suit had been fully satisfied, and referred to the records and files in the former action, which included the written satisfaction of judgment hereinbefore referred to. No ground of excusable neglect, such as is permitted to be made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, was urged; respondent taking the bald position that she was entitled to the relief sought upon referring to the court for inspection the written satisfaction of judgment as filed in the first action. As we have noted, the court not only granted this motion, but entered an order upon the application of respondent, dismissing the suit. Plaintiff, in his complaint in the action to renew the judgment, set out fully the facts as to the amount due and as to the amount paid by Finney, referring to the latter as a payment on account only. We think that the complaint tendered an issue as to the nonpayment in full of the judgment, and that the written satisfaction as filed was not conclusive as to that issue. Furthermore, assuming that the written satisfaction would have such effect, it was necessary to plead the same in the second action and secure findings and judgment thereon. Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611, 87 Am. Dec. 102. Assuming the correctness of this position, it would necessarily follow that after default had been entered against respondent she could only be relieved therefrom by satisfying a condition required under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. This her counsel admits she did not do. The order vacating the default and judgment should not have been granted.

The order and judgment of dismissal are reversed.

COMMERCIAL NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. ROBERTS et al. (Civ. 3460.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑87(1) — Cancellation of pre-existing indebtedness is valuable consideration.

Cancellation of pre-existing indebtedness is a valuable consideration for a conveyance.

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑113(1) — Deed held not void as a prohibited secret parol trust to convey.

Where in consideration of cancellation of pre-existing indebtedness to wife husband conveyed land to his wife's sister, and the sister took with the resulting trust for the wife, the deed was not void as a prohibited secret parol trust to convey, for the cancellation of pre-existing indebtedness was a valuable consideration, and if the grantor had paid the debt to his wife, and she had paid the money for the conveyance, it would not be open to attack under Civ. Code, § 853; the law not requiring the mere act of passing the same money backward and forward under section 3532.

3. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑299(1) — Evidence held to prove execution of deed prior to creditors' attachment.

In a suit to set aside a deed as fraudulent as to creditors, evidence held to warrant a finding that the deed was executed before the date of the creditors' attachment.

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(5) — Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that pre-existing indebtedness was canceled.

In an action to set aside deed made by a husband to his wife's sister, who took the land in trust for the wife, evidence held to warrant finding that there was a cancellation of a pre-existing indebtedness due the wife.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(5) — Evidence held sufficient to establish adequacy of consideration.

Where a conveyance by a husband to his wife's sister for the latter's benefit was attacked as fraudulent, evidence held sufficient to establish the adequacy of the consideration, which was the cancellation of a pre-existing debt.

6. Appeal and error 🔑941—Question of adequacy of consideration calls for exercise of judicial discretion.

The question of the adequacy of the consideration for an alleged fraudulent conveyance calls for the exercise of judicial discretion, and, to warrant interference with such discretion, the disparity between the ascertained value of the lands and the price paid must be so clear as to shock the moral sense at first glance.

7. Appeal and error 🔑931(1) — All presumptions are in favor of the action of the trial court.

Every reasonable presumption must be indulged in favor of the action of the trial court, and this is true where the determination of the trial court on the question of adequacy of an alleged fraudulent conveyance is attacked.

8. Attachment 🔑180 — Judgment 🔑788(1) —Unrecorded conveyance passes title as against subsequent attachment or judgment.

A deed executed and delivered, though not recorded, passes title against a subsequent attachment or judgment even when procured by creditor of the grantor.

9. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑115(1) — Preferential deed not void.

Mere false statements by a debtor to his creditor do not warrant the vacation of a preferential deed made to another creditor; for, under Civ. Code, § 3442, a debtor may prefer one creditor to another in a case where the bankruptcy statutes do not apply.

10. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑271(3)—Proof of grantor's fraudulent intent casts the burden of proof on the grantee.

Proof that the grantor had a fraudulent intent in making the conveyance casts the burden of proof on the grantee to show a valuable consideration, and, when this burden is sustained, the burden of proof again shifts to one attacking the conveyance to show that the grantee had knowledge of the grantor's fraudulent intent.

11. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑74(2)—Inadequacy of consideration is circumstance tending to show participation in fraud.

Mere inadequacy of consideration is not of itself fraudulent, but is only a circumstance tending to show knowledge of fraud or participation in it.

12. Appeal and error 🔑842(3)—Question of fraudulent intent one of fact.

Under Civ. Code, § 3442, the question of fraudulent intent of the grantor and grantee in case of a conveyance attacked as in fraud of creditors is one of fact, and the determination of the trial court is binding on the appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles against C. S. Roberts and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James, Smith & McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff sued to have certain conveyances set aside as fraudulent and appeals from the judgment against it. The real basis of the attack is that the evidence does not support the findings of fact. Interwoven with the argument upon this question the appellant makes certain contentions regarding the law. It will tend to clarity to dispose of these contentions in the first instance. Three deeds through which Roberts' title to the land in controversy became vested in his wife, the respondent Mida Roberts, are attacked, and a sheriff's deed under execution against Roberts is relied upon by the appellant, which maintains that, apart from any question of fraud, each of the three deeds is void, and that the sheriff's deed gave to the appellant legal title.

[1, 2] The first deed in the series is in the ordinary form of grant, for an expressed consideration of $10, from Roberts to a Mrs. Buechner, a sister of Mrs. Roberts. The trial court found that the real consideration for the conveyance was a pre-existing debt of Roberts to his wife, and that the conveyance was made to Mrs. Buechner, who paid no part of the consideration, with a resulting trust for Mrs. Roberts. The appellant contends that, apart from any question of fraud, or lack of consideration, or nonexistence of the debt, the deed is void as a prohibited secret parol trust to convey. Cases are cited announcing the familiar rule that to support such a resulting trust the consideration for the conveyance must have been paid by the beneficial owner. Assuming for the present purpose the existence of the debt from Roberts to his wife, there could be no contention such as the appellant makes if Roberts had paid the amount of the debt in money to his wife and immediately she had paid him the same money as the consideration for his conveyance to Mrs. Buechner. Civ. Code, § 853. The law does not require so idle an act as the mere passing back and forth of the same coin. Civ. Code, § 3532. Cancellation of a pre-existing indebtedness is a valuable consideration for a conveyance. Schulter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. 659; Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 582, 32 Pac. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209. If the transaction was untainted by fraud the entire title of Roberts was divested by the conveyance of the legal title to Mrs. Buechner, subject to the resulting trust for Mrs. Roberts.

Still assuming that the transaction was not fraudulent, after Roberts divested himself of title, neither he nor the appellant, claiming under a subsequent execution sale, is at all interested in what became of the title, or whether or not subsequent transfers were valid or fraudulent; therefore no consideration need be given to the appellant's contentions concerning the subsequent deeds from Mrs. Buechner to Roberts' sister, Mrs. Brillhart, and from her to Mrs. Roberts. On the other hand, if the first deed was fraudulent, the subsequent deeds are similarly tainted and fall with it, and in that event it is unnecessary to consider the particular attacks of the appellant directed to them. If the entire title passed from Roberts under the first deed, the judgment must be affirmed; if no title passed from Roberts because the first deed was fraudulent, the judgment must be reversed. The only bearing transactions subsequent to that deed could possibly have upon the case is that they might tend to show fraud or guilty knowledge connected with the original transaction. The final contention of the appellant that, because its sheriff's deed was recorded before the date of the last deed in the series, legal title vested in Mrs. Roberts under that deed, subject to the appellant's right, is wholly groundless. If by the first deed Roberts' title was divested, the appellant acquired nothing by the sheriff's deed, and its recordation added no new right.

The only other matter to be considered is the attack on the sufficiency of the evidence. The first deed was dated November 20, 1914. The appellant, in its brief, says:

> "If the deed was actually executed on the day of its date, and if there was a valuable and adequate consideration for it, and if there was no fraudulent intent, the deed vested title in Buechner and wiped out our attachment."

The attachment was levied after the date of the deed, judgment followed against Roberts on his debt to the appellant in the attachment suit, and sale of his interest, if any, to the appellant was under execution levied on that judgment.

Section 3442 of the Civil Code, in so far as it relates to the matters under discussion, provides that the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law; nor can any transfer be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration, provided that any transfer made voluntarily or without a valuable consideration by a party while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. From the quoted statement in the appellant's brief, if the evidence meets four requirements, the judgment must be affirmed. The four points are: (1) Execution on November 20, 1914; (2) a valuable consideration; (3) adequate in amount; and (4) lack of fraudulent intent. Taken as a whole the evidence is such that a finding in favor of the appellant on any of these facts, except perhaps the first, would have been sustained, but it does not follow that the present findings must be reversed. Bandle v. Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 174 Pac. 44.

[3] On the question of execution of the deed on its date there is ample evidence. The notarial certificate showed acknowledgment on November 20, 1914, and in addition to the positive testimony of Roberts, his wife, and Mrs. Buechner, the subscribing witness and the notary testified they were present at a dinner at Roberts' house when the deed was delivered. As against this it is argued that certain suspicious circumstances were of such a character as should have prompted the trial court to reject this testimony of these five witnesses. This court, not having seen the witnesses, cannot,

[4] On the question of a valuable consideration, Roberts and his wife testified she had caused certain land owned by her subject to a mortgage to be transferred to him, and that the mortgage was foreclosed; also that she had from time to time advanced to him certain money during a period of about two years; that they had figured up the amount of the debt and agreed that it amounted to about $2,000, to cancel which the deed was made. This evidence was sufficient to establish the existence of the debt, and as a matter of law the cancellation of such a debt constitutes a valuable consideration. Schulter v. Harvey, supra; Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 582, 32 Pac. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209; Ross v. Sedgwick, 69 Cal. 250, 10 Pac. 400; Sanderson v. Broadwell, 82 Cal. 133, 23 Pac. 36; Hart v. Mead, 84 Cal. 244, 24 Pac. 118; Greenwalt v. Mueller, 126 Cal. 639, 59 Pac. 137; Fowles v. National Bank, 167 Cal. 664, 140 Pac. 271.

[5] On the question of adequacy of the consideration there was evidence that the property, which was a ranch where Roberts and his wife maintained their home, was worth about $5,000, and that it was subject to a mortgage to a third person to secure a debt of about $2,500. Roberts testified that his debt to his wife was about $1,800. She testified it was $2,000 or somewhat more. The appellant argues from certain evidentiary matters that the debt could not have been more than $500, but from the facts on which the appellant relies it may have been considerably more. The appellant assumes the ranch to have been worth more than $5,000, but this assumption does not rest upon any conclusive evidence. If the ranch were worth $7,500, subject to the mortgage of $2,500, and there had been no debt from Roberts to his wife, either might have defeated the appellant's judgment by a declaration of a homestead. The trial court found there was a debt and it was canceled. Upon the evidence of value of $5,000, subject to a mortgage of $2,500, the court was justified in considering the equity of the holder of the legal title as worth considerably less than the difference in the two amounts.

[6, 7] Under these circumstances the determination of just what is an adequate consideration for a transfer calls for the exercise of judicial discretion, and on appeal every reasonable presumption must be indulged in favor of the action of the trial court. It has often been said, to warrant interference with the discretion vested in the trial court, the disparity between the ascertained value of the thing sold and the price paid must be so clear and so great as at first glance to shock the moral sense. No such condition appears under the facts in evidence and to which reference has been made.

[8] On the question of fraud, in addition to the claimed inadequacy of the consideration for the transfer, there are many circumstances tending to support the view of the appellant, but these were all matters of fact, confided to the determination of the trial court. Roberts testified that he had no fraudulent intent. That he told numerous untruths to the officers of the appellant bank, and concealed from them the facts concerning the execution of the deed to his wife, is beyond question. The deed had not then been recorded. A deed executed and delivered, though not recorded, passes title against a subsequent attachment or judgment, even when procured by a creditor of the grantor. Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564; Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, 17 Pac. 680; Morrow v. Graves, 77 Cal. 218, 19 Pac. 489; Ward v. Watterman, 85 Cal. 507, 24 Pac. 930; Bank of Ukiah v. Petaluma, etc., Bank, 100 Cal. 590, 35 Pac. 170; National Bank v. Western Pacific Ry., 157 Cal. 576, 108 Pac. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 1391.

[9] Mere false statements by a debtor to his creditor are not sufficient to warrant a court in setting aside a preferential deed to another creditor in satisfaction of his debt. A debtor may prefer one creditor to another in a case where the bankruptcy statutes do not apply. Civ. Code, § 3442; Sanderson v. Broadwell, supra; Heath v. Wilson, 139 Cal. 362, 73 Pac. 182.

> "It is a well-settled rule that, where a plaintiff attacks a conveyance as in fraud of his rights, it is incumbent upon him first to show the fraudulent intent of the vendor. The burden then shifts to the purchaser to show valuable consideration, and, this shown, the burden again shifts to the plaintiff, who must show the vendee's knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the grantor." Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 58 Pac. 910, 59 Pac. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195.

[10] Assuming that Roberts' false statements to the bank officials showed a fraudulent intent on his part, under the rule the burden shifted to Mrs. Roberts to show a valuable consideration. This burden she sustained under the findings to which reference has been made. The burden then again shifted to the appellant to show guilty knowledge on her part of Roberts' fraudulent intent, and the argument upon this subject rests largely upon the claim of inadequacy of consideration.

[11, 12] Inadequacy of consideration is not of itself fraudulent. It is only a circumstance tending to show knowledge of fraud or participation in it. Knowledge and intent remain questions of fact on which the appellate court is bound by the determination of the trial court. Civ. Code, § 3442; McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 628; Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 400, 25 Pac. 497; Rossen v. Villanueva et al., 175 Cal. 632, 166 Pac. 1004. Mrs. Roberts testified that she had no knowledge that her husband was indebted to the appellant, and that at the time of the conveyance she believed him to be a man of ample means. The most that can be said in favor of the contentions of the appellant in regard to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is that it was conflicting. There is nothing else in the record or briefs requiring consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

FRIEND & TERRY LUMBER CO. v. DEVINE et al. (Civ. 2063.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷931(9)—Where findings waived every legitimate conclusion resolved in support of judgment.

Where findings are waived, every legitimate conclusion which can be drawn from the evidence must be resolved in support of the judgment.

2. Husband and wife ⚷23 — Except as his agent in fact, wife cannot bind husband except for necessities.

Unless the wife is acting as her husband's agent, she has no authority to make any contract in his name, or to dispose of his property, save and except purchases for necessaries, when not supplied by him.

3. Principal and agent ⚷153 — One receives principal's property from agent at his peril.

While a person who knowingly receives money or property of a principal from an agent in payment of the latter's debt does so at his peril, if the agent acted without authority, the principal may recover.

4. Husband and wife ⚷23—Husband held not entitled to hold creditor on account of wife's misappropriation.

In an action by a lumber company against a husband and wife both of whom made purchases, where it appeared that the husband allowed the wife to collect his funds and pay bills, held that, though the wife wrongfully applied the husband's funds in payment of her own bill, the husband could not hold the lumber company; the evidence warranting a finding that he made the wife his agent, and that the lumber company acted in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Friend & Terry Lumber Company against James H. Devine and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 188 Pac. 1007.

C. E. McLaughlin and S. R. Hart, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento and Stanley Pedder, of Coalinga, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Justice pro tem. Respondent recovered judgment against the appellant in the trial court for the sum of $421.45, on account of lumber sold and delivered by the respondent to the appellant.

By the statement of counsel for appellant at the opening of the case in the trial court, it appeared that the only issue presented for determination was whether the appellant should have credit for the sum of $208.34 on account of lumber alleged to have been furnished by respondent to one J. E. Reeves, the son of appellant's wife by a former marriage, and charged to the account of appellant's wife.

It appears that the respondent sold and delivered lumber used in repairing a certain building owned by appellant, also lumber for the repair of a building belonging to Mrs. Devine, the wife of appellant, and also sold and delivered some lumber to Mr. Reeves, this latter lumber going over to a place called Broderick, the cost thereof being charged to the account of Mrs. Devine. Mr. and Mrs. Devine owned separate property, and also had separate accounts with the lumber company. Mrs. Devine, the appellant's wife, appears to have collected all rents, and otherwise received money from appellant or his property, and paid all bills. It also appears that at the time of making payments the appellant's wife would designate the respective accounts to which the payments should be applied. It does not appear how much money was collected by Mrs. Devine, or whether any of the moneys used by her in making payments, either on her account or the account of her husband with the lumber company, came from her separate property. The transactions referred to continued over a considerable period of time. Monthly statements were rendered by the lumber company to the defendants, to which no objection appears to have been made until a short time before the institution of this action. The accuracy of plaintiff's ledger sheet, showing an indebtedness on the part of appellant to the respondent in the sum of $421.45, appears to be unquestioned. There is nothing in the record from which the inference can be drawn that the respondent had any knowledge of the source, or sources, from which the money came used by Mrs. Devine in making payments. The record is also silent as to whether the respondent had any knowledge of whether Mrs. Devine was authorized to direct the application that should be made of the respective payments. The money paid by Mrs. Devine was applied to the accounts as she directed, and her account, which at one time amounted to $367, was all paid and discharged, save and except the sum of $23.25, for which judgment was had against her.

[1] Findings were waived, and hence every legitimate conclusion which can be drawn from the evidence must be resolved in favor of the support of the judgment. The evidence of the witnesses Reeves and Mrs. Devine is so uncertain that no conclusion could really be drawn as to the value of the lumber delivered to Reeves at Broderick and charged to her account, but from the testimony of the witness Shepard, an officer of the plaintiff corporation, it would appear that the value of the lumber delivered to Reeves and charged to the account of Mrs. Devine was about the sum of $128.59. But whatever the value of the lumber delivered to Reeves and charged to the account of Mrs. Devine may have been, there is plenty of evidence, if believed by the trial court to show that Mrs. Devine ordered the amount thereof charged to her account. There is also testimony to show that Mrs. Devine collected all the rents from whatever source they came, attended to all payments made to the lumber company, directed the application to be made of such payments; that statements of account were rendered from time to time by the lumber company to appellant, and also to Mrs. Devine, showing the status of their respective accounts. There is also sufficient testimony to lead the trial court to the conclusion that the appellant authorized his wife to make collections and attend to all payments, his own testimony being that he thought he had given his wife plenty of money to pay "any bill." There is no testimony, however, which shows that the appellant specifically directed the application of any payment to be applied to the account of Mrs. Devine. Such authorization, if any, could only be inferred from the course of the dealing of the parties herein, and the manner in which the business was transacted. The ledger sheet exhibiting the account of Mrs. Devine shows that she purchased lumber to the value of $367, of which sum only the value of the lumber sent to her son is disputed by her. At the time of the institution of suit all of this account had been paid except the sum of $23.25, as heretofore stated. The money for the payment of all of Mrs. Devine's account apparently came from the same sources, and that Mrs. Devine had authority to apply the money to the payment of her account, save and except the portion thereof representing the value of the lumber delivered to her son, appears not to have been questioned in the trial court. The accounts furnished the defendants show the amount of lumber purchased. The appellant intrusted the collection of rents and making of payments wholly to his wife, who directed their application.

It is now urged that the payments made by Mrs. Devine on her own account were unauthorized, and that the appellant is entitled to have the amount of such payments credited as an offset on the plaintiff's claim against him, upon which this suit is based.

[2] Appellant relies for reversal on the following cases to wit: Baker v. Witten, 1 Okl. 160, 30 Pac. 491; Puget Sound Lumber Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 243, 26 Pac. 902; National Fire Insurance Co. v. Wagley (Tex. Civ. App.) 68 S. W. 819; and Nilson v. Sarment, 153 Cal. 531, 96 Pac. 315, 126 Am. St. Rep. 91. The holding of these cases is substantially that, unless the wife is acting as her husband's agent, she has no authority to make any contract in his name, or to dispose of his property, save and except purchases for necessaries when not supplied by him. In the Witten Case, the wife had employed a physician to care for a man wounded by her son, the issue of a former marriage. The husband was held not liable. In the Lumber Company Case, lumber had been purchased by the husband which went into the repair of property belonging to the wife. While the same rule is announced in that case, the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient evidence upon which the lower court might have concluded that the husband was authorized to make the purchase. In the Sarment Case, the court held that the husband was not estopped to assert the community character of certain property by reason of any statement made by the wife. To the same effect was the ruling in the Wagley Case.

[3] It is not sought, however, in this case to charge the husband with liability on account of contracts made by his wife. The authorities cited by appellant undoubtedly state the law, but the application of the principles involved is different in the questions now presented for our consideration. The evidence is sufficient to justify the trial court in the conclusion that the appellant owed the respondent the amount of the judgment rendered against him on his own account. This account was not created by any act of his wife. Had this been true, the cases cited would be decisive in appellant's favor. It is alleged wrong application of money furnished the wife, bearing no earmarks of ownership, that is really in question.

In 21 Ruling Case Law, page 913, we find this answer to that question:

> "A person who knowingly receives the money or property of a principal from an agent in payment of the latter's debt does so at his peril; and, if the agent acted without authority, the principal on proof of these facts is entitled to recover. Story states the rule as follows: 'A person dealing with a factor or broker is bound to know that by law a factor or broker, although a general agent, is not clothed with authority to pledge, deposit, or transfer the property of his principal for his own debt; and, if he receives such a deposit or pledge, the title is invalid, and the property may be reclaimed by the principal. However, in order to make one liable by reason of participation in misuse of money for the principal by an agent, upon the ground that it was used to pay the private debt of the agent, it is necessary to show, not only that the party sought to be charged was aware that the money belonged to the principal, but also that he was aware that the debt paid by it was in fact a private debt of the agent, or such a debt that payment thereof could not lawfully be made out of such money.' "

2 C. J. § 578, states the rule in this language:

> "Where, in violation of his duty, an agent, makes a payment or appropriation of his principal's money to a third person, the principal may recover of the third person the money so misapplied, unless the third person is a bona fide holder for value and without notice."

A number of cases are there cited to the effect that knowledge is necessary on the part of the third party in order to charge him with liability.

In Perry v. Oerman (63 W. Va. 566, 60 S. E. 604, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 310) 129 Am. St. Rep. 1020, the court states the law in this manner:

> "To make one liable by reason of participation in misuse of money of the principal by an agent, upon the ground that it was used to pay the private debt of the agent, it is necessary to show, not only that the party sought to be charged was aware that the money belonged to the principal, but also that he was aware that the debt paid by it was in fact a private debt of the agent, or such a debt that payment thereof could not lawfully be made out of such money."

The Supreme Court of New York, in Newhall v. Wyatt, 139 N. Y. 452, 34 N. E. 1045, 36 Am. St. Rep. 712, holds substantially the same, and uses this language:

> "The payment of money to a creditor who receives it in discharge of an existing debt innocently and without knowledge, or means of knowledge, that the debtor had no rightful ownership in the funds received, is good and effectual, and does not subject the creditor to a recovery by the true owner of such funds."

In Porter v. Roseman, 165 Ind. 255, 74 N. E. 1105, 112 Am. St. Rep. 222, 6 Ann. Cas. 718, a contrary rule appears to have been adopted. It is there held that if an agent applies money of his principal to the payment of the agent's debt, the creditor receiving such money acquires no title thereto, though, when receiving it, he does not know it is not the money of his debtor.

An examination of the cases upon which this rule is based would lead to the conclusion that the circumstances surrounding the several cases were sufficient to put the creditor upon inquiry or notice.

[4] In several of the cases having to do with the conversion of personal property which can be readily identified, general language has been used which would cover the misapplication of money; but where the distinction has been clearly drawn, the weight of authority supports the rule announced in Ruling Case Law, in Corpus Juris, and by the Supreme Court of the state of New York.

The testimony of the appellant clearly shows that Mrs. Devine was acting with his knowledge and permission in collecting the rents and paying the bills, and is sufficient to show that the wife was acting as appellant's agent in this capacity, and whether there is sufficient evidence to justify a conclusion by the trial court that Mrs. Devine was authorized to make the specific application of the moneys collected by her to the payment of her own account, which included the items for lumber delivered to her son, is immaterial. There being no evidence to show that the respondent acted in other than a bona fide manner when it received payments and applied the same to the account of Mrs. Devine as directed by her, we must, under the authority of the cases heretofore cited, hold that the appellant is not entitled to have such payments now credited on his account with respondent.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

ARSENIO v. SMITH. (Civ. 2191.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 25, 1920.)

1. Evidence 🔑466—Admissible to show written contract supplanted by another.

Although oral evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract, it is admissible to show that such contract has been mutually abandoned and supplanted by a new and different agreement.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Cause not reversed for defect in pleading not prejudicial.

Where an answer in an action to recover for hay sold was defective in not specifically averring rejection of the hay and mutual abandonment of the written contract, yet such could be deduced from its allegations and the case was tried upon that theory, substantial justice being done, the case will not be reversed for such defect, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 475, prohibiting reversal for nonprejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by F. S. Arsenio against Frank V. Smith. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

K. Van Zante, of Hanford, for appellant.
J. L. C. Irwin, of Hanford, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The appellant sues the respondent to recover $2,037 claimed as a balance due upon a sale of 223 tons of hay at an agreed price of $18 per ton. It is averred and admitted that the hay was delivered to respondent. The respondent in his answer, among other things, admits and avers:

> "That said plaintiff agreed that said hay would be well baled and cured and in good merchantable condition when delivered to defendant. That thereafter * * * the said plaintiff did deliver to the defendant 223 tons of barley and alfalfa hay at El Rico Station, in Kings county, Cal., but that a great portion of said hay was damaged and not in good merchantable condition, and that thereupon the said plaintiff and defendant agreed that said defendant should sell said hay at the best price that he could obtain for the same, and that the said defendant would pay to the plaintiff for said hay the amount that he, the defendant, received for said hay, less $2 per ton, which said plaintiff then and there agreed to pay to the defendant as a commission for handling and selling said hay."

There is no claim that the defendant has failed to live up to the terms of this oral contract.

[1, 2] The answer is somewhat defective in not specifically averring a rejection of the hay by the respondent and of the mutual abandonment thereupon of the written contract. However, the appellant makes no point as to the sufficiency of the answer. Furthermore, it may reasonably be deduced from its allegations that the hay was rejected by the respondent, and that thereupon the parties mutually abandoned the written contract and entered into the oral one. The case throughout was clearly tried upon this theory, and the findings set out all the facts with skillful detail. But even if the answer were slightly defective, the case should not be reversed therefor. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.

It is not controverted that the hay was damaged and that the respondent immediately notified the appellant thereof. The court found that the parties thereupon mutually abandoned the original contract and entered into the oral contract set out in the answer. The evidence abundantly sustains the findings and judgment. The evidence shows that the appellant himself actually sold some of this hay to third parties.

The appellant makes the point that oral evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract. This contention is thus far sound, but there was no attempt to vary the terms of a written contract. The contract was mutually abandoned, and upon its abandonment it ceased any longer to be a contract between the parties. Thereupon the parties entered into a new contract and proceeded at once to carry it into execution.

The appellant was entitled to rescind the original contract, but after it had been mutually abandoned there remained nothing to rescind. The position of the lower court is fully sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 634, 30 Pac. 787, wherein the court says:

> "The evidence offered did not purport to vary or contradict the terms of the written instrument set forth in the complaint, nor did it have the effect of adding any new term to that agreement. Its purpose was to show that that agreement had been canceled by mutual consent, and had no longer any operative effect. Such evidence is as admissible as is oral testimony that the terms of a written agreement have been fully performed by the parties, or that the instrument evidencing such agreement has itself been canceled and destroyed by the concurrent act of both parties. In either case the object and effect of such evidence is not to change any of the terms of the contract, but to show that the contract has no longer any existence, and therefore cannot be made the basis of an action."

As we construe the written contract offered in evidence, it constitutes an agreement to sell, with a warranty that the property would measure up to a given standard. Notwithstanding some minor defects in the answer, we believe, upon an examination of the whole case, including the evidence, that substantial justice has been done, and that no adequate reason exists for sending the case back for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

WATERFORD IRR. DIST. v. TURLOCK IRR. DIST. et al. (Civ. 2195.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1920.)

1. Tenancy in common 🔑41—One tenant cannot create easement against cotenant.

One joint owner or tenant in common cannot create an easement in the common estate against his cotenant.

2. Tenancy in common 🔑43—One tenant cannot sell the common property.

A tenant in common has the right to dispose of his own undivided share, but he cannot sell the whole property, or any portion thereof, and bind his co-owners by such sale.

3. Tenancy in common 🔑50—One tenant can license another to use property as he might use it.

One tenant in common may, either by lease or license, confer upon another person the right to occupy and use the property as fully as the lessor or licensor himself might have used or occupied it.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No Series—Licensee of joint owner of the diversion dam can require other owner to adjust gates without extra compensation.

Where two irrigation districts jointly constructed and owned a diversion dam, and one of them licensed a third district to transport water through its canal, the licensee can compel the other joint owner of the dam to make the necessary adjustments to its gates, which controlled the flow of water, so as to send the additional flow into the other owner's canal, since that is a burden which the other owner could have imposed if it had desired to divert the additional flow.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑140—Policy requires water to be used, though it imposes reasonable inconveniences on prior users.

It is the policy of the state that all its water resources be applied to beneficial use, and to that end a subsequent appropriator may make use thereof, though in doing so some inconvenience or expense, not exceeding a reasonable amount, is thereby imposed upon prior users.

6. Eminent domain 🔑126(3)—Compensation for right to divert water at dam is value of use of dam.

In proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 5, authorizing condemnation by an irrigation district under certain conditions of property appropriated to a public use by another irrigation district, to condemn the right to use a dam of another irrigation district for diversion of water, the measure of compensation would be the use value of the dam, since only the use of the dam was taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by the Waterford Irrigation District against the Turlock Irrigation District and others to restrain defendants from interfering with a certain water flow claimed by plaintiff. From a judgment granting the injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. H. Griffen, of Modesto, for appellants.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by appellants from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff enjoining the defendants from interfering with the flow of 60 second feet of water from the Tuolumne river into the canal of the Modesto irrigation district and to restrain them from interfering in any way with the diversion of said water by plaintiff, the said 60 second feet of water having been acquired by the plaintiff from the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, a corporation, under a contract dated January 14, 1919.

The respondent has incorporated into its brief the written opinion of the Hon. G. W. Nicol, sitting as a judge in the trial in the county of Stanislaus, in deciding the case. Said opinion contains an accurate statement in substance of the general facts as they were, upon what we regard as sufficient evidence, found by the court and also a statement and a correct application of the principles of law pertinent to the issues as made by the pleadings and developed by the evidence. We, therefore, approve and adopt said opinion as part of the opinion herein of this court. The opinion referred to is as follows:

"The facts material to the question involved in this case may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff and the Turlock irrigation district are both irrigation districts organized and existing under and by virtue of the California Irrigation District Act. The defendant Turlock irrigation district and the Modesto irrigation district are the owners as tenants in common of a certain dam across the Tuolumne river a short distance above the town of La Grange, and commonly called the La Grange dam.

"This dam was constructed by these two districts under a contract between them of date August 9, 1890. The dam was constructed at their join expense, and is jointly owned by them in common. The Turlock district contains about 176,510 acres of land and the Modesto district 81,183 acres. The water to irrigate these lands is diverted by means of this dam into the canals of the districts. The Turlock canal is on the south side of the river and the Modesto canal is on the north side, and each of the said districts is the exclusive owner of its own canal, diverting water from the said dam.

"It appears from the evidence that until the water in the river falls to about 500 second feet the Modesto outlet, owing to its situation, controls the flow, but after the water falls below five hundred second feet the Turlock gates then control the flow of the water.

"The plaintiff, the Waterford irrigation district, in order to irrigate the lands contained within its boundaries, diverts the water from the Tuolumne river at the said La Grange dam, through the canal of the Modesto irrigation district. The plaintiff has acquired the right to divert the natural flow of said river water for the purposes of irrigation. This right is based upon an appropriation made in 1913, and is subsequent to and subject to the rights of the Modesto and Turlock irrigation districts.

"In 1916, the plaintiff and the Modesto irrigation district entered into a contract by which the plaintiff paid to the Modesto district $254,000, and in consideration thereof the Modesto district agreed to enlarge its diverting canal, from the La Grange dam to certain points specified in the agreement, so that the canal would carry at least 250 second feet of water for plaintiff in addition to the water required by the Modesto irrigation district, and by this agreement the said Modesto irrigation district agrees to carry through its said canal to the said Waterford irrigation district the water that it is entitled to, not exceeding 250 cubic feet per second. In pursuance of this agreement the Modesto district did enlarge its canal, and did carry the waters to plaintiff, as therein provided.

"As before stated, the rights that the plaintiff acquired by appropriation are subsequent and subject to the prior rights of the Turlock and Modesto irrigation districts. During the season of 1919, the Modesto district carried and delivered to the plaintiff water, until in the month of June, when the natural flow of the river fell to such a point that it was not sufficient to supply the claims of the Modesto and Turlock districts, and they were taking all the water then flowing in the river.

"The Sierra & San Francisco Power Company is the owner of a certain water right and diverting system commonly known as the La Grange water right and system, by which there is diverted from the Tuolumne river, at a point known as Indian bar, 66 cubic feet of water per second. This point of diversion is 13 or 14 miles above the La Grange dam, and the right to this 66 second feet is prior in time to any of the water rights of the said irrigation districts.

"In January, 1919, the plaintiff purchased from the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company the right to all of said water for the period of six months, commencing on the 1st day of May and extending to the 31st day of October in each year, less the amount of water that the company is now furnishing to the town of La Grange, and for certain other purposes, which excepted amounts of water shall not exceed in the aggregate 6 cubic feet per second. Under the contract with the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company the period during which the six months' use of the said water shall run is variable, and may, at the option of the Waterford irrigation district, begin on April 1st, or the 15th day of April, or the 15th day of May, or the last day of June of any year; said period of use to continue for six consecutive months from the date of commencement as designated.

"In accordance with the agreement, the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company was, in June, 1919, notified to turn into the Tuolumne river for the plaintiff 60 second feet of water, and plaintiff also notified the Turlock and Modesto districts thereof. The Turlock district immediately notified the plaintiff and the Modesto district that it would not permit the water to be delivered to the Waterford irrigation district through, or by means of, the La Grange dam without compensation being first paid to the Turlock irrigation district. Upon receiving this notice the plaintiff commenced this action to restrain the Turlock district from interfering with the flow of the said 60 second feet of water into the Modesto canal for the use of plaintiff.

[1-3] As before stated, the La Grange dam was built by the Modesto and Turlock districts, and is owned and held by them as tenants in common. The law is well settled that one joint owner or tenant in common cannot create an easement in the common estate against his cotenant. Pfeiffer v. Regents of University, 74 Cal. 156, 15 Pac. 622. In Southern Inv. Co. v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 156 N. C. 259, 72 S. E. 361, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 224, it was held that when a telegraph company and a railroad company having become tenants in common for a period of years of poles along the railroad right of way for the purpose of a telegraph system, to serve both the public and the railroad, the telegraph company could not, in the absence of specific provision in their contract conferring the power, and without permission of its cotenant, the railroad company, give a telephone company the right to place wires thereon for telephone purposes; that the telegraph company had no right to grant to another, in furtherance of a disconnected and separate business, the privilege of affixing two telephone wires to these poles, and of imposing this additional burden upon the owners. Palmer v. Palmer, 150 N. Y. 139, 44 N. E. 966, 55 Am. St. Rep. 653, Charleston, etc., R. R. Co. v. Leech, 33 S. C. 175, 11 S. E. 631, 26 Am. St. Rep. 667. A tenant in common of property has the right to dispose of its own undivided share, but such owner cannot sell the whole property, nor any portion thereof, except his own; and if he undertakes to dispose of any larger interest his co-owners are not bound thereby. Tuttle v. Campbell, 74 Mich. 652, 42 N. W. 384, 16 Am. St. Rep. 652. One tenant in common may, by either lease or license, confer upon another person the right to occupy and use the property of the cotenancy as fully as such lessor or licensor himself might have used or occupied it, if such lease or license had not been granted. Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong & Co., 91 Cal. 593, 598, 28 Pac. 45.

[4] "The contract between the Waterford and Modesto irrigation districts gives to the plaintiff a right to the use of the Modesto canal for the purpose of conveying water as therein provided, and this grant of a right to the use of said canal to convey water necessarily carries with it a right to the use of the La Grange dam, as the said dam is but an incident to the canal in the diversion of water from the Tuolumne river. This contract in no manner attempts to grant to the Waterford irrigation district any right or privilege to use the dam for any other purpose than that to which it had theretofore been used by its owners. This contract does not interfere with the full use of the dam by the Turlock irrigation district, nor does it place upon it any additional burden.

"The fact that the plaintiff diverts this 60 second feet of water at the La Grange dam, and conveys the same through the Modesto canal, and that, owing to the low state of the water in the river during the end of the dry season, the Turlock district has to adjust its gates, so as to allow this water to enter the Modesto canal, casts no more of a burden on the Turlock irrigation district than would have been cast upon it if the plaintiff had no contract with the Modesto district, but diverted its waters below the dam. Assuming that the plaintiff had no agreement with the Modesto district, and had its own separate independent canal, which diverted the water from the river, below the La Grange dam, then the Turlock irrigation district would be required to adjust its gates, so as to allow this 60 second feet of water to flow down the stream to the plaintiff, and in my opinion the fact that the plaintiff, under a contract, is using the Modesto canal to carry this water, does not render the case any different from what it would be if the plaintiff's point of diversion was below the La Grange dam. Or suppose that the Modesto irrigation district had purchased this water from the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, instead of the plaintiff, and suppose that there was no contract between the Modesto and Turlock districts as to their respective interests in any after-acquired water rights, could it be claimed that the Modesto irrigation district would not in that case be entitled to have the gates of the Turlock district so adjusted as to allow this water to flow into the Modesto canal? That it would be entitled to have the gates so adjusted I think there can be no question, and equally clear to my mind is the right of the grantee to have this water flow into the said Modesto canal."

There is nothing to be added to what is said in the above opinion of the learned trial judge. It disposes of the points in the case correctly. The reasoning by which the conclusion is reached is sound. These further observations, however, may, with no impropriety, be suggested: That it does not appear from the evidence that the water rights of the Turlock district have been or will be interfered with or in the least impaired by the arrangement entered into between the Waterford and the Modesto districts. Indeed, there is no claim made by the appellant that such a result has followed, or will ensue from the use of the Modesto district's canal to carry the plaintiff's 60 second feet of water to it. To the contrary, the written notice to the Waterford district and the Modesto district, protesting against the carrying out of the agreement between the two last-named districts, is based entirely upon the proposition that the Turlock district is entitled to be compensated for the use of the La Grange dam by the plaintiff, stating that it objects to the use of the dam for the purpose of diverting the water of plaintiff, and so delivering said water to it, unless satisfactory arrangements for compensation therefor to the defendant were made. Moreover, the record discloses that, if any burden growing out of the agreement between the plaintiff and the Modesto district has at all been imposed upon the Turlock, it is a "burden" which merely involves a little extra inconvenience and some extra expense due to the necessity for a more frequent regulation or adjustment of the radial gates whereby the water is diverted into the Turlock's canal. But as to this there appears to be such a conflict in the testimony as to render immune from successful attack the court's finding that no such burden is added to the Turlock district by the act of the Modesto district in allowing the 60 second feet of water belonging to the plaintiff to flow to the latter through the Modesto canal. But, after all, the fact is, as the court below has found, and as is shown in the written opinion, there is nothing in the agreement between the plaintiff and the Modesto district which authorizes a greater use of the La Grange dam than that to which the Modesto could itself have put it. It is not denied but that the Modesto district, under the terms of the agreement whereby it and the Turlock district became joint owners or owners in common of the La Grange dam, might have enlarged its own canal for its own individual purposes, and thus have put said dam to a greater or more extensive use for its own purposes than it in the first instance had done or had occasion to do. If the Modesto district could do this, then why may it not transfer the right to do the same thing as to others? See Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, §§ 251, 253, and Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong & Co., 91 Cal. 593, 598, 28 Pac. 45, wherein an affirmative answer to the question may be found. If, therefore, it be true that the Turlock district has suffered some inconvenience and extra expense from the arrangement between the plaintiff and the Modesto district, it is only the inconvenience and the extra expense which are incident to the contract between itself and the Modesto district. As the court below said, in deciding the case, no such added burden is placed upon the Turlock district because of the agreement between the plaintiff and the Modesto district as that the full and convenient use of the dam by the Turlock district is in the slightest degree interfered with. Of course, the Modesto district could transfer no more than its interest or moiety in the cotenancy, nor, as has been already stated herein, would the transfer or grant of the easement or right to use the dam stand if by reason thereof there was a substantial or material interference with or impairment of the rights of the Turlock district in the cotenancy.

[5, 6] It may further be added that the policy of the state with respect to the waters flowing in nonnavigable streams, or even in navigable streams where the use of the waters thereof for purposes other than for navigation may be had without material interference with the navigability of such streams, is that such waters shall be so utilized as to produce the greatest amount of good to the industries of the state that they are capable of. It is, of course, an obvious proposition that the development of the state's resources—its agricultural, horticultural, stock-raising, power and other like industries—depends largely upon the fullest use of the water supply of the state. As an essential corollary of this proposition, it is against the policy of the state to permit any waste by an appropriator of the waters flowing in the rivers, creeks, and sloughs. Every person owning a water right must use it for a beneficial purpose, and where there are two or more owners of water rights in the same stream, the one must so use his right as not to interfere materially with that of the other, the matter of superiority of right in one by reason of priority of appropriation being, of course, considered. In other words, one of two owners of water right in the same stream will not be permitted so to use his right as to prevent the other from using his, for in such case there would in practical effect be a waste of the waters of the stream, and this it is against the policy of this state to allow. The mere inconvenience, or even the matter of extra expense, within limits which are not unreasonable, to which a prior user may be subjected, will not avail to prevent a subsequent appropriator from utilizing his right. There must be a substantial, as distinguished from a mere technical or abstract, damage to the right of the prior appropriator by the exercise by the subsequent appropriator of his right to entitle the former to relief against any attempt of the latter to utilize his right. And the Legislature, doubtless, having this proposition in view, and also to the end that there shall be no waste of the waters of the public streams of the state by reason of any impracticability or perhaps any impossibility of using such waters by two or more appropriators where each attempts to use the same independently of each other, has provided for the condemnation by an irrigation district, subject to certain specified conditions or qualifications, of property appropriated to a public use by another irrigation district. Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 5. If, it may also be observed, this case were determinable by the principles governing in cases in which the power of eminent domain is invoked, it is clear that upon the evidence presented here, and much less upon the findings, the defendants would not be entitled to more than nominal damages, or perhaps such damages only as might justly compensate them for the taking of the use of the dam, there being no taking of the property or the dam itself or severance, and the measure of damages in condemnation being the value of the property and the detriment suffered from severance of the property taken from that not taken. Code Civ. Proc. § 1248; Salt Lake City v. East Jordan Irr. Co., 40 Utah, 126, 121 Pac. 592. Of course, these latter observations are not strictly germane or necessary to the decision herein, but they are suggested for the purpose only of emphasizing the proposition, above stated, that in a case of this kind, where one of several tenants in common of property necessary to be employed to further the exercise of several water rights separately owned by such tenants grants or transfers to a third party the right to use such property for the purpose of facilitating the use of water to which he is entitled from the same stream, the other tenant must show that he has by reason of the arrangement between his cotenant and such third party, suffered more than a mere trifling inconvenience and expense to warrant the nullification of the arrangement or agreement so made, and that the proposition so stated harmonizes with the policy of the state that none of the waters of its streams, available for the purposes of a beneficial use, shall be wasted or not used, but shall be employed to the fullest extent, and in no way impinges upon the rule that one joint tenant or tenant in common may not burden the tenancy with an easement or servitude of any kind.

For the reasons stated in the written opinion of the trial judge, the judgment is affirmed.

QUINN v. RIKE et al. (Civ. 3624.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes 🔑294—Intent to become liable as indorser expressed in transfer.

Defendant payee of a note negotiable in form, but nonnegotiable because secured by deed of trust to a trust company, transferred it for valuable consideration, the transfer being by writing on the back reading that for value received it transferred and assigned to plaintiff all its right, title, and interest in and to the within note, together with all rights under the deed of trust securing it, so far as it related to the note, and waived presentment, demand, and notice of protest. Held, that defendant's intent to become liable as indorser was clearly expressed.

Error in the admission of evidence was harmless where with or without it no other judgment could have been rendered than that which was rendered in fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by J. E. Quinn against N. C. Rike and the Ceres Land Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter E. Burke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles J. Kelly and D. A. Stuart, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought against defendant Rike as a maker and the defendant Ceres Land Company as indorser upon a promissory note.

There is no dispute as to the facts: In January, 1916, the defendant N. C. Rike executed and delivered to her codefendant, Ceres Land Company, a promissory note, negotiable in form, in the sum of $2,000. For the purpose of securing payment of the same she made and executed a deed of trust to a certain title insurance and trust company.

The note was therefore nonnegotiable. Metropolis Trust & Sav. Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 Pac. 265. At the time of the execution of the note here sued upon the land and premises described in the deed of trust was subject to a prior incumbrance of $11,000. Thereafter, and before the maturity of the note here involved, the Ceres Land Company, for a valuable consideration, transferred the note to plaintiff, J. E. Quinn, which was evidenced by a writing on the back thereof, in the following language:

> "Los Angeles, Cal., March 15, 1918.
> "For value received I hereby transfer and assign to J. E. Quinn all my right, title, and interest in and to the within note, together with all rights accrued to or to accrue under the deed of trust securing the same so far as the same relates to this note, and hereby waive presentment, demand, and notice of protest.
> "Ceres Land Company,
> "By G. C. Harbolt, President."

Subsequent to this transfer the first incumbrance upon the premises described in the deed of trust was foreclosed, and by reason thereof the security of the note here involved became valueless. Plaintiff thereupon brought this action and recovered judgment against the Ceres Land Company as an indorser, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

Defendant company contended at the trial, and does here, that the indorsement by it was one without recourse upon which no liability as indorser attached. We are cited to the case of Hammond Lumber Co. v. Kearsley, 36 Cal. App. 431, 172 Pac. 404, as supporting this position. It was there held in substance that, in view of section 3118 of the Civil Code, the assignment by the payee of a promissory note of all his interest in the note is a qualified indorsement, and upon the maker's default such payee is not liable as an indorser. The facts there involved, however, differ materially from those of the instant case. There the indorsement did not contain any words indicating a contingent liability. By the use of the words in the assignment, or their equivalent, excusing presentment, demand, and notice, there is an implied intent to become liable as an indorser (First Nat. Bank v. Falkenhan, 94 Cal. 141, 145, 29 Pac. 866); and where such intent appears the liability of indorser follows (7 Cyc. [1st Ed.] pp. 826, 827).

Appellant contends, however, that as demand, presentment and notice of protest is not necessary to bind the indorser of a nonnegotiable instrument, such words must be treated as immaterial and surplusage. This could not be done without making a new contract for the parties, an act we have no power to do.

[1] We conclude, therefore, that notwithstanding the apparent assignment by defendant company of all its interest in the note, its intent to become liable as an indorser is clearly expressed by the use of the language employed. See Haber v. Brown, 101 Cal. 445, 35 Pac. 1035.

Appellant complains of prejudicial admission of evidence by the trial court.

[2] There was offered by the plaintiff and received by the court in evidence testimony showing that plaintiff was reluctant to acquire the note on account of the superior lien with which the property given as security therefor was burdened, and only did so upon the assurance by the president of the defendant company that it was good by reason of the defendant's indorsement. This evidence was admitted for the reason that in the opinion of the trial court there was an ambiguity and uncertainty concerning the indorsement upon which parol testimony was admissible to explain. A discussion of this question is unnecessary, for, even assuming that its admission constituted error, it was harmless, for with or without it no other judgment could have been rendered. The assignment speaks for itself.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, Justice pro tem.

49 Cal. App. 775

MURDOCK v. MURDOCK. (Civ. 2116.)

1. Gifts 🔑41—May be rescinded by court of equity for fraud.

A gift under Civ. Code, § 1146, like any other transaction purporting to involve the conveyance of property or the fixing of contractual obligations between parties, may be set aside by a court of equity upon a sufficient showing that it was procured through or by means of the fraud of the donee, notwithstanding section 1148, providing that a gift inter vivos is not revocable.

2. Husband and wife 🔑52—Gift of money will be set aside in equity where obtained through fraud.

Where wife in consideration of love and affection transferred to her husband a half interest in money owing her solely by reason of the husband's false representation that he had always been and would always be true to her, a court of equity will set aside such transfer or gift under Civ. Code, §§ 1572, 1667, 1708, 1709, 2224, 3523, in view of section 158.

3. Husband and wife 🔑52—Gifts set aside in equity, where donee has been untrue.

Even where there have been no false representations or promises by a spouse that marital obligations have always been and would always be faithfully kept, property which has been given to such spouse by the other spouse will be restored to the donor upon discovery by the latter that the donee has been before or after the gift guilty of maintaining meretricious relations with a third party.

4. Husband and wife ⚷52—No laches in waiting month after notice of fraud before action to set aside gift.

Wife, who filed complaint to set aside a gift to her husband by reason of infidelity a trifle over a month after her discovery of the misconduct of the husband, was not guilty of laches.

5. Appeal and error ⚷173(10)—Question of laches not considered on appeal where not alleged in answer.

Where answer did not plead laches as a defense to maintenance of an action and such question was not reviewed by the trial court, it cannot for the first time be raised on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

6. Appeal and error ⚷907(3)—All presumptions to be indulged favorably to judgment on appeal supported by judgment roll only.

In considering an appeal supported by the judgment roll only, all presumptions and intendments are to be indulged favorably to and in support of the judgment, and it must be presumed that there was evidence sufficient to support the findings or the verdict, and that whatever might have properly occurred at the trial to cure defects of the complaint in any vital particular did actually occur.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Edith de Barros Murdock against Fletcher W. Murdock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve and Ingall W. Bull, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. T. Morrow, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal from a decree in favor of the plaintiff rescinding and setting aside, on the grounds of misrepresentation and fraud, a certain instrument in writing executed by the plaintiff to the defendant, and is upon the judgment roll alone.

The complaint is of considerable length, but it will subserve the purpose of this decision to present the averments herein in substance. It may here properly be stated that the court's findings are in all vital particuars in strict accord with the allegations of the complaint, and therefore, while we shall state the facts herein as they are set out in the complaint, it will be understood that such statement will embrace substantially the facts as they were found by the court.

The plaintiff and the defendant are, and at all times mentioned in the complaint were, husband and wife. On or about the 16th day of July, 1916, and for a long time prior thereto, the plaintiff was the sole owner, in her separate right, of approximately 160 contos, Brazilian currency, which is equal approximately to $37,500 in the coin of the United States of America, the same being then and thereafter on deposit with and held by Queiros-Barros & Co., a copartnership, at 63 Travessa, Caiuby, Santos, Brazil, subject to the order of plaintiff and any other person or persons claiming under her. On or about the said 16th day of July, 1916, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant an instrument in writing of which the following is a copy:

"Whereas, the concern known as Queiros-Barros & Company, and whose principal office and place of business is at 63 Travessa, Caiuby, Santos, Brazil, is indebted to me in the sum of approximately one hundred and sixty (160) contos, Brazilian currency, and whereas, it is my desire and intention to assign, transfer, set over and give to my said husband one-half of the amount or debt due me as aforesaid, whatever such amount may be: Now, therefore, in consideration of the love and affection which I bear my said husband, Fletcher W. Murdock, and of one dollar ($1.00) and of other good and valuable consideration, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby sell, assign, transfer and give to my said husband, Fletcher W. Murdock, an undivided one-half of all my right, title and interest in and to the debt or amount so due and owing to me from the concern known as Queiros-Barros & Company, hereinabove mentioned, to be held, owned and enjoyed by him as his separate property. In witness whereof, I have hereunto affixed my hand and seal this 17th day of July, 1916."

At the time that the foregoing instrument was executed, the plaintiff also executed a writing whereby she appointed the defendant her attorney in fact, with power, among other things, to collect and receive moneys from said fund, or the whole thereof, of approximately 160 contos.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was, on or about the said 16th day of July, 1916, preparing to depart and "had arranged to make, and was about to depart from this country, without the company of defendant, upon a voyage and trip to Brazil to visit her parents in the latter country," and that it was at that time and with the knowledge of such contemplated departure of plaintiff that the defendant earnestly and persistently solicited and requested the plaintiff to execute each of the above-mentioned instruments in writing, in consideration of the love and affection of plaintiff for defendant, etc., and upon the repeated representation and protestation of the defendant to the plaintiff that he was, had always been, during their married life, and would always in the future continue to be, during their married life, a true, faithful, loyal, and loving husband to the plaintiff; and upon the further representation by defendant to plaintiff that he had never had, previously to said 16th day of July, 1916, nor would he in the future, sustain, during their married life, sexual relations with any other woman than the plaintiff, but would, as he always had, remain "an honest, true, loving, loyal and faithful husband" to plaintiff.

It is alleged that defendant, at the time he made said representations and promises, upon the faith of which the plaintiff was induced to execute the writings above mentioned, knew that the said representations, statements, and promises so made to plaintiff were and each of them was false and untrue, and were made with the purpose and intent to defraud plaintiff and to induce her to assign to defendant one-half of the money referred to in the complaint and the instrument above quoted herein; that plaintiff, at the time said representations and promises were made and at the time she executed the instruments referred to above, did not know that the same were false and untrue, and would not have executed said instruments or assigned to defendant any portion of her said money had she not believed and relied on each and all said statements, representations, and promises; that defendant, "on or about said July 16, 1916, was 45 years of age and was an experienced and able man of wide and varied business ability, and at said time last mentioned plaintiff was of the age of 28 years and wholly inexperienced in business affairs and at said time last mentioned, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff relied upon and trusted, and had great confidence in and affection for, the defendant, and plaintiff had acted, and did act, at and under his guidance and direction in the conduct of her affairs, all of which things at all of said times defendant well knew; that by reason of each of the aforesaid false representations and statements and promises of defendant and her said trust, confidence, and belief in him as aforesaid, and not otherwise, plaintiff executed said instrument of assignment and power of attorney hereinabove alleged."

It is charged that, on divers occasions prior to the 16th day of July, 1916, to wit, in the month of December, 1913, and while the relation of husband and wife subsisted between plaintiff and defendant, the latter, without the knowledge or consent of the former, at certain stated places, had and sustained meretricious relations with a woman other than the plaintiff, and committed acts of adultery with said woman; that in the months of August and September, 1917, the defendant on several occasions committed acts of adultery with a certain named woman (other than plaintiff) whose name it is not necessary to disclose herein; that plaintiff had no knowledge or information of the acts of adultery by defendant above referred to at the time she executed the instrument above mentioned, "nor did she prior to November 5, 1917, have any knowledge or information concerning said adultery, or any adultery, on the part of defendant, or of any acts or act of sexual intercourse by said defendant with any person other than plaintiff during the married life of plaintiff and defendant; that immediately upon plaintiff learning, on said November 5, 1917, that defendant had committed adultery as aforesaid, plaintiff separated herself from defendant and never thereafter lived with, nor is she now living with, defendant as his wife, or otherwise, and that on November 9, 1917, plaintiff herein brought suit for divorce against said defendant upon the ground of adultery, which action is now pending in the superior court in and for Los Angeles county."

The complaint further alleges that plaintiff has always conducted herself as a "true, faithful, loyal, and loving wife to the defendant in every respect." It is alleged that plaintiff first became aware of her right to rescind the instrument purporting to assign to defendant one-half of the money therein described and of the right to revoke the power of attorney referred to above on the 12th day of December, 1917, and, accordingly, on the 18th day of December, 1917, caused to be served upon defendant personally her notice of rescission of said purported assignment and of her revocation of the said power of attorney.

The complaint also contains some allegations to the effect that defendant had drawn certain sums of the money assigned to him by plaintiff as above indicated, and that he had invested some of said money in a certain sail boat, and the court finds that these allegations are true. The court also finds that no consideration, other than that of love and affection, passed from defendant to plaintiff for the assignment in question.

The defendant did not demur to the complaint, but filed an answer denying and admitting certain of the allegations thereof and setting up some matters in the nature of an affirmative defense.

While the appellant suggests and urges distinctively four different points upon which he claims to be entitled to a reversal of the judgment, three of said points are in effect the same, so that there are in fact but two points to be considered, and they are these: (1) That a gift inter vivos, being a voluntary transaction and without consideration and irrevocable, is not subject to rescission or to be vitiated upon the ground that it was induced by the misrepresentation or fraud of the donee, or for any reason; (2) assuming that the transaction is one which may be, for sufficient legal or equitable reasons, rescinded and set aside, the complaint fails to disclose that the plaintiff was not guilty of inexcusable laches in proceeding to cause said transaction to be set aside or rescinded, inasmuch as it is not made to appear in the complaint why the discovery of the alleged misrepresentations or the falsity of the defendant's statements and misrepresentations could not sooner have been made; "nor," proceeds appellant's brief, "does it appear that, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, discovery could not sooner have been made, or knowledge of the falsity thereof obtained by the plaintiff."

The respondent first makes the point that the assignment in controversy did not involve a gift within the meaning of section 1146 of the Civil Code. The argument is that, since a gift is defined by said section to be "a transfer of personal property, made voluntarily and without consideration," any consideration, whether good or valuable, which supports a transfer of personal property, takes from such transfer one of the essential characteristics of a gift as it is defined by the section named; that the transfer in question was ostensibly supported by the consideration of love and affection—a good as legally distinguished from a valuable consideration—and that therefore the assignment in controversy cannot in a legal sense be denominated or held to be a gift. It is to be conceded that there seems to be much force in this position, but it is not necessary to consider the point herein, since, upon another view the judgment, we are persuaded, must be affirmed.

[1] 1. Assuming that the transfer in question was a gift within the contemplation of section 1146 of the Civil Code, we nevertheless think it is clear that such a transfer may, like any other transaction purporting to involve the conveyance of property or the fixing of contractual obligations between parties, be rescinded and set aside by a court of equity upon a sufficient showing that it was procured through or by means of the fraud of the donee.

The position of the appellant is, as we have shown, that, since a gift inter vivos is not revocable (Civ. Code, § 1148), such a transfer of personal property cannot under any conceivable circumstances be revoked either by the act of the donor himself or through the force of the remedial power of a court of equity, at the instance of the latter or that of any other person. As supporting this hypothesis, he cites, among others, the case of Stewart v. Whittemore, 3 Cal. App. 213, wherein it is said on page 217, 84 Pac. 841, 843:

> "When a man of sane mind desired to, and does, by gift dispose of that which is his own to a dear friend or relative, fully knowing his own mind, the court should uphold the disposition so made. The gift made by deceased was by a transfer and delivery of the money, made voluntarily and without consideration. It passed the title to the money, and was not revocable. Civ. Code, §§ 1146-1148."

The above language very clearly declares the obvious meaning of sections 1146 and 1148 of the Civil Code. There never could be any doubt that where one, possessed of a sound and disposing mind, transfers by gift or voluntarily, and without consideration, personal property to another, the title to the property so transferred as effectually vests in the donee as if it had been transferred for an adequate valuable consideration. What is really meant, though, by section 1148 in its declaration that a gift inter vivos, or a gift other than a donatio causa mortis, cannot be revoked by the giver is that, when a gift of personal property is once made, the title thereto immediately passes to the donee and that such title cannot be divested, disturbed or menaced capriciously or at the mere whim of the donor. If the rule were otherwise, it is not inconceivable that innocent third parties, acquiring the title of the donee to property so transferred, might be subjected to irremedial wrong and injury, and it is the policy of the law to protect and preserve the integrity of titles to property honestly and in good faith acquired. But, while this is all true, the Code section last referred to does not mean that a gift may not be set aside if it transpires that it was brought about and consummated through misrepresentations and fraud.

[2] Upon its face, the transfer in question is perfectly valid; but, as seen, the complaint alleges and the court finds that it was superinduced by the false representations of the donor to the donee, and that no consideration whatsoever passed to the donee from the donor for the transfer. And, as also shown, the complaint further alleges and the court further finds that but for the fraud and false representations practiced upon and made to the plaintiff by the defendant the former would not have executed the transfer or made the gift. If these facts be true (and on this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone the findings must be presumed to be sufficiently supported by the evidence), then upon what theory or for what possible reason may it reasonably be contended or justly declared that a court of equity is powerless to interpose the force of its remedial power to the end that the plaintiff may have restored to her, as far as it is now practicable to do so, the rights of which she has been wrongfully deprived? If, in other words, A., having been the recipient of some kindness, voluntarily conferred, of sufficient importance or magnitude to prompt him to reward voluntarily the author of the kindness with a gift of property of value, is, by the fraud or misrepresentations of B., made to believe that the latter was his benefactor in the particular matter, and so gives B. a large sum of money or other valuable personal property, is it conceivable that A., on discovering the fraud, or that it was another and not B. who performed the kindness, is wholly without a remedy to right the wrong? Independently of any consideration of the inherent remedial attributes of a court of equity with respect to fraudulent and unconscionable transactions, whereby parties are wrongfully deprived of vested rights, our own law, as declared in sections 1708, 1709, 3523, 1667 and, particularly applicable to such cases as this, section 2224, answers the questions so propounded.

The reading of the sections above named will readily demonstrate that the legislative policy of the state is to provide a remedy for every legal wrong, by whomsoever or upon or against whomsoever committed; and that either a husband or a wife between whom a transaction respecting property is had may avail himself or herself of the remedy thus provided where the one has wrongfully deprived the other of property is clearly emphasized by the terms of section 158 of the Civil Code, which, after declaring that transactions or engagements respecting property may be entered into by a husband or wife with the other, or with any other person, provides that where such transactions or engagements are between themselves they are subject "to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts." There could be no language more plainly declaring that whatever may be the precise nature of the transaction between a husband and wife respecting property—whether it involved a conveyance or a gift inter vivos of property by one to the other—such transaction must be consummated in the utmost good faith and free from the taint of fraud or from the elements of mistake or undue influence, otherwise it will be set aside. Indeed, the relation of husband and wife is, in the strictest sense, a confidential one, and hence the uniform rule is that transactions between the spouses whereby one obtains property from the other are to be closely or scrutinizingly scanned, lest there may have been in the transaction some unfair or unconscionable advantage taken by reason of the relation existing between them. There can be found no just ground for a divergence of views upon these propositions, and that they apply as well to transactions involving gifts inter vivos as to other transactions between parties is not only sound in principle, as we have above tried to show, but is sustained by the text-writers and the cases.

In his work on Contracts (9th Ed.) vol. 2, p. 768, Judge Parsons says:

> "We have had repeated occasion to remark that fraud avoids every contract, and annuls every transaction."

Again, at page 782, same volume, the same author declares:

> "The fraudulent party cannot himself aver his fraud and claim as his right any advantage resulting from it. To permit him to do so would be to contradict the plainest principles of law. No man can be permitted to found any rights upon his own wrong."

In Smith on Personal Property, § 84, the rule is thus stated:

> "When a gift is fully executed it is irrevocable as to the parties and their legal representatives, except for fraud, force, undue influence, or mental incapacity on the part of the donor." (Italics ours.)

Similarly, the rule is stated in Thornton on Gifts and Advancements, wherein it is declared in section 440 that—

> "A gift procured or brought about by fraud or undue influence is void. The fraud or illegal influence that will avoid a gift need not be sufficient to set aside a will procured in the same way."

The same author, section 113, again says:

> "If a gift is brought about by fraud or undue influence, as has been elsewhere discussed, it may be revoked by the donor or his personal representative or heirs, according to the descent of the property given."
> "When a gift is perfect by delivery and acceptance," says Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, page 440, "it is then irrevocable, unless it be prejudicial to creditors, or the donor was under a legal incapacity, or was circumvented by fraud."

In Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 529, 17 Pac. 689, 691 (7 Am. St. Rep. 189), it is said:

> "While it is not impossible that a gift between persons in such [confidential] relations may be valid, yet * * * all such transactions are constructively fraudulent, and are only to be upheld upon a showing of special circumstances" —citing Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 296.

See, also, Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 145, 31 Pac. 910.

The case of Evans v. Evans, 118 Ga. 890, 45 S. E. 612, 98 Am. St. Rep. 180, closely resembles the present case in the facts. There the wife, while carrying on adulterous relations with another party, induced her husband to transfer his property to her as a gift. In an action to set the gift aside, the husband prevailed, and on appeal the court said:

> "There seems to be no doubt that a gift made under such circumstances will be revoked at the instance of the husband on discovery of the wife's criminal conduct. * * * And for her to induce her husband to convey the property to her after she had been guilty of adultery, or in contemplation of subsequent adultery with Thrash, was such a fraud upon the husband as to entitle him to revocation of the gift on discovery of her conduct."

In Meldrum v. Meldrum, 15 Colo. 478, 24 Pac. 1083, 11 L. R. A. 65, the wife, having previously fixed upon a determination to desert and abandon her husband, prevailed upon him to give her their home, and, upon the gift being made, she ordered him from the premises. The husband sued to annul the gift on the ground of the fraud of the wife in the procurement of the premises, and was victorious at the trial. On appeal, the judgment restoring the property to the husband was sustained, the court, inter alia, saying:

> "She was false to her marital vows, and by fraud procured an unjust advantage of her husband. From such a fraud courts of equity will grant relief, either by setting aside the conveyance or by converting the offending party into a trustee of the property for the benefit of the party defrauded."

In Thomas v. Thomas, 27 Okl. 784, 109 Pac. 825, 113 Pac. 1058, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 124, 133, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 713, the husband gave certain property to his wife, in the absence of solicitation by her, but while she was sustaining sexual relations with another man, of which relations the husband was ignorant at the time he made the gift. On discovering the illicit relation between his wife and the other party, the husband instituted suit to set aside the gift and was awarded judgment, from which an appeal was unavailingly taken. In affirming the judgment, the court said:

> "In the wife's adultery the entire foundation and consideration for the gift is swept away and leaves its support void—indeed in this case the consideration was gone, the right to care, affection, confidence, or even tolerance, every basic consideration, had been destroyed and had no existence when the gift was made. These things failing, the gift failed."

[3] But there is no necessity for further multiplying authorities upon a proposition so well settled. There is, in fact, no divergence of views between counsel as to the soundness of the principles above considered in their application to proper cases. The question on which there is any controversy simply is whether gifts inter vivos come within their operation, and as to this it seems to us that the Code sections and the authorities above referred to conclusively answer the question in the affirmative. Indeed, from the authorities briefly reviewed herein, the proposition is clearly deducible (and upon principle the proposition as involving a sound legal rule would appear to be unimpeachable) that, even where there have been no false representations or promises by one of the spouses that the marital obligations have always been and would always be faithfully kept, property which has been given by one to the other will be restored to the donor upon discovery by the latter that the donee has been before or after the gift guilty of maintaining meretricious relations with a third party. In other words, the very act of unfaithfulness to the marriage vows in the particular characterizing this case itself furnishes a sufficient legal ground for vitiating the gift. In the case at bar, however, the element of actual fraud enters. The complaint and the findings and presumptively the evidence show that the defendant was by approximately twenty years the senior of the plaintiff; that he was and presumably still is a man of business experience and keen intelligence; that (inferentially, at least, from the nature of the representations and promises she exacted from her husband as a condition, if not a consideration, for the gift) she was jealous of possible attentions by him to other women, and, having been made to believe by him that he had always been and would always be during their married life true and faithful to his marital obligations, and reinforced by his persistent solicitations that she make the transfer at a time when she was contemplating a then early departure for Brazil, unaccompanied by him, she was thus moved to make the gift but that the representations he made to her of his conduct as a husband previous to the making of the gift were untrue and his promises of future faithfulness broken. Thus we have a case where a party commits acts with intent to deceive another party, or to induce the latter "to enter into the contract" (Civ. Code, § 1572), or, in the language of subdivision 4 of said section, a case where a promise has been made without any intention of performing it.

[4] 2. It must be held that under the circumstances of this case, the complaint shows that the plaintiff, in the matter of rescinding the instruments in question, and in bringing her suit to annul and set aside the gift, acted with reasonable diligence, or, to state the proposition in negative fashion, was not guilty of laches.

The complaint in this case was filed December 19, 1917, a trifle over a month after plaintiff's discovery of the misconduct of the defendant, and, while we think the plaintiff should have directly alleged therein the time at which she first discovered the betrayal by the defendant of his marriage vows and obligations, we are still of the opinion that, in the absence of a demurrer either upon general or special grounds, the complaint sufficiently discloses that she first acquired knowledge of the defendant's alleged duplicity on the 5th day of November, 1917. That pleading, it will be noted, declares that plaintiff had no knowledge or information concerning the adulterous acts therein charged against the defendant prior to the 5th day of November, 1917, and that she thereupon and immediately separated from defendant, and since has not lived with defendant as his wife; that on November 9, 1917, she instituted suit for divorce from defendant, and on the 12th day of December, 1917, having then for the first time been advised of her legal right to rescind the gift, notified defendant of such rescission. From all these averments it appears clearly enough that discovery of the alleged unfaithfulness of the defendant was made by plaintiff for the first time on the 5th day of November, 1917. Obviously, the only way discovery can be made of the existence of a fact or thing is by acquiring information or knowledge of the existence of such fact or thing, and if, where it is declared, as here, that knowledge or information has not been acquired of the existence of a fact or thing before a certain specified date, the conclusion ineluctably following from such declaration is that the knowledge or information of the existence of such fact or thing was acquired on the day thus specifically named.

To the argument that the complaint fails to disclose the requisite promptitude on the part of plaintiff in asserting her right to a rescission because it does not show why she could not, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have sooner discovered the alleged treachery of the defendant to his representations and promises, the learned counsel for the plaintiff, in his brief, makes a sufficient reply as follows:

> "A husband is presumed to be faithful and loyal—to act lawfully, not unlawfully. A wife is not encouraged or required by the law to doubt his loyalty or to be diligent in searching for possible pretexts for such doubt. The relation is confidential. She does not deal with her husband as with a stranger, but as one she can presumably trust."

[5, 6] There are, however, other answers to the complaint that plaintiff's pleading is defective in that therein she fails to relieve herself of the imputation of laches in proceeding to have restored to her the rights of which she was wrongfully deprived by the defendant, viz.: 1. The answer does not plead laches as a defense to the maintenance of the action, and that question was therefore not reviewed by the trial court, "and hence should not, for the first time be raised here. Indeed, objection to the rescission on that ground, since not pleaded, is deemed waived," citing Code of Civil Procedure, § 434 (Tracy v. Smith & Mizener, 175 Cal. 161, 165 Pac. 535). 2. "In considering an appeal supported by the judgment roll only, all presumptions and intendments are to be indulged favorably to and in support of the judgment. It must, in other words, be presumed that there was evidence sufficient to support the findings or the verdict, and that whatever might have properly occurred at the trial to cure the defects of the complaint in any vital particular did actually occur." Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 561, 174 Pac. 903, 905.

The only real objection which could be urged against the complaint here in the particulars referred to is that of uncertainty, and as to such ground of objection to a pleading, even when raised by demurrer, the following cases are instructive: Rooney v. Gray Bros., 145 Cal. 753, 758, 79 Pac. 523; Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman, etc., Co., 6 Cal. App. 58, 61, 91 Pac. 425.

The judgment appears to be just, and legally impregnable, and it is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AVILA. (Cr. 732.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1152(1)—Appointment of interpreter for witness discretionary with court.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1884, it is made the duty of the court to appoint an interpreter in those cases only where the witness does not understand or speak the English language, the question being one in each case for the judicial discretion of the trial court, so that its ruling will not be disturbed unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown.

2. Criminal law ⚷642—Ruling denying interpreter to witness abuse of discretion.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where to corroborate the 13 year old victim's testimony her aunt was called as a witness, and such aunt during her examination repeatedly asked for an interpreter, stating she did not understand the questions asked her in English, as an examination of her answers shows, the trial court abused its discretion in denying an interpreter to the witness.

3. Criminal law ⚷419, 420(4)—Rape ⚷48 (2)—Testimony that prosecutrix made complaint and mentioned name of defendant inadmissible.

In a prosecution for statutory rape on a 13 year old girl, testimony of prosecutrix's aunt that her niece had made complaint to her, in particular mentioning defendant's name as the guilty party, held inadmissible as hearsay, being admissible only to the extent of the fact of complaint having been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Alexander Avila was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank E. Dominguez and William Thomas Helms, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of imprisonment pronounced upon his conviction of the crime of statutory rape.

[1, 2] The victim of the crime was a 13 year old girl, who testified to the act of intercourse. For the purpose of corroborating her testimony, an aunt, Mary Foster, was called as a witness on behalf of the state. This witness, during her examination, repeatedly asked that she be accorded an interpreter, stating that she did not understand the questions asked her in the English language, which request was by the court denied until the latter part of the cross-examination, when it called an interpreter. Under section 1884, Code of Civil Procedure, it is made the duty of the court to appoint an interpreter in those cases only where the witness does not understand or speak the English language. In each case the question is one for the judicial determination of the trial court. Its ruling thereon will not be disturbed unless the record clearly shows an abuse of discretion. People v. Young, 108 Cal. 8, 41 Pac. 281; People v. Morine, 138 Cal. 626, 72 Pac. 166. In the instant case, not only did the witness repeatedly state that she did not understand the language in which the questions were asked, but an examination of the answers made by her to questions propounded shows that as to many of them she did not understand or comprehend their meaning. Considering the character of the offense with which defendant was charged and the fact that his conviction was based almost solely upon the testimony of the child who was the victim of his alleged lust, the court should have called an interpreter in order that, in so far as the testimony was corroborative of that of the prosecutrix, it should have been clear in meaning and to no extent left to the conjecture of the jury.

[3] It appearing that the prosecutrix had, immediately following the commission of the alleged offense, made complaint to her aunt, the latter on direct examination by the district attorney was interrogated as to whether the prosecutrix, at the time when she made such complaint, also told her the name of the party who had committed the offense. The questions and answers to which defendant's objection was overruled were as follows:

> "Q. Did she tell you who it was that did this? A. Told what? Q. This act up there in the room that caused this torn— A. Yes; I told you she told me. Q. Whom did she tell you did it? Who was the man she told you did it? A. The little girl told me boy taken her—broken the clothes. Q. Did she mention the boy's name? A. Alex Avila. She told me one boy in uniform, the one boy in uniform call Alex. Q. I don't want you to tell us anything that the little girl did not tell you, but I want you to tell the jury if the little girl told you what this man did to her? A. There are some words that I cannot understand."

Like evidence, over defendant's objection, was adduced from the officer who arrested defendant. In so ruling the court committed prejudicial error. In such cases:

> "The true rule is to admit evidence of the fact of complaint in all cases, and in no case to admit anything more. The evidence, when restricted to this extent, is not hearsay, but in the strictest sense original, evidence. When, however, these limits are exceeded, it becomes hearsay in a very objectionable form. There is every reason, therefore, why it should be admitted to the extent indicated, and none why it should be admitted further." People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126; Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 3, § 213.

In People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 Pac. 838, it is said:

> "It is clear that to allow any mere statement of the prosecutrix as to the details of the affair, or as to the name of the person accused by her, to be given in evidence, would be to allow hearsay evidence to prove the offense."

To the same effect, see People v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 238, 32 Pac. 8; People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 47 Pac. 41; People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 Pac. 307.

That the testimony so given was not only erroneous, but highly prejudicial, appears obvious when considered in view of the fact that defendant not only denied the commission of the offense, but offered evidence which, if believed by the jury, clearly established an alibi. The Attorney General in his argument does not seek to justify the ruling, but contends that on examination of the entire record discloses that, notwithstanding the error, there was no miscarriage of justice, in which case he insists that under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution the judgment should be affirmed. Whether or not the jury, in the absence of the incompetent testimony, would have believed the testimony of the child as against that of defendant and evidence offered in support of an alibi, we cannot say. At all events, we are of the opinion that, upon the record herein, said provision of the Constitution should not be invoked in this case.

HOLM v. BURNELL et al. (Civ. 2131.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Appellate court bound by finding of trial court where evidence conflicting.

Where the evidence on the point whether defendants were merely sureties for plaintiff by mutual agreement, and hence not liable to the contribution sued for, was conflicting, the appellate court is bound by the finding of the trial court thereon.

2. Principal and surety ⚷200(7)—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendants sued for contribution were not sureties.

In an action by one stockholder in a corporation against others, all parties having executed to a bank holding the company's note, to prevent suit to collect it, their joint and several note, plaintiff seeking contribution as against co-obligors, evidence held sufficient to sustain the trial court's finding that defendants were not merely sureties for plaintiff, and hence not liable to contribution.

3. Principal and surety ⚷200(2)—Makers liable without demand or notice to comaker who paid note to payee.

Where stockholders in a corporation, to prevent suit to collect its note, executed to the holder bank their joint and several note, no notice of the payment of such note by a single maker with demand for contribution was necessary to subject the other makers to liability to him; they being liable directly to the payee bank without demand or notice, and standing in no more favorable position as to their comaker, who paid the note to the bank.

4. Bills and notes ⚷120—Stockholder makers of a joint note not liable to contribute only in proportion to stock owned by them.

Where stockholders in a corporation to prevent suit to collect its note executed to the payee bank their joint and several note, they were bound as joint and several obligors on their note, and were not liable to the payee bank or to one of their number who paid the payee bank only in the proportion which the stock owned by them severally bore to the entire capital stock.

5. Interest ⚷60 — Interest in action by one maker of note against others for contribution should not be compounded.

In an action by one of several makers of a note against the others for contribution, he having paid the note, wherein plaintiff asks interest only at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, such interest should not be compounded, and any excess interest reached by compounding should be deducted from the judgment for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Holm against J. S. Burnell and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from order refusing to grant new trial, defendants appeal. Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed; judgment modified and affirmed.

H. L. Ford and J. S. Burnell, both of Eureka, for appellants.

Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action for contribution by one obligor on a joint and several promissory note against his co-obligors. The execution of the note and its payment by the plaintiff are conceded facts. It is necessary to go back into the early stages of the transaction to ascertain the present relation of the parties.

In January, 1917, the parties plaintiff and defendant were and yet are stockholders in a corporation. This corporation on said date borrowed from the First National Bank of Eureka the sum of $2,000, and, as evidence of its obligation to repay the same, executed its corporate promissory note to said bank in said sum of $2,000, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum compounded quarterly. In July of the same year, the note remaining wholly unpaid, the parties plaintiff and defendant herein, upon the demand of the bank and to prevent a suit to collect the note, executed to the bank their joint and several promissory note of like tenor and effect. The former note was delivered up to the corporation. This last note, dated in July, 1917, is the note in suit.

[1, 2] The defendants offer the defense that they were, by mutual agreement and understanding, merely sureties for the plaintiff and hence not liable to contribution. The point may be disposed of with the single observation that the evidence upon the point is conflicting and that an appellate court is bound by the finding of the trial court. This finding is adverse to the defendants. It may be added that the testimony of witnesses and evidence of the surrounding circumstances abundantly justify the finding. The claim of the defendants that the plaintiff, to gain to himself the trifling advantage of a period of delay, would undertake to bear the entire burden of a $2,000 note, is so contrary to ordinary experience that it would require quite persuasive evidence to establish it. Equally improbable is the defense closely interwoven with it, that the parties, plaintiff and defendants, mutually agreed among themselves that no one of them should claim contribution from any other. But, like the first point, the evidence upon it is conflicting, and we are neither inclined nor permitted to disturb the finding of the trial court.

[3] Another point offered in defense is that, if they are sureties, the plaintiff gave them no notice of the payment by himself and made no demand for contribution. But this is unnecessary. The defendants were liable directly to the payee in the note without demand or notice and they stand in no more favorable position as to the one who pays the note to the payee. The case of Taylor v. Reynolds, 53 Cal. 686, is directly against the claims of the defendants as to this point. They admit this, but they insist that this court should overrule that authority. The case was carefully considered by the court and was concurred in by the entire bench. It is in harmony with the statute law on the subject, and we are satisfied as to its soundness.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[4] Another defense is that, if they were bound at all, it was only in that proportion which the stock owned by them severally bears to the entire capital stock. This claim is not tenable. The obligors were not bound on the promissory note in their technical capacity as stockholders, but as joint and several obligors. In view of the conclusions at which we have arrived as to the foregoing points, it becomes unnecessary to notice the claim of the plaintiff that such defenses cannot be proved by parol. We refrain from passing upon the question.

[5] Lastly, the defendants insist that the trial court should not have allowed compound interest. It seems that the portion of the interest arising from the process of compounding is the small sum of $11.60. The plaintiff asks interest only at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. This should not be compounded. The sum of $11.60 should be deducted from the judgment.

The appeal from the order refusing to grant a new trial is dismissed. The judgment appealed from is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $11.60 erroneously allowed as compound interest, and as thus modified the judgment is affirmed; the appellants to recover their costs on this appeal.

SIMAS v. CONSELHO SUPREMO DA UNIAO PORTUGEZADO ESTADO DA CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 9453.)

1. Interpleader 🔑8(2)—Insurer held entitled to interplead beneficiary and another.

Where plaintiff's father and brother agreed to insure their lives in fraternal orders in each other's favor, but the father, in violation of the agreement, named plaintiff as beneficiary, the insurer, which had knowledge of the brother's rights, was entitled to require the brothers to interplead and litigate the matter between themselves.

2. Appeal and error 🔑882(3)—Plaintiff not entitled to rely on defendant's failure to pay money into court where he opposed interpleader.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, authorizing defendant to apply for an order to substitute another party making a demand on the same contract, or for the same property, and providing for the discharge of the original defendant on payment of the amount claimed into court, plaintiff could not rely on defendant's failure to deposit the money in court to sustain a judgment in his favor, where defendant asked an interlocutory order of interpleader and alleged its willingness to make such deposit, but on plaintiff's motion the court granted judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings.

Action by Alexander Simas, Jr., against Conselho Supremo Da Uniao Portugezado Estado Da California to recover a death benefit. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. I. Lemos and Frank Mitchell, Jr., both of Hayward, and Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for appellant.

M. J. Rutherford, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to recover a death benefit upon a certificate of membership issued by defendant, insuring the life of Alexander Simas, Sr., wherein the plaintiff is named as beneficiary. Judgment was given for the plaintiff upon the pleadings, and the defendant appealed. It appears from the pleadings that the defendant is liable upon its policy for the sum of $800, which liability is admitted in the pleadings. The only question raised by the defendant is whether or not that liability is to the plaintiff or to his brother. The father took out the certificate of membership in favor of his son John in pursuance of an agreement with John that John, in consideration thereof, would insure his life in the Woodmen of the World and make his father beneficiary therein. Both agreed to make no change in the beneficiary. John complied with the agreement on his part, and the father, in violation of his contract with John, named plaintiff as his beneficiary in accordance with the by-laws of the defendant. The defendant, having notice of John's rights in the policy by reason of the agreement with his father, asks leave to pay the money into court in order that the brothers may litigate their respective claims thereto. John was in the military service of the United States government when the suit was brought and when judgment was rendered. The question is whether under these admitted facts the court properly rendered judgment on the pleadings in favor of plaintiff or whether the court should have permitted the defendant to pay the money into court to wait the final judgment wherein the respective rights of the brothers should be determined.

[1] It is contended by the plaintiff that the judgment is proper for the reason that the certificate is conclusive upon the insurance company and the fact that Alexander is named therein as beneficiary not only justifies, but requires, the payment to him. But this position ignores the right of the defendant to compel the claimants to litigate that matter between themselves, for one or the other, of course, must have the better right. The cross-complaint sets out the claims of both, and it is evident therefrom that the right of the plaintiff to the fund was at least debatable. Adams v. Grand Lodge, 105 Cal. 321, 38 Pac. 914, 45 Am. St. Rep. 45; Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Freitas v. Freitas, 31 Cal. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W., 13 S. D. 132, 82 N. W. 404; King v. Supreme Council, 216 Pa. 553, 65 Atl. 1108; Supreme Council, C. B. L., v. Murphy, 65 N. J. Eq. 60, 55 Atl. 497. In such a case a complaint in interpleader is proper. Fidelity Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Rodgers, 180 Cal. 684, 182 Pac. 426. And this has been the practice. Woodmen of the World v. Rutledge, 133 Cal. 640, 643, 65 Pac. 1105; San Francisco Savings Union v. Long, 137 Cal. 68, 70, 69 Pac. 687; Clark v. Mosher, 107 N. Y. 118, 121, 14 N. E. 96, 1 Am. St. Rep. 798.

[2] The respondent claims that because the appellant did not deposit the money in court it failed to comply with section 386, Code of Civil Procedure. But such deposit is to be made only in pursuance of an interlocutory order of court, and the defendant requested that such order be made and alleged its willingness to make such deposit, and the court, instead of making such an order, entered judgment on plaintiff's motion requiring the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the money it admitted to be due upon the insurance policy, thus in effect denying the application of the defendant to make the deposit in court, and for its discharge. Respondent cannot therefore rely upon the failure of the defendant to deposit the money in court to sustain the judgment, when that failure resulted from his own opposition to that course. Defendant pleaded the facts both by way of answer and a verified cross-complaint in interpleader, joining John Simas as a cross-defendant. We deem it unnecessary to further discuss the pleadings as the facts were fully before the court and upon such facts the judgment was erroneous.

PER CURIAM. We entertain no doubt of the power of the court in divorce actions to modify its orders for the payment to the wife of money necessary to enable her to support herself during the pendency of the action, or to enable her to prosecute or defend the action, as the circumstances with regard to necessity change. As to orders for the payment of money for support there has never been any question in this behalf, and there is no difference in principle with relation to money to be paid to her for the purpose of enabling her to pay attorneys. The superior court did not exceed its jurisdiction in this matter.

DORR v. MARSH et al. (L. A. 6343.)

Landlord and tenant 🔑149—Municipal corporations 🔑120—Lessees under lease expiring September 1st liable for taxes under ordinance published August 31st.

Under Los Angeles Charter, § 39, providing that an ordinance shall not be effective until published at least once or posted, an ordinance levying a tax which was published on August 31st became effective on that day, so that lessees under a lease expiring September 1st which required them to pay taxes levied during the term are liable for the tax levied by the ordinance.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Cora B. Dorr, as executrix of the last will and testament of Eliza A. Lewis, deceased, against Robert Marsh and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Woodruff & Schoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg and Alex W. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants for rent and taxes alleged to be due under a lease between plaintiff's testatrix as lessor and the defendant Robert Marsh as lessee. It is conceded that $1,201 rent is due from appellants, but appellants contend that the balance of the judgment for taxes is erroneous for the reason that the taxes were not levied until September 1st, while the lease, appellants claim, terminated at midnight August 31, 1917. The ordinance of the city of Los Angeles levying the tax was passed August 28th, approved August 29th, and published August 31st. The charter of the city of Los Angeles (section 39, Stats. 1889, p. 465) provides that the ordinance shall not be effective until published at least once or posted, as the case may be. Appellants' position is that the ordinance did not become effective immediately upon its publication, but, as the law takes no account of fractions of days, it could only become effective on the next day. In support of this contention appellants also cite a number of cases wherein it is held that a publication or posting for one or more days or weeks is not completed until the expiration of the number of days or weeks. These cases, however, have no application to the situation here, where the taking effect of the ordinance is merely suspended until publication, but the situation, is analogous to a case where a statute takes effect upon passage. In Sutherland, Statutory Construction, it is said that, notwithstanding the legal fiction that the law takes no notice of fractions of a day:

> "The weight of American authority is that a statute which is to go into effect immediately is operative from the instant of its passage." Section 179, p. 320.

The rule is thus stated in Cyc.:

> "The rule that a statute shall take effect from its passage has usually been construed to make it effective from the time it has passed through all the forms required by the Constitution to give it force and validity. Thus, where the approval of the Governor is required, it takes effect from the time of receiving such approval. * * * In the jurisdictions where statutes take effect from their passage, it has been generally held that a statute takes effect on the day of the final enactment, without allowing any time for its publication or for its provisions to become known, even though provision is made by general law for the publication of statutes; but in some cases the day of approval has been excluded and the statute given effect at the first moment of the following day." 36 Cyc. 1197.

In the same section it is said:

> "As a general rule the law does not take notice of fractions of a day, and therefore a statute which takes effect from its passage or approval relates back and becomes effective from the first moment of the day on which it is passed or approved; but this doctrine of relation is only a legal fiction, and, wherever its application would cause injustice, the act will be given effect only from the moment of its approval." 36 Cyc. 1198, 1199.

In People v. Clark, 1 Cal. 406, and Davis v. Whidden, 117 Cal. 618, 49 Pac. 766, this court held that a statute took effect immediately upon its approval.

As the only thing necessary to render the ordinance effective was its publication, it seems clear that the ordinance went into effect immediately upon publication, and was therefore in effect on the 31st day of August, 1917. Inasmuch as the tax levy was made during the term of the lease, the defendants are liable therefor.

Judgment affirmed.

VAN HOOSEAR v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

(S. F. 9374.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Test of whether person supplying water is engaged in "public utility" business stated.

Whether one engaged in the business of supplying water is engaged in a "public utility" business depends on whether he held himself out expressly or impliedly as engaged in the business of supplying water to the public or to a limited portion of the public, such, for example, as could be served by his system or whether he merely held himself out as serving or ready to serve particular individuals as a matter of accommodation or for reasons peculiar and particular to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

2. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Finding of Railroad Commission conclusive if supported by evidence.

An order of the Railroad Commission that a person engaged in supplying water resume service cannot be annulled if there was any evidence before the commission justifying its finding that such person was engaged in a public utility business.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Inference held warranted that person held himself out as in public utility business.

Where a farm owner supplying water from his plant to some of his neighbors applied to the Railroad Commission for leave to discontinue the service, and after such leave was refused continued the service with nothing to indicate that he did not do so in acquiescence with the order and in the character of a public utility operator, the inference was warranted in a subsequent proceeding that he thereafter held himself out as doing a public utility business.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Business of supplying water is public utility when held out as such.

If a farm owner supplying water to some of his neighbors held himself out as engaged in a public utility business after the Railroad Commission refused leave to discontinue the business, the business then became a public utility business, whether it was previously so or not.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Supplying water does not lose public character because customers consent to discontinuance.

If a farm owner supplying water to some of his neighbors was engaged in a public utility business, its character as such was not changed by the fact that all of the customers agreed that he might discontinue the business.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑217—Court cannot control discretion of Railroad Commission in denying leave to discontinue service.

The court on certiorari cannot control the discretion of the Railroad Commission in refusing to permit one supplying water to discontinue the service.

In Bank.

Original application by William S. Van Hoosear for certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission. Order affirmed.

H. S. Craig and W. B. Rinehart, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an original application to this court seeking to annul an order of the Railroad Commission made in a proceeding upon its own initiative, finding that the petitioner, Van Hoosear, was engaged in the business of supplying water to the public, had been charging rates not authorized by the commission, and had discontinued his service without the permission of the commission, and directing him to resume service and supply water at rates fixed by the order. There is no doubt as to the petitioner having engaged in the business of supplying water, or as to his having charged rates not authorized by the commission, or as to his having discontinued his services without permission, and it is apparent at once that, if the commission's finding that he was engaged in a public utility business is justified upon the facts shown, the commission had authority to make the order. The sole question, then, is as to the character of the petitioner's business.

[1, 2] The test to be applied is whether or not the petitioner held himself out, expressly or impliedly, as engaged in the business of supplying water to the public as a class, not necessarily to all of the public, but to any limited portion of it, such portion, for example, as could be served by his system, as contradistinguished from his holding himself out as serving or ready to serve only particular individuals, either as a matter of accommodation or for other reasons peculiar and particular to them. Thayer v. Cal. Dev. Co., 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21; Pinney, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 12, 141 Pac. 620, L. R. A. 1915C, 282, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 471; Associated, etc., Co. v. Railroad Commission, 176 Cal. 518, 169 Pac. 62, L. R. A. 1918C, 849; Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249. The rule, of course, is that if there was any evidence before the commission which would justify its finding, its order cannot be annulled.

[3, 4] There is one circumstance, or set of circumstances, which would seem sufficient for that purpose, and that is that in 1917, two years before the present proceeding was commenced, Van Hoosear himself petitioned the commission for leave to discontinue his service, that such leave was refused after a hearing and opposition, and that he continued his service thereafter without anything to indicate that he did not do so in acquiescence with the order of the commission and in the character of a public utility operator, which he and the commission assumed he had. It it were not for these circumstances, it is exceedingly doubtful at least if the present order of the commission could be sustained. The petitioner's plant is an exceedingly small one. It was originally built to supply water for his own use on his farm. He testifies, and his testimony is corroborated, that he began to supply water to some of his neighbors as a matter of accommodation and merely continued so doing; and he finally discontinued his service because he had sold his farm. It is a case to which the obligations and responsibilities of a public utility are wholly inappropriate, and where the petitioner, by dedicating his system to public use, would impose a perpetual servitude upon his farm from which there could be no escape except by the grace of the commission. It is a good illustration of the truth of the statement in Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, that "to hold that property is dedicated to a public use is no trivial thing," and of the justice of the statement which immediately follows that "such declaration is never presumed without evidence of unequivocal intention."

Nevertheless we see no escape from the conclusion that it was not an unreasonable inference that by himself requesting leave of the commission to discontinue, and then, when this leave was refused after opposition, continuing the service, Van Hoosear held himself out as engaged in a public utility business. If he did so hold himself out, it fixed the character of his business from then on, no matter how foolish he may have been in so doing, or how ignorant he may have been of the legal consequences. His petition for leave to discontinue of necessity assumed that he was in a public utility business, as otherwise the commission would have had no authority in the premises. It was in effect a representation that he was so engaged. This representation, furthermore, was one made not only to the commission, but to his own consumers, against whom the petition was directed and some of whom opposed it. The order of the commission denying the request, while it does not expressly find that he was engaged in a public utility business, undoubtedly because no question was made upon the point, assumes it throughout and was made upon that basis. It may well be that, even by thus representing to the commission and his consumers that he was engaged in a public utility business and submitting himself in that character to the jurisdiction of the commission, Van Hoosear would not be estopped from showing that he was in truth not so engaged. But where, after having made this representation and after having been refused leave to discontinue, he to all outward appearances acquiesces in the refusal and continues his service, it is a fair inference that he continues in the character which he represented he had and which the commission assumed he had; in other words, it is a fair inference that by continuing in business under these circumstances he held himself out, from then on at least, as doing a public utility business. So holding himself out, his business became in truth a public utility business, no matter whether it was previously so or not. There would seem, as we have said, no escape from this conclusion, and it is supported by the authority of Franscioni v. Soledad, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161, where a very similar state of facts was involved. This conclusion is decisive.

To avoid any misapprehension, we might add that what we have said is not to be taken as meaning that it was a necessary inference that Van Hoosear had held himself out as engaged in a public utility business. Upon all the evidence in the case, the commission might well have rejected the inference as contrary to the actual fact. But the commission did not do this, and, the inference mentioned being a not unreasonable one, it is sufficient to sustain the order.

[5, 6] We might also add that we have not overlooked the fact that, when Van Hoosear sold his place and discontinued service, all of his consumers, five only in number, had agreed, four of them in writing, that he might discontinue in case he sold. This circumstance, however, would not change the character of his business from a public utility business to a private business. If it were a public utility business, as the commission found, it would remain so, no matter how the number of consumers dwindled, even if it dwindled to none at all, and, being a public utility business, authority to discontinue it could be had only from the commission, and could not be conferred by the consumers. The circumstances might well have appealed strongly to the discretion of the commission to permit him to discontinue, but over the discretion of the commission we have no control.

Order affirmed.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. v. ROLPH, Mayor, et al. (S. F. 9523.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1920.)

1. Mandamus 🔑14(1)—Will not lie to compel performance of public duty without proper demand.

Where demand must be made in order to impose a duty on a public officer, mandamus to compel the performance of the duty will not lie unless there has been a proper demand.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑1012 — No payment by San Francisco treasurer until claim is approved and checked by auditor.

Under Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 4, c. 2, § 3, and article 4, c. 3, § 2, the treasurer cannot make a payment on a claim until the demand on the claim has been checked and approved by the auditor.

3. Mandamus 🔑14(1)—Demand condition precedent to mandamus to compel payment of judgment.

Judgment creditor of city and county of San Francisco cannot institute and maintain a proceeding for mandamus directing the payment of the judgment until the auditor has been put in default by the presentation of a demand by judgment creditor for a proper warrant upon the treasury for the payment of the judgment, the treasurer not being in default until after he had been confronted with a warrant issued by the auditor under Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 4, c. 2, § 3, and article 4, c. 3, § 2.

4. Mandamus 🔑154(7)—Allegation that authorities "refuse" to pay judgment not sufficient.

In mandamus against auditor and other officials of the city and county of San Francisco to compel payment of judgment against the city and county, allegation that defendants "refuse" to pay the judgment held not sufficient pleading of demand on auditor for issuance of warrant and refusal thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Refuse.]

5. Evidence 🔑83(1)—Officer presumed to do duty.

It is presumed that an officer will do his duty.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑1037 — Judgment creditor entitled to whole amount of judgment on collection of tax sufficient to pay it.

If the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco actually levies and collects a tax sufficient to pay the whole of a judgment against the city and county, under St. 1901, p. 794, § 3, the right to pay the judgment in installments has ceased, and judgment creditor is entitled to the whole amount of the judgment.

7. Pleading 🔑403(2)—Defect in petition cannot be cured by allegation in answer.

Defect in petition for writ of mandamus cannot be cured by allegation of answer filed at the same time as demurrer.

8. Pleading 🔑403(2)—Defect in pleading cannot be cured upon demurrer by allegation in answer filed at same time as demurrer.

When considering the sufficiency of a pleading attacked by demurrer, defects in the pleading attacked cannot, under Code Civ. Proc. § 472, be held to be cured by allegations in the answer filed at the same time as the demurrer, for the answer is before the court only in the event that the petition, too, stands the test of a demurrer.

In Bank.

Application for mandamus by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company against James Rolph, Jr., as Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco, and others. Writ denied.

Samuel Knight and F. Eldred Boland, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Petitioner recovered a judgment against the city and county of San Francisco in 1917. Demands by the petitioner for the taking of steps necessary to the levy of a tax for the liquidation of the judgment were refused. Thereupon, on August 22, 1919, petitioner obtained from the District Court of Appeal a peremptory writ of mandate, directed to the mayor, auditor. and members of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding that the said judgment be examined, audited, and certified to the board of supervisors by the auditor, and that the board of supervisors and mayor include in the tax levy for the fiscal year 1919–1920:

> "A rate or sum sufficient to pay said judgment as aforesaid, or to pay an aliquot part or fraction of the amount of said judgment, such aliquot part or fraction of said judgment in no case to be less than one-tenth of the whole amount of said judgment, in conformity with that certain act of the Legislature of the state of California duly and regularly approved March 23, 1901, and entitled 'An act to provide for the payment of judgments against counties, cities, cities and counties, and towns.'" Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Deasy (App.) 183 Pac. 243.

In accordance with the writ issued, in September, 1919, when a tax for the fiscal year 1919–1920 was levied, a sum to meet the obligation of the judgment in favor of petitioner was included therein.

In the present proceeding petitioner seeks a writ commanding the payment of the judgment. After setting forth the preliminary facts, the petition alleges that, in pursuance of said tax levy, a sum sufficient to pay the judgment in favor of petitioner was paid into the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco; that this sum still remains in the treasury; but that respondents, namely, the mayor, board of supervisors, auditor, and treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, neglect and refuse to pay the same to petitioner. Respondents demur to the petition upon the ground that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[1] Where demand must be made in order to impose a duty upon a public officer, mandamus to compel the performance of the duty will not lie unless there has been a proper demand. Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 Pac. 246; Ferguson v. Board of Education, 7 Cal. App. 568, 95 Pac. 165. The demurrer to the petition raises the question as to whether or not an allegation of demand was necessary to the statement of a case entitling petitioner to the relief herein prayed for.

Presumably and necessarily a demand upon the claim for damages must have been presented in limine, or no judgment could have been recovered upon the claim in the first instance. Charter of the City and County of San Francisco, art. 2, c. 2, § 8. In addition, as previously stated, a demand for the taking of steps necessary to raise money with which to pay the judgment was made prior to the institution of the proceeding for the writ issued by the District Court of Appeal in Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Deasy, supra. Therefore the question raised by the demurrer is whether or not, after the money with which to pay the judgment has been collected, it is necessary for petitioner to make and allege a separate and specific demand for the payment of the judgment before a writ commanding the payment can be issued.

The statute which regulates the payment of judgments against counties and municipalities (Stats. 1901, p. 794) imposes upon the county clerk the duty of filing with the auditor and furnishing to the body authorized to levy taxes a list of judgments against the county or municipality; the auditor must then examine and audit the final judgments so reported and certify the same to the treasurer; thereupon the tax for the payment of such judgments is to be levied by the body authorized to levy taxes upon the property within the county or municipality. These provisions are general in scope and do not dispense with or supplant rules regulating details of local government. In this connection it is to be noted that the city and county of San Francisco keeps two separate and distinct sets of books—the auditor's and the treasurer's. Charter of the City and County of San Francisco, art. 4, c. 2; article 4, c. 3, § 2. These books should at all times agree, for the charter requires that it shall always be possible for the auditor to tell the exact condition of the treasury. This system is only possible by requiring all deposits to be made through the auditor's office and all withdrawals to be approved by the auditor, so that, deducting the unpaid warrants, the auditor's books will always show the amount of money in the treasury. Accordingly, the charter of the city and county of San Francisco prohibits the payment of a claim against the city and county until a demand is first presented to the auditor and approved and certified by him to the treasurer. Charter of the City and County of San Francisco, art. 4, c. 3, § 2; article 4, c. 2, § 3. These provisions thus operate to establish a double check upon the finances and provide for the formal notification to those in charge of the funds of the amount of the claims against said city and county and the names of the holders thereof. They also furnish an added protection to the municipality by bringing those accepting payments from the treasury within section 72 of the Penal Code, by virtue of which the presentation of a fraudulent claim against a municipality is made a felony.

[2, 3] It is thus essential, before any payment can be made from the treasury, that the demand upon the claim should receive the check and approval of the auditor. Were payments of judgments to be made without formal demand upon the judgment claim and the issuance of the auditor's warrant, not only would there be a disarrangement of the bookkeeping system of the municipality, but the treasurer would be required to assume that the judgment creditor receiving payment had not assigned or in other manner disposed of his claim, and a person could demand money from the treasury without any written evidence of his authority, either from the auditor or any other source. It is therefore apparent that grave confusion would be the consequence of a failure to compel a judgment creditor to comply with the charter requirement that all demands of every sort shall first be presented to and approved by the auditor before payment can be made from the treasury. This being so, the petitioner is not in a position to institute and maintain a proceeding for a writ directing the payment of the judgment until the auditor has been put in default by the presentation of a demand by petitioner for a proper warrant upon the treasury for the payment of petitioner's judgment, and certainly the treasurer is not in default until after he has been confronted with a warrant issued by the auditor.

[4, 5] We conclude, therefore, that a demand upon the auditor for the issuance of a warrant and a refusal thereof should have been alleged. The petition does not show the making of any demand, unless a demand can be inferred from the allegation that respondents "refuse" to pay the judgment. While it is true that sometimes the allegation of a refusal to perform an act may be sufficiently definite that an allegation of demand may be implied therefrom (Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. State, 149 Ind. 276, 49 N. E. 2; Commonwealth v. Council of Pittsburgh, 34 Pa. [10 Casey] 496), nevertheless, it is also true that it is presumed that an officer will do his duty, and therefore the allegations with respect to demand and refusal must be made with such precision as to show a violation of the particular duty owed to the petitioner (Price v. Riverside, etc., Co., 56 Cal. 431; Ingerman v. State, 128 Ind. 225, 27 N. E. 499). In this case the general allegation of a refusal of respondents to pay the judgment fails to point with exactness to the violation of a specific duty, and is therefore too vague to support an implication of a demand upon the auditor for the issuance of a warrant.

It is next contended in behalf of petitioner that, conceding that a demand for the payment of a judgment would ordinarily be a prerequisite to a proceeding in mandamus to compel the payment of the judgment, nevertheless, such a demand was not necessary in the instant case. A demand is claimed to have been unnecessary for the reason that the attitude of the officials in charge of the funds had been officially declared to be such that a demand would have been idle and useless, and that in such cases no demand is required. Moore v. Super. Ct., 20 Cal. App. 299, 128 Pac. 946.

The official declaration relied upon by petitioner in support of this argument is a resolution of the board of supervisors directing the treasurer to pay petitioner, upon proper demand therefor, an amount equal to only one-tenth of the judgment, whereas petitioner is seeking to compel the payment of the whole amount of said judgment. Petitioner claims that an amount equal to the whole judgment was included in the tax levy and collected for the purpose of paying the judgment in question. Under the provisions of the statute of 1901, above referred to (Stats. 1901, p. 794), the board of supervisors, in levying a tax to pay the judgment, was free to exercise the option of raising a sum sufficient to pay the whole of petitioner's judgment or of raising an amount equal to an aliquot part of the judgment, but not less than one-tenth thereof. Cary v. Long, 184 Pac. 857; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Deasy, supra.

[6] If the board of supervisors has, in fact, actually levied and collected a tax sufficient to pay the whole of the judgment, the right to pay the judgment in installments has ceased. Section 3 of the statute of 1901 requires the body authorized to levy taxes to "include in the tax levy for the next fiscal year a rate or sum sufficient to pay all final judgments existing against such county, city and county, city, or town." If the amount of any judgment is not included in that tax levy, the amount of such omitted judgment must be included in the next tax levy. The following proviso is then made:

> "Provided, that the board of supervisors * * * may provide for the payment of such final judgments * * * by including in the tax levy for the next fiscal year an aliquot part or fraction of the amount of such judgments, and thereupon the treasurer shall pay to each judgment creditor a like aliquot part or fraction of the amount of the judgment of the creditor, and thereafter a like aliquot part or fraction of the amount of such judgments shall be levied and paid each successive year until the whole thereof shall be fully paid; but such fractional levy and payment shall in no case be less than one-tenth ($^1/_{10}$) of the whole amount of such judgments."

According to this section, in general the whole amount of the judgment must be included in a single tax levy. There is, however, a specific proviso granting the right to include in the tax levy an amount equal to only a part of the judgment; "thereupon" a part only of the judgment is to be paid to the judgment creditor; "thereafter" a like fractional part of the judgment is to be levied and paid each year. The words "thereupon" and "thereafter" signify both sequence and consequence, and indicate that an event follows and is dependent upon the occurrence of a preceding event. By the use of these words in the proviso, the existence of the right of paying a fractional part of the judgment after the collection of the tax and of the right of collecting and paying in subsequent installments is made to depend upon and follow the collection of only a fractional part of the judgment in the first instance. The payment of a fractional part of the judgment is mentioned only in this proviso, which is a separate and distinct portion of the section, providing a special mode of collection and payment complete in itself and different from the method prescribed in other parts of the section. Every time that a payment of a fractional part of the judgment is referred to, it is expressly mentioned as concomitant to a tax levy of only a fractional part of the amount of the judgment. Moreover, whenever the levy of a fractional part of the judgment is made, the statute provides that a like fractional amount shall be paid over to the judgment creditor, thus expressing an intent to prevent the retention in the treasury of any part of the tax levied for the payment of the judgment.

[7, 8] The statute requires a choice between two alternatives; either a single levy and payment of the whole amount of the judgment, which would be to the advantage of the judgment creditor, or annual levies and payments of a fractional part of the judgment, which would be to the interest of the taxpayers. There is no provision permitting the city to collect the whole amount of the judgment from the taxpayers, and, at the same time, to withhold a considerable part thereof from the judgment creditor by retaining it in the city treasury over a period of years. Therefore, if petitioner's statement that the whole amount of the judgment has been collected is correct, petitioner was, upon proper demand, entitled to receive the whole amount of the judgment in one payment. However, the fact that the treasurer was directed to pay only one-tenth of the judgment was not set forth in the petition. Respondents, at the time they demurred, filed answers which set forth the resolution of the board of supervisors directing the treasurer to pay to petitioner a sum equal to only one-tenth of the judgment, and it is upon these answers that petitioner relies for the allegations of facts excusing a demand. When considering the sufficiency of a pleading attacked by demurrer, defects in the pleading attacked cannot be held to be cured by allegations in an answer filed at the same time as the demurrer, for the answer is before the court only in the event that the petition withstands the test of the demurrer. Code Civ. Proc. § 472. If there were facts existing which would make a demand an empty and unavailing formality, these should have been alleged in the petition.

By reason of failing to allege a demand for the issuance of a warrant by the auditor, the petitioner failed to show a default on the part of the officers whom it seeks to charge with the performance of a duty. The demurrer must therefore be sustained.

The writ is denied.

AHEARN v. DAVIS et al., Board of Fire Com'rs. (S. F. 9431.)

Municipal corporations 🔑48(2)—Employees held entitled to hold over under new charter, whether salary fixed thereby or not; "officers and members."

The words "officers and members," as used in San Francisco Charter, art. 9, c. 2, § 1, relating to immediate reorganization of the fire department by appointments from the force, mean employees, whether enumerated and salaries fixed by chapter 8, or not, so that employees were properly allowed to hold over after the adoption of the charter without civil service examination, and were senior to those subsequently appointed on examination, under a rule for laying off men in inverse order of appointment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Daniel A. Ahearn against John F. Davis and others, as the Board of Fire Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco, for a writ of mandate to compel plaintiff's reinstatement in the Fire Department, and payment of wages while deprived of employment. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Grant & Zimdars, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley and Samuel M. Shortridge, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court denying him a writ of mandate directing the board of fire commissioners, the civil service commission and the auditor of San Francisco to recognize the plaintiff as harness maker for the fire department of the city. As defendants with the officials mentioned are joined two individuals, Buckley and Karney, and the question in dispute is as to whether the plaintiff, Ahearn, has a right superior to that of either of these two to the position mentioned of harness maker.

It seems that, at and before the going into effect of the present charter of San Francisco, both Buckley and Karney were in the employ of the city as harness makers for the fire department. On the going into effect of the charter on January 8, 1900, and the consequent reorganization of the department, they continued as harness makers for it, and have been such up to the present time, but have never taken a civil service examination for the positions they hold. In 1912 the civil service commission held an examination for mechanics, and the plaintiff took the examination and was given first place on the eligible list. The number of harness makers was increased from two to three, and in November, 1913, the plaintiff was appointed to the additional position so created. In 1917 the number was reduced again to two, and the plaintiff was laid off. He thereupon commenced this proceeding, claiming to be entitled to remain in the employ of the city in preference to either Buckley or Karney.

The rule of the civil service commission is that, in case of a reduction in the number of permanent employees of a particular class in any department, the employees shall be laid off in the inverse order of their appointment. The plaintiff claims that, although he came into the employ of the department long after Buckley and Karney, he is not subject to the rule just stated, for the reason that they are not civil service appointees, and therefore, according to plaintiff, not legally appointed to their positions. The claim of the defendant, on the other hand, is that Buckley and Karney were not required to be civil service appointees by reason of section 1 of chapter II of article IX of the charter, and therefore have held their positions regularly and have full rights of seniority. The section just mentioned deals with the duties of the fire commissioners in the matter of the organization of the fire department on the going into effect of the charter, and the pertinent portion of it reads:

> "The board of fire commissioners shall immediately after their appointment and qualification proceed to reorganize the fire department in conformity with the provisions of this charter. In so doing the board shall make its appointments of officers and members from the persons constituting the force in the service of the fire department at the time this charter goes into effect. Such officers and members shall not be required to pass any civil service examination."

It is perfectly evident from the mere reading of this section that it sustains the contention of the defendants, bearing in mind that Buckley and Karney were harness makers for the department when the charter went into effect, provided they come within the designation "officers and members" of the department. It is the plaintiff's contention that they do not, and this is the crux of the case.

That Buckley and Karney were and are employees of the department would seem to be plain. Some point seems to be made of the fact that no order appointing them was ever made by the fire commissioners. They simply kept on in their positions, being carried on the rolls of the department and doing their work and getting their pay, and this for some 17 years before their position as employees was questioned, and even then questioned not by the city authorities, but by a person who wanted one of their places. What additional strength a formal appointment would give to such a recognition we do not see.

It is also plain that, according to the ordinary and usual meaning of words, an "employee" of a city department is a "member" of that department. It also appears that almost immediately after the charter took effect the then city attorney, Franklin K. Lane, formally advised the fire commissioners that the section of the charter quoted applied to all employees of the department, whether they were members of its regular fire companies or of its office organization or not, and that the construction of the charter so advised was adopted and has been consistently followed ever since. We have, then, as opposed to the plaintiff's contention, a construction of the charter sustained by the natural meaning of the language used and by the consistent practice in actual administration for many years. Under these circumstances, only the most compelling reasons would justify our refusing to follow this construction.

The only reason advanced why we should refuse to do so is certain language from the opinion of this court in Maxwell v. Fire Commissioners, 139 Cal. 229, 72 Pac. 996, wherein the question was presented as to whether or not one who had been clerk of the fire department prior to the charter was entitled to the position of secretary of the fire commissioners in the reorganized department, by virtue of the same charter provision which is under consideration here. It was held that it could not be said that the two positions were the same, and therefore the old clerk was not entitled to become the new secretary. In its opinion the court used the following language (139 Cal. 231, 72 Pac. 997), upon which reliance is now placed:

"Chapter 8 of article IX of the charter provides that 'the officers and members of the fire department shall receive annual salaries as follows,' and then enumerates the different classes of officers and members, but does not mention the secretary of the board, nor any 'clerk' of the fire department. It is a fair inference that the direction in chapter 2, that in reorganizing the force the department shall make its appointments of 'officers and members' from the force in service when the charter took effect, applies only to the 'officers and members' whose salaries are fixed in chapter 8, and, as the secretary is not one of those enumerated, it would follow that the board is not required to select him from the members of the old fire department."

But, in the first place, this language was not necessary for the decision, and is but the statement of a further reason in addition to that upon which the decision primarily rests. Language so used would hardly justify the rejection of a construction sustained by the fair meaning of the words of the charter and by the actual practice in administration for years. In addition, the question presented was very different from that presented here. The question there was as to a position specially created by the charter, and the salary for which was fixed by the charter, but which was not enumerated in the section fixing the salaries of "officers and members" of the department. It was a reasonable conclusion that such a position was outside the scope of a general provision for such "officers and members." The question here is as to positions not created by the charter, and the salaries or wages attaching to which are not specially fixed by the charter. So far as appears, it was not brought to the attention of the court in the Maxwell Case that there were in the department, both before and after the charter, a number of employees not mentioned by the charter. Certainly no question was presented as to the status of such employees, nor was there any thought that it was being decided. It would be most unreasonable to consider that that question is now controlled by a sentence or two from a former opinion, dealing with a different question and a different state of facts. The question not being so controlled, we are free to give effect to the natural meaning of the words of the charter and to the construction adopted in actual practice, and to hold that "employees" of the department, whether they are enumerated and their salaries fixed by chapter VIII or not, are included under the designation in chapter II of "officers and members." This we do, and it is decisive of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

In re O'CONNELL. (Cr. 2306.)

1. Attorney and client ⚷39—Record conclusive evidence of conviction of attorney of offense requiring disbarment.

A record showing that an attorney was convicted of a felony or of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, which is ground for disbarment under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 1, is conclusive evidence of such conviction, and on production of such record the Supreme Court must give judgment striking the attorney from the roll of attorneys and counselors.

2. Attorney and client ⚷39—Bill of exceptions, not properly in record, cannot be considered on disbarment for conviction.

In proceedings for disbarment for conviction of a crime, matters which respondent attempted to set out in a bill of exceptions on writ of error from his conviction in the United States court, but which was held by the United States Supreme Court not a bill of exceptions because not presented until after the power of the trial court had expired, cannot be considered in the disbarment proceedings.

3. Attorney and client ⚷39—Conspiracy to violate Espionage Act involves "moral turpitude."

A conviction of an attorney for conspiracy to violate the Espionage Act June 15, 1917, § 3, making it unlawful to obstruct recruiting in time of war is a conviction for an offense involving moral turpitude, which includes those contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals, and therefore requires the disbarment of the attorney.

Disbarment proceeding against Daniel O'Connell, an attorney and counselor at law. Respondent disbarred.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding for disbarment, instituted by the filing in this court of a certified copy of the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California in the cause entitled United States of America, Plaintiff, v. Daniel O'Connell, No. 6220, from which it appears that said Daniel O'Connell was convicted therein of the crime of conspiracy to violate the act of Congress of May 18, 1917 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 2044a–2044k), and the act of Congress of June 15, 1917 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 10212a–10212h), and that by said judgment said Daniel O'Connell was on September 29, 1917, sentenced to imprisonment in the United States penitentiary at McNeil Island in the state of Washington for a period of seven years.

This judgment having been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (O'Connell v. United States, 253 U. S. 142, 40 Sup. Ct. 444, 64 L. Ed. 827) a certified copy of the judgment and mandate of such court was filed herein, and an order to show cause was thereupon made by us, requiring said Daniel O'Connell to show cause why, on account of said conviction, his name should not be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and he be precluded from practicing as such attorney or counselor in all the courts of the state. He filed a demurrer and answer, and has also filed a brief in support of his claim that his conviction constitutes no ground for disbarment.

[1] The conviction of an attorney and counselor "of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude" in a court of this or another state or in a court of the United States is ground for his disbarment, and in such a case the record of conviction is conclusive evidence of such conviction. Upon production of such a record in this court, it is made the duty of the court to proceed thereon and to give judgment striking the name of the attorney from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and precluding him from practicing as an attorney and counselor in all of the courts of the state. See Barnes v. District Court of Appeal, 178 Cal. 500, 173 Pac. 1100.

The claim of the accused is that the crime of which he was convicted did not involve moral turpitude, which he claims is an essential to disbarment when the proceeding is under subdivision 1 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, which states the cause for disbarment as follows:

> "His conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in which case the record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence."

[2] In his answer the accused sets up certain matters alleged to be shown by the so-called bill of exceptions attempted to be incorporated as a part of the record in his case on the review of the proceedings by the Supreme Court of the United States, as showing that under the circumstances of his case there was no moral turpitude on his part. We cannot even enter upon a discussion of this claim on its merits. As we have seen "the record of conviction" is made conclusive evidence in so far as this proceeding is concerned. Even if we should assume for the purposes of this decision that a properly settled bill of exceptions might properly be held to constitute a part of the "record of conviction" within the meaning of this statute, for which so far as we have seen there appears to be no authority, we have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that the bill of exceptions in this case was not presented until after the power of the trial court over the cause expired, with the result that the attempted proceedings "concerning settlement of a bill thereafter were coram non judice," and that the bill copied in the record could not be considered. See O'Connell v. United States, supra. Clearly, in view of this ruling, the so-called bill constitutes no part of "the record of conviction."

[3] The record shows that the indictment against the accused contained two counts, on each of which he was convicted. It will be necessary here to consider only the offense charged in one of these counts, viz., conspiracy to violate section 3 of the act of Congress of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 219), commonly known as the Espionage Act, in so far as the same prohibits in time of war the willful obstruction of the recruiting or enlistment service. Section 3 of that act at that time was as follows:

> "Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies" and "when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both."

From the foregoing it conclusively appears that the accused, an attorney and counselor of this state, was convicted of the crime of having willfully engaged in a conspiracy having for its definite purpose the obstruction, while the United States was at war, of the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States. The simple question remaining is whether such an offense on his part involves "moral turpitude." It seems to us that it would, indeed, be a narrow and restricted definition of the term that does not include such an offense. To put it in other words, the accused, an attorney and counselor of this state, was convicted of engaging in a conspiracy for the purpose of hindering his country, while at war, from procuring by recruiting or enlistment the military force deemed essential to the carrying on of war. That such conduct on his part would involve moral obliquity and constitute a base offense against his fellow men and his country entirely regardless of statute prohibiting it, cannot, it seems to us, be seriously questioned. It is conduct closely akin to that constituting treason, than which, in the estimation of mankind generally, nothing could be more base. Moral turpitude has been defined by many authorities as "an act of baseness, vileness, or depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to his fellow men, or to society in general, contrary to the accepted and customary rule of right and duty between man and man." See In re Henry, 15 Idaho, 755, 758, 99 Pac. 1054, 1055, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207. In the Matter of Coffey, 123 Cal. 522, 56 Pac. 448, we approved the definition of turpitude given by Bouvier, viz. anything done "contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals." We entertain no doubt that the offense with which the accused was charged and of which he was convicted comes within these definitions. As we have already said, it is not for us to determine whether or not he was in fact guilty of this offense, our statute making the conviction the ground of disbarment, and the record thereof conclusive.

It is ordered that the name of Daniel O'Connell be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and that he be precluded from practicing as an attorney or counselor in all the courts of this state.

ARNOLD v. SAN RAMON VALLEY BANK.

(S. F. 9349.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑134(1)—Deposit in wife's name held that of husband as to right of set-off.

Where a depositor transferred his account to his wife's name to protect it from his creditors with the bank's knowledge and consent, but thereafter drew checks against the account in his own name, which were honored by the bank and charged to the account, the account must be treated as the account of the depositor, not as that of his wife, as respects the bank's right of set-off.

2. Banks and banking 🔑119—Deposit is mere debt.

The relation between a general depositor and a bank is that of debtor and creditor, the moneys deposited becoming the property of the bank for which it becomes indebted to the depositor.

3. Assignments 🔑49 — Banks and banking 🔑138—Check creates no lien against deposit.

A check drawn against a general deposit in a bank creates no lien upon the money on deposit, and does not operate as an equitable assignment of the deposit, or any interest therein.

4. Banks and banking 🔑134(1) — Bank can set off depositor's debt against deposit.

A bank to which a depositor is indebted can set off against the deposit the amount of the debt owed by the depositor.

5. Banks and banking 🔑134(7) — Bank can set off against deposit of trust funds of which bank had no notice.

Where a depositor who was indebted to the bank deposited to his general account funds intrusted to him for a special purpose, the bank can set off its claim against the depositor against such deposit if it had no notice of the trust.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Marten Arnold against the San Ramon Valley Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and judgment directed for defendant.

Chas. E. Snook, of Oakland, for appellant.

W. S. Tinning and A. B. Tinning, both of Martinez, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment. The record on appeal consists of the judgment roll alone. The judgment was for $500, and was based on the following facts set forth in the findings: Several years prior to 1916 one Wallace Taylor became indebted to the defendant upon a promissory note to the amount of $700. In February, 1916, he gave a new note in renewal thereof and it became due June 30, 1916. From December, 1915, to August 7, 1916, Taylor had a regular ordinary deposit account with the defendant. Prior to May 8, 1916, the account of said Taylor was kept in his own name, but on that day, at the request of the defendant, the same was changed, and was thereafter kept in the name of Clara Taylor, wife of said Wallace Taylor. At that time defendant knew that Taylor was financially embarrassed, and the change was made in the name of the account in order to protect the deposit against demands by creditors of Taylor. Said Clara Taylor had no interest in the account or in any of the moneys which were then, or were thereafter to be, deposited therein. Taylor was engaged in the business of buying and selling live stock, both for his own account and for others on commission, acting as a broker. This was known to the defendant. On August 3, 1916, the plaintiff intrusted to Taylor, as such broker, the sum of $500, instructing him to use the same in buying live stock and selling the same for the plaintiff. On that day Taylor deposited with the defendant to the said account in the name of Clara Taylor said sum of $500 so intrusted to him by the plaintiff, and the same was placed to the credit of Clara Taylor, and it was then agreed between Clara Taylor and the defendant that any checks which might thereafter be drawn by Wallace Taylor against the defendant should be paid out of the moneys so deposited in the name of Clara Taylor. Thereafter Wallace Taylor, pursuant to his agreement with plaintiff, purchased live stock for the account of plaintiff to the aggregate amount of $500, and between August 3 and August 6, 1916, he gave checks therefor to the persons from whom he bought the same on the said account of Clara Taylor with the defendant, amounting to $500. Between August 3 and August 12, 1916, said checks were presented to the defendant for payment, and payment was refused. Wallace Taylor never notified the defendant that the said $500 was not his own property, nor that the same had been intrusted to him as a broker for the plaintiff or any other person, and the defendant did not know said facts until long after it credited said account on said note. On the day said deposit was made the defendant requested said Clara Taylor to apply the deposit, or a portion thereof, toward the payment of said note of Wallace Taylor. She refused to do so, and informed the defendant that checks had been drawn by Wallace Taylor against said account. On August 7, 1916, while the defendant still held said promissory note of Wallace Taylor, and while it was still unpaid, the defendant applied thereon, in satisfaction thereof to that extent, the sum of $713.44, the same being the balance then remaining on deposit in the aforesaid account in the name of Clara Taylor, and said sum was thereupon credited upon said note and charged to said account. On August 5, 1916, checks on said account drawn by Wallace Taylor, amounting to $250, were presented to the bank for payment, but payment was refused on the ground that there were not sufficient funds in the account to pay said checks. Neither Arnold nor Taylor consented to said application of the money in said account. Taylor expressly objected thereto at the time the application was made, and made his objection known to the defendant.

[1] The deposit in the defendant bank in the name of Clara Taylor did not belong to her, and she had no interest therein. Her name was used solely for convenience. It was her husband's account carried under her name, and his checks thereon were to be honored after the change of name as before. This clearly appears from the facts found, and it is not disputed. The case must therefore be decided in the same manner as if the deposit account had remained in the name of Wallace Taylor. It was a general account between him and the bank.

[2] "It is well settled here that the relation between a general depositor and the bank in which his deposit is made is simply that of debtor and creditor. The moneys deposited immediately become the property of the bank, and the latter becomes the debtor of the depositor for the amount of the deposit, the same being payable on demand and on checks of the creditor." Smiths' Cash Store v. First National Bank, 149 Cal. 34, 84 Pac. 664, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 870; Janin v. London, etc., Bank, 92 Cal. 22, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82; People v. Wilson, 117 Cal. 243, 49 Pac. 135; Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 172, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; Plumas County Bank v. Rideout Bank, 165 Cal. 138, 131 Pac. 360, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552.

[4] Since the relation between Taylor and the bank, growing out of the deposit, was that of creditor and debtor, and the debt of Taylor was due, it follows that the bank had the right of set-off to the extent of any debt it then held against Taylor. The debt due from the bank to Taylor on account of the deposit and the note of Taylor to the bank were cross-demands. If either had sued the other upon such demand, the other could have pleaded the cross-demand as a counterclaim. Consequently, the two demands are "deemed compensated so far as they equal each other." Code Civ. Proc. § 440; McKean v. German S. Bank, 118 Cal. 341, 50 Pac. 656; Ainsworth v. Bank, 119 Cal. 474, 51 Pac. 952, 39 L. R. A. 686, 63 Am. St. Rep. 135; People v. California, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 241, 141 Pac. 1181, L. R. A. 1915A, 299; Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 257, 135 Pac. 970; Morse on Banks (5th Ed.) § 304. This establishes the proposition that, so far as Taylor and the bank were concerned, the bank had the right to balance the account and discharge its lien thereon by crediting the amount thereof on the note due to it from Taylor.

Our Civil Code provides that—

> "A banker has a general lien, dependent on possession, upon all property in his hands belonging to a customer, for the balance due to him from such customer in the course of the business." Civ. Code, sec. 3054.

This is but a restatement of a well-known rule of commercial law. Under this rule the defendant had the right to refuse payment of checks and to apply the amount of the deposit as a credit on its note against Taylor, thus discharging the lien and balancing the account.

[5] The plaintiff contends that where the money deposited actually belonged to another person, and the depositor held it in trust for the true owner at the time of making the deposit, this rule does not hold good against the true owner, and that, upon proof that it was so held in trust, he may recover it from the bank, notwithstanding the fact that the banker had no knowledge of such trust relation or of the character of the money deposited. We understand the rule to be otherwise. No exception of this character is found in the statement of the rule in section 3054. The question was directly involved in Willey v. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank, 141 Cal. 508, 75 Pac. 106, and it was there decided contrary to the claim of plaintiff. One A. B. Perry had a general deposit account with the bank in the name of A. B. Perry & Co. When the account was opened he was the sole owner of the business carried on under that name. He used that name for appearances only, but expected at some time to take a partner in with him. These facts were stated to the bank when the account was opened. Soon afterwards he transferred an interest in the business to a corporation as a partner therein. Thereafter the partnership business was conducted under the name of A. B. Perry & Co., as before, and the fact that the corporation was a partner was kept secret from the bank from that time forward. After this partnership was thus formed Perry became personally indebted to the bank on a note, and the bank charged the amount of said note on the said deposit account, and credited the note as having been paid in full. The court held that the bank had a right to set off the note against the account by crediting one against the other, notwithstanding the fact that the corporate partner had an equitable interest in the account. The essential facts in that case are the same as in the case at bar. In 7 Cor. Jur., at page 659, the rule is stated as follows:

> "It is usually considered, however, that where a bank has no notice that funds deposited are held by the depositor in trust, it may apply such deposit to the depositor's debt without becoming liable to the beneficial owner."

There is a footnate to this statement which gives a long list of decisions in the several states, all of which support the text. In 111 Am. St. Rep. at page 419, appears a note to Garrison v. Union T. Co., 139 Mich. 392, 102 N. W. 978, 70 L. R. A. 615, 5 Ann. Cas. 813, in which note the cases are also collected, showing that the majority are largely in support of the position of the defendant here. Another full citation of cases may be found in McStay S. Co. v. Stoddard, 35 Nev. at page 297, 132 Pac. 545. We need not repeat these citations here. The point is so well established by authority, both in this state and elsewhere, that we deem it unnecessary to discuss it on principle.

The plaintiff relies on Burtnett v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Mich. 630; Shotwell v. Sioux F. S. Bank, 34 S. D. 109, 147 N. W. 288, L. R. A. 1915A, 715; Cady v. South Omaha Bank, 46 Neb. 756, 65 N. W. 906, and cases in Texas and South Carolina, all of which appear to hold the opposite doctrine to that above stated. In Michigan the later case of Garrison v. Union T. Co., supra, follows the prevailing rule and apparently overrules the Burtnett Case, although it does not mention it. So, also, in Nebraska a later decision indicates that the Cady Case has been repudiated there. Globe Sav. Bank v. Nat. Bank of Commerce, 64 Neb. 413, 89 N. W. 1030. We are not disposed to follow these cases, in view of the thoroughly established rule to the contrary.

For these reasons we think the court erred in its conclusions of law in favor of the plaintiff, and that the judgment should have been for the defendant.

The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment for the defendant.

MOUND WATER CO. et al. v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. et al.

1. Waters and water courses ⟹217—Water company held not public utility subject to jurisdiction of Railroad Commission.

Where owners of certain lands organized a water company to obtain water for such lands, and furnished the money for acquisition and construction of the water system, with the understanding that their lands were to be supplied with water before water could be furnished other lands, and that the right to such water was to be appurtenant to their land, and where the system was sold to another corporation under agreement whereby purchaser agreed to furnish specified amount of water to such lands at specified rate, purchaser and its successor in interest were not subject to the control of the Railroad Commission, under Utilities Acts of 1911 and 1913, in so far as water to be furnished such owners was concerned, but held the system in trust for benefit of such owners until their lands were supplied.

2. Evidence ⟹48—Judicial notice not taken of decision of Railroad Commission.

The court will not take judicial notice of a decision of the Railroad Commission.

⟹For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

3. Judgment ⚿948(1)—Adjudication by Railroad Commission must be pleaded.

An adjudication of the Railroad Commission, to constitute a defense, must be pleaded.

4. Evidence ⚿22(1)—No judicial notice as to character of corporations.

Courts do not take judicial notice as to public utility character of corporations.

5. Pleading ⚿205(3)—Defects in form objected to by special demurrer.

Where complaint states a cause of action, defects in form must be objected to by special demurrer.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Mound Water Company and others against the Southern California Edison Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Argabrite & Drapeau, of Ventura, for appellants.

Harry J. Bauer, Robert M. Clarke, and Roy V. Reppy, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendants demurred to the complaint on two grounds: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the action; (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court below sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

The complaint contains five counts. They each relate to the alleged failure of the defendant Southern California Edison Company, hereinafter called Edison Company, to furnish water to or for the stockholders of the plaintiff Mound Water Company, hereinafter called Water Company, for use upon their several and respective tracts of land in accordance with an agreement made on February 1, 1907, between the Water Company and a corporation known as the Ventura County Power Company, transferring to the latter the water sources and system of distribution of the former, under which agreement the Edison Company, as successor in interest of the Power Company, holds such rights as it has in the water in question. The plaintiffs Sexton and Harkey are holders of stock in the said Water Company, and join as plaintiffs for that reason, claiming water rights under said agreement.

The complaint alleges the making of the agreement above mentioned between the Water Company and the Power Company and the subsequent execution of a deed by the Power Company to the Edison Company transferring to the latter all the rights of said Power Company under said agreement. The said agreement, and also certain so-called rules for distribution of water mentioned therein, are set forth as exhibits to the complaint and are expressly made a part thereof. The first count alleges that the Edison Company in June, 1918, refused to deliver any water to the plaintiff George S. Sexton, to which it is alleged he was entitled under said agreement, and which he demanded. The second count alleges a similar refusal to deliver water to the plaintiff Harkey for use on his land under said agreement. The third count alleges that the Water Company on behalf of its stockholders, on June 1, 1918, demanded of the Edison Company that it should deliver to said stockholders, naming them, certain quantities of water specified for each, amounting to 150 inches, as the same should be demanded by said stockholders, and that said company failed and refused to furnish the water in accordance with said notice. The fourth count alleges that the present daily capacity of said water system was no greater than a constant daily flow of 90 miners' inches of water, that said Edison Company proposed to supply therefrom to one Chrisman, who was not a stockholder of said Water Company, water sufficient for 77 acres of land that was not entitled to water from said system, all of which was in violation of the said agreement; that the needs of the stockholders of the Water Company will require a constant daily flow of 150 miners' inches for the season of 1918, and the same in future years, and that the result would be that the stockholders of the Water Company would be deprived of water to which they were entitled from said system. The fifth count, in effect, alleged that the Edison Company, in violation of said agreement, had for the year preceding July 1, 1918, failed and neglected to develop more than a constant daily flow of 90 miners' inches of water from said water system; that the same was capable of producing a constant daily flow of more than 150 miners' inches; that the said plaintiff and its stockholders entitled to the use of said water, would, by reason of nonuser, lose all rights to water from said system in excess of the constant daily flow so maintained by said Edison Company, and that the said stockholders entitled to the water needed the full amount of 150 miners' inches to properly irrigate their lands upon which they are entitled to use said water. The prayer of the complaint is that the defendants be restrained from delivering or disposing of any waters of said water system to said Chrisman or to any person, other than to said Water Company for the use and benefit of its stockholders upon their respective tracts of land set forth in the agreement referred to, until said defendants shall first have delivered the water necessary for the use and benefit of such stockholders, to wit, a constant daily flow of 150 miners' inches as provided in said agreement, and that said Edison Company, by mandatory injunction, be ordered and directed "to develop from said Mound Water System not less than a constant daily flow of 150 miners' inches of water for the use and benefit of the stockholders of said Mound Water Company."

The theory of the complaint is that the waters which the respective stockholders claim the right to receive are private property, not dedicated to public use, that under the agreement referred to said stockholders have the right to receive the same for use upon their respective tracts of land, and that the Water Company, as agent and trustee for them, has the right to maintain this action in their behalf. The soundness of this theory obviously depends upon the terms of the agreement set forth in the complaint.

The agreement purports to be tripartite in character. The Mound Water Company was named as party of the first part, Ventura County Power Company, as party of the second part, and 27 persons described as stockholders of the Mound Water Company as parties of the third part. Said stockholders, however, did not sign the agreement, but the covenants of the agreement appear to have been made in their behalf and for their benefit.

It first recites that the parties of the third part owned all of the issued stock of the Water Company and hold one share of stock for each acre of their lands, respectively. It then sets forth the holdings of stock by each one of the stockholders, respectively, naming them, and describes the respective tracts of land owned by each stockholder, stating the number of acres in each tract. The number of acres correspond to the number of shares of stock owned by such stockholder. Then follows a recital, setting forth the terms of the resolution adopted at a stockholders' meeting of said Water Company, authorizing the execution of the agreement. It then declares that the Water Company, in consideration of the covenants and agreements of the Power Company therein set forth, grants, sells, assigns and transfers unto the Power Company all of the property embraced in and pertaining to the water system of the said Water Company, describing it at length, including the water sources and supply, and that in consideration thereof the said Power Company thereby granted, sold, assigned, and transferred unto the Water Company, for the use of its said stockholders and their successors in interest in the lands thereinbefore described as belonging to them and for use upon said lands, 150 miners' inches of water from said system, to be delivered by said Power Company on said lands at 25 cents per miners' inch of the water furnished and used by said stockholders, respectively. It further declared that said 150 inches of water so granted to said Water Company should be appurtenant to the aforesaid lands of said stockholders and should be an absolute right in the Water Company, that said stockholders were to have said 150 inches of water so delivered on said lands from the present water system, and that said water should be so delivered by said Power Company to said respective stockholders "in accordance with the rules for distribution now obtaining in said party of the first part for the distribution of water to its stockholders at such times and in such quantities as said (stockholders) may respectively in writing request; it being understood that said 150 miners' inches of water in this indenture granted to said party of the first part shall constitute and be a part of such water so to be delivered to said stockholders." There was a further agreement by the Power Company to deliver to said stockholders water for stock and domestic purposes on the said lands at the price of $25 a year for each 100,000 gallons of water so supplied. The Power Company further convenanted to maintain and keep in repair and use the system so obtained, and that no other or different system should be used to supply water to said stockholders without the consent of the Water Company, and that it would so use and maintain the water rights and property so transferred to it that no forfeiture or diminution should be permitted to arise or happen, and so that no adverse right or rights should be permitted to accrue as against the right of the said Power Company and said Water Company therein or thereto. It further appears by said agreement that the Water Company was organized and exists for the purpose of furnishing and supplying to its stockholders water for use on their lands, and that the stockholders by and through said Water Company had expended more than $75,000 in the purchase of the water-bearing lands, and water rights, and in the construction of the works for the delivery thereof to the said lands, which constituted the water supply, distributing system, and works so transferred to said Power Company.

The rules for water distribution referred to in said agreement and made a part of the complaint are contained in the by-laws of said Water Company. They provide that each share of water stock shall be definitely allotted to an acre of land, and that no transfer of stock should be made so as to alienate the water from the land to which it was originally applied, and that no stockholder shall own more shares of stock than he has acres of land. And further that every stockholder should receive his share of water in a certain order specified therein, naming each person and giving his consecutive number. Also that no stockholder should receive more than 6 inches of water for each acre of his land, without the consent of the majority of the stockholders, and that an annual assessment of 6 cents per share should be paid by the stockholders.

[1] From this statement it appears that the water supply and water system owned and operated by said Water Company in 1907, when said agreement was made, was acquired and constructed with money paid to the company for that purpose by its stockholders; that this was done under an arrangement and with the understanding that the system was to be operated by said Water Company to produce from said sources water to the extent of 150 miners' inches and distribute the same by means of the pipes and conduits of the system to the said stockholders, to the extent of their needs, for use on the lands described in the agreement, to each stockholder in the proportion which the acreage of his land bore to the total acreage of all the lands described, and to no other lands until after those lands were supplied. Also that such rights were appurtenant to the respective tracts of land. This water and the system of distribution thereof were therefore held in trust by the Water Company for the benefit of its stockholders, and, until said lands were supplied, for the stockholders only. The Water Company was therefore nothing more or less than an agency whereby the stockholders procured the water for use on their own lands, exclusively, in the proportions stated. Nothing in the agreement or in the allegations of the complaint indicates any intention on the part of said Water Company or its stockholders to devote any part of said 150 inches to public use. As this trust was impressed upon the properties when it was conveyed to the Edison Company, the trust and the corresponding duty remained upon it thereafter, and that company is bound to perform it.

It is a well-established proposition that a water system of this character, so owned and controlled, is not a public utility, and that the water owned, held and used in that manner is not dedicated to public use or subject to control by public authority. The Water Company was of the class designated in our decisions as a mutual water company. The case is not distinguishable in any material particular from McFadden v. Los Angeles County, 74 Cal. 571, 16 Pac. 397. That was a proceeding in mandate to compel the board of supervisors to fix the water rates to be charged by the Anaheim Union Water Company. The company was a corporation formed for the purpose of supplying water to the owners of certain lands. The waters it owned were acquired and held for use on the lands of stockholders only, and not for sale, distribution, or rental. No water was to be sold or used by any one except the stockholders, or was to be used on land not covered by stock of the company. It was not intended that the water so held was to be sold, rented, or used in any way to accumulate funds with which to pay a dividend. The court held that the board of supervisors was not authorized to fix rates under the Constitution (article 14, § 1), or under the act of 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 95). It was said:

> "An individual can certainly acquire water to be used on his own land. With such use a board of supervisors would have nothing to do. We know of no reason why individuals cannot associate themselves, take on a corporate form, and acquire water to be used on their own lands. When this is done, we are of opinion that a board of supervisors can have no more power over the rates to be paid by the stockholders than in the case of individuals."

This opinion was reaffirmed in McDermott v. Anaheim, etc., Co., 124 Cal. 114, 56 Pac. 779. In that case it was held, with respect to the same corporation, that a stockholder could maintain an action to enjoin the corporation from supplying water to persons who were not stockholders of the company, where it was made to appear that the effect would be to deprive the stockholders of a portion of the water necessary for their use on their lands. The same general doctrine was announced in Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 518, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331, and Hildreth v. Montecito Water Co., 139 Cal. 29, 72 Pac. 395. In the latter case it was said that the constitutional provision did not "cover the proposition that all water which is distributed among a number of persons is, from that fact alone, to be considered as devoted to a public use." There are many cases in which the rights served by corporations of this character have been considered by this court, and in none of them is there any suggestion that such disposition or distribution constitutes a public use. The cases are collected and cited in Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal., on pages 135 and 136, 128 Pac. on page 28. In that case the subject was elaborately considered, all the cases were reviewed, and it was held that, where a water company was organized for the purpose of selling water to certain designated persons selected by it at the time of its organization, or to its stockholders alone for use on their lands, and to no other person, such sale and distribution of water did not constitute a public use. We refer to that case for a more complete discussion of the subject.

In the respondents' brief it is suggested that the Water Company had sold some of the water to persons other than stockholders, presumably for profit, and from this it is argued that the company must have been selling water for public use. Even if this were shown by the complaint, it would not affect the right to the water necessary for the lands of the stockholders described in the agreement. Under the trust shown therein and by the terms of the by-laws it would have no right to dispose of any part of the 150 miners' inches to public use or at all, to the detriment of its own stockholders. That portion of the water was set apart for their use and its conduct in selling it contrary to their rights would not give it the right to continue to do so or make it a public utility as to that water, without the consent of its stockholders. Furthermore, whenever there was a surplus, either from an excess of supply over the needs of the stockholders, or from the fact that the stockholders at particular times did not need all of the 150 inches, while the company might perhaps dispose of such surplus to whoever should apply for it and would be thereby devoting such surplus to public use, it would not affect the part of the water appropriated to the preferred private use of the stockholders. It has been held that a water company may devote a part of its water supply to private use and the excess thereof to public use, or it may dedicate a portion of its water to a public use, and reserve the remainder, if any, for some private use, although it cannot, after dedicating any part to public use, transform any of that part into a private use, without the consent of the proper public authority. Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 680, 140 Pac. 591, 948; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 86, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213; Thayer v. California Development Co., supra. But really these questions are not before us, for the fact does not appear on the face of the complaint, and no controvertible fact not alleged can be considered on demurrer.

[2, 3] It is further suggested that in a certain proceeding before the Railroad Commission in the matter of an application of the Ventura County Power Company for an increase in rates for the water so obtained by it from said Water Company, the commission decided that the Ventura County Power Company held that water for public use, but denied its application to increase the rates. It is argued that this was an adjudication as to the character of the Power Company, and that when it conveyed the water system to the Edison Company the water remained subject to the public use. It is unnecessary here to determine the effect of that decision. The court does not take judicial notice of it, and the question can only be raised by an answer setting up the defense of former adjudication. It may be suggested, however, that it does not appear from anything said in the briefs that the plaintiffs in the present action were parties to the proceeding before the Railroad Commission.

[4] It is also suggested that the court will take judicial notice of the fact that the Edison Company is a public service corporation, and from this fact that upon its acquisition of this water the same became devoted to public use, even if it were not so previously. There is nothing in the complaint to show that the Edison Company was a corporation of that character. The courts do not take judicial notice of such matters. Furthermore, even if it was of that character it could not, under the allegations of the complaint, convert the private use, to which the water was subjected when it obtained title thereto, into a public use such as that claimed by respondent, unless the stockholders of the Water Company, who were interested in the private use and entitled thereto, had consented thereto. Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, supra, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948. No such consent appears in the complaint. If the facts exist they must be set up by way of defense before the defendants can take advantage thereof.

Reference is made to the definitions of public utilities in the Public Utilities Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1394), and in the act of 1913, defining the conditions under which a water corporation shall be deemed to be a public utility subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. Stats. 1913, p. 84. The status of this water depends upon the terms of the agreement set forth in the complaint. That was executed in 1907. It should require no argument to establish the proposition that a statutory definition of a public utility, or of the conditions under which water shall be deemed to have been devoted to public use, could have no effect whatever upon private property or water devoted to private use prior to the enactment of the statute. Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, supra, 167 Cal. 680, 140 Pac. 591, 948.

It follows from what we have said that the Railroad Commission had no power or authority over the water or the water system, so far as the water necessary for the use of said stockholders of the Water Company was concerned, and that the superior court had jurisdiction of the action. It appears that the learned judge of the court below sustained the demurrer upon the theory that the jurisdiction was exclusively in the commission. In this we are satisfied that he erred.

[5] As against a general demurrer, the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants. Some of the allegations may be defective in form, but it is clear that the court below did not sustain the demurrer on that ground. Defects of that character should have been raised by special demurrer, and if well taken the plaintiff should have had leave to amend if so advised.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 2322.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1920.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1023(8), 1134(10)—An order denying motion in arrest is not appealable.

An order denying a motion in arrest is not an appealable order, and any error in denying such motion may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment.

2. Criminal law 🔑311—One accused is presumed sane.

A person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is established by a preponderance of evidence.

3. Criminal law 🔑48—For "insanity" to be a defense, insane person must be incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong.

For "insanity" to be a defense in a criminal action, there must be such a deranged condition of the mental faculties as to render a person incapable of knowing the nature and quality of the act he is charged with doing, or, if he did know this, such a derangement as made him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Insane—Insanity.]

4. Criminal law 🔑493—The weight of opinion evidence is for the jury.

In a prosecution for homicide the weight and credibility of testimony of intimate acquaintances of defendant who gave opinion evidence as to his insanity under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, is for the jury.

5. Homicide 🔑237—Jury held warranted in finding defendant sane.

In a prosecution for wife murder defended on ground of insanity, held, that despite testimony as to insanity the jury were warranted in finding that defendant was sane.

6. Criminal law 🔑824(2)—Failure to define preponderance of evidence not error in the absence of request.

Where defendant requested no instruction explaining the term "preponderance of the evidence," failure to instruct thereon was not error; the term so clearly expressing its significance.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

George C. Williams was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from judgment of conviction and from orders denying new trial, and motion in arrest of judgment, he appeals. Affirmed.

Harold C. Faulkner and K. Green, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Matthew Brady, and Stanislaus Riley, all of San Francisco, for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree for the killing of his wife, Emily Williams, on February 7, 1920. He appeals from the judgment pronounced upon such conviction, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment.

[1] The order denying the motion in arrest of judgment is not an appealable order. Any error of a trial court in denying such a motion is reviewable on the appeal from the judgment. There is no suggestion that the trial court erred in denying the motion in this case. It is clear that the information presented and filed against him in the superior court was without defect of any kind. Section 1185, Pen. Code.

The only defense in the case was that defendant committed the act charged without being conscious thereof, and that he was temporarily insane. The undisputed facts left little room for any other defense than insanity. Mrs. Williams had left the apartment at 275 Turk street, where she and her husband were living, about two months prior to February 7, 1920, and thenceforth they lived separate and apart, she, with a daughter by a former marriage, at the Bernal Apartments on Seventeenth street near Church street, and he at the King Edward Apartments at 275 Turk street. She had commenced an action for a divorce, and issue had been joined therein and the case set for trial. An order for the payment of temporary alimony had been made, and deceased was endeavoring to collect the same, none of which was ever paid. According to defendant's story, he was earnestly seeking her return to him. During the afternoon of February 7, 1920, he got into telephonic communication with her, she then being in the apartment of a friend, a Mrs. Brown, in the King Edward Apartment building, and she definitely informed him that she would not return to him. A little later in the afternoon, when deceased and Mrs. Brown left the building to go to the office of the attorney of the former, they encountered defendant on the street at the entrance to the building, and he made a violent assault upon the deceased and endeavored to drag her back into the building. She managed to escape, and, with Mrs. Brown, went to the Hall of Justice and procured a warrant for the arrest of defendant. Later she and Mrs. Brown started for the apartment of deceased, taking a street car for the corner of Church and Seventeenth streets. In the meantime defendant purchased a revolver at a pawnbroker's place on Third street near Market street, and, with the same fully loaded in his possession, went first to the apartment occupied by deceased on Seventeenth street near Church street. He gained access to the apartment, but was ordered out by the landlady when complaint of his presence was made by the daughter of deceased. He then left the house and went to the corner of Church and Seventeenth streets, near which place he was when the street car on which were deceased and Mrs. Brown arrived. When they saw him after deceased alighted from the car, deceased started to run to her apartment, and defendant pursued her. The daughter, who had come out to meet her mother attempted to stop him, succeeding in taking hold of him, and he shot her, inflicting a mortal wound, and continued his pursuit of deceased. He overtook her and shot her twice, she imploring him not to shoot, and as the result of the wounds inflicted she died almost immediately. The evidence as a whole was such as to show very clearly that he went to the neighborhood of his wife's habitation with the deliberate purpose of putting her to death, unless she would return to him, and that he killed her in pursuance of such deliberate intent. In view of the record, his testimony to the effect that he remembered nothing that occurred between about 12 noon on February 7th and the next morning is so incredible as to be unworthy of consideration, and there is nothing else to suggest that he was not "conscious" of what he was doing when he sought out and killed his wife.

[2, 3] It is conceded, of course, that in this state it is the well-settled rule that a person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is established by a preponderance of evidence, and that insanity interposed as a defense in a criminal action means such a diseased and deranged condition of the mental faculties as to render the person incapable of knowing the nature and quality of the act he is charged with doing, or if he did know this, incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to such act.

[4, 5] It is claimed here that, in view of certain evidence introduced on behalf of defendant in an attempt to show insanity, the "preponderance of the evidence" was in favor of that theory. The prosecution introduced no evidence addressed exclusively to this question, resting on the presumption of sanity and the evidence of the acts and conduct of the defendant, as shown by all the evidence in the case, including various statements made by him to officers of the law, one of which was made during the evening of February 7th. The claim of defendant in this regard appears to be that there was no evidence to contradict that of certain alleged "intimate acquaintances" who were allowed to give their opinions as to his mental sanity (subdivision 10, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc.) based on their observation of him during the few weeks that elapsed between the commencement of the divorce action and the homicide. To our minds this opinion evidence was, in view of the reasons given for the opinions, of very slight value on the question of the existence of such a condition of mind as would be a defense in this case. In any event, the question of the weight and credibility to be given the testimony of these witnesses was solely for the jury, and the testimony was to be considered by the jury in connection with all the other evidence as to the acts and conduct of the defendant, all of which was material on the question of insanity. To our minds there is no warrant whatever, in the light afforded by the record, for a claim that the evidence in favor of the theory of insanity preponderates over that in favor of the theory of sanity, and certainly no warrant for a claim that the jury was not fully justified in concluding from all the evidence that insanity was not shown by a preponderance of the evidence bearing on that question. As we said in People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 652, 154 Pac. 468, 470:

> "The term [preponderance of evidence] simply means what it says, viz., that the evidence on one side outweighs, preponderates over, is more than, the evidence on the other side, not necessarily in number of witnesses or quantity, but in its effect on those to whom it is addressed."

[6] It is urged that the trial court erred to the substantial prejudice of defendant in failing to give an instruction as to what was meant by the term "preponderance of the evidence." No such instruction was requested by defendant, and to our minds no intimation given the trial court that such an instruction was desired. We cannot see that the requested instruction relied on by defendant in this connection was of such a nature as to suggest to the court any such desire. In the absence of such a request or intimation the defendant should not be heard here to complain of the failure of the court to give such an instruction. The term "preponderance of the evidence" so clearly expresses its meaning as to make so plain to the ordinary mind what is intended thereby that further definition is not ordinarily requisite to a proper understanding by a jury. We cannot conceive that the absence of such an instruction here in any degree operated to the prejudice of defendant.

Consideration of the record herein satisfies us that the trial of the defendant was in all respects fair and free from substantial error and that the verdict was fully justified by the evidence.

The appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SNEIDER v. BANK OF ITALY.
(S. F. 9429.)

Rehearing Denied Jan. 24, 1921.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑139 — Payment of check after knowledge of depositor's death makes bank liable to estate.

Under Civ. Code, § 3265e, providing that a bank check is not an assignment of the funds until the bank accepts or certifies the check, the vitality of a check, not accepted or certified prior to knowledge of the depositor's death, ceases upon receipt of such knowledge by the bank, and if the bank thereafter pays the check it is liable to the depositor's estate.

2. Banks and banking 🔑320 — Adjustment between banks through clearing house held not "payment" of check.

A clearing house transaction, whereby checks were delivered to the representative of the bank upon which they were drawn, and the bank presenting them received money or credit to cover their amount, did not in itself constitute a payment of the check, preventing the drawee bank from subsequently refusing payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Payment.]

3. Banks and banking 🔑320—Check presented through clearing house and rejected not paid, though wrong reason given.

Checks presented through a clearing house were not paid, where the bank on which they were drawn refused payment and returned them to the presenting bank, though it erroneously stated as a reason for refusing payment that they were not drawn on it.

4. Banks and banking 🔑319—Rules of clearing house not binding on parties to check.

The rules of a clearing house as such do not govern the rights of a drawer or payee of a check who are not members of the clearing house, and do not contract with express reference to such rules.

5. Banks and banking 🔑140(1)—Payment of check may be refused without reason without liability to drawee.

In view of Civ. Code, § 3265e, a drawee bank can refuse to pay a check for no reason at all without incurring any liability to the payee, and where such refusal is made there is no payment of the check.

6. Banks and banking 🔑320—Bank, directing that rejected checks be again put through clearing house, not entitled to pay them after depositor's death.

Where a bank to which checks were presented through the clearing house refused payment, erroneously stating that they were not drawn on it, and, when the error was brought to its attention by telephone, directed the presenting bank to again put them through the clearing house, but the depositor died before they were again presented, such direction did not amount to actual payment, or an agreement to pay entitling it to make payment after the depositor's death, especially where it did not debit the depositor's account with their amount, but honored other checks, leaving insufficient funds to meet the checks in question.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Emma Sneider, as administratrix of George C. Sneider, deceased, against the Bank of Italy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco (McKannay & Hunt, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Tum Suden & tum Suden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff, the administratrix of the estate of George C. Sneider, deceased, is suing to recover the sum of $838.35, claimed to be the balance due on account of moneys deposited with defendant, the Bank of Italy, by said George C. Sneider during his lifetime. The present litigation is the outgrowth of a dispute over the payment of two checks for $600 each, drawn by George Sneider against his account with said defendant bank. These two checks, which were drawn on March 13, 1918, were indorsed by the payee and delivered to the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank on March 14, 1918, and on the same day were sent to the clearing house by the last-named bank. At the clearing house the checks were delivered to the clearing house representative of the Bank of Italy, and, in turn, for the purpose of clearing the accounts between the two banks, the Bank of Italy gave money or credit to the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank to cover the amount represented by the Sneider checks. When the checks reached the Bank of Italy, they were rejected by that bank, which sent them back to the Wells Fargo Bank by messenger on the afternoon of March 14, 1918. A slip was attached to the checks, stating that the reason for the rejection was the fact that they were not drawn upon the Bank of Italy. This statement was a self-evident error; there was, however, some evidence tending to show that, when the checks reached the Bank of Italy, there were not sufficient funds in Sneider's account to cover them, by reason of overdrafts, and that this was the real reason for the rejection. The Wells Fargo Bank, upon receiving the rejected checks, issued its own check to the Bank of Italy for $1,200 in order to return the sum received on account of the two checks in the clearing house transaction that morning. This check was subsequently cashed by the Bank of Italy.

Later in the afternoon of March 14, 1918, after the Wells Fargo Bank's teller had issued the refunding check and the messenger of the Bank of Italy had departed with it, it was discovered that the reason assigned for the rejection of the checks in question was obviously erroneous. One of the clerks of the Wells Fargo Bank telephoned to the Bank of Italy and talked with "some one," it does not appear whom, about the matter. The last-mentioned person directed that the checks be returned to the Bank of Italy by the messenger, but, upon being informed that the messenger had left, told the clerk of the Wells Fargo Bank to put them through the clearing house again. Accordingly, the Wells Fargo Bank sent these checks to the clearing house on the morning of March 15. When they again reached the Bank of Italy, the latter again rejected them, this time on the ground that Sneider, the drawer of the checks, had died that morning. A second reclamation was made against the Wells Fargo Bank and $1,200, covering the checks in question, was included in a check issued by the Wells Fargo Bank to the Bank of Italy by way of reclamation, although it is claimed that the Wells Fargo Bank in fact refused to reclaim these checks a second time, and that the $1,200 was included in the refunding check by mistake. After considerable controversy with the Wells Fargo Bank and the administratrix, the Bank of Italy turned $1,200 over to the Wells Fargo Bank, took up the two checks, and, on March 29, 1918, charged Sneider's account with the amount of the checks, leaving Sneider's estate chargeable with an overdraft of $361.61.

The trial court held that the administratrix was entitled to recover the amount on deposit at the time of death of the intestate without any deduction on account of the two $600 checks, and, accordingly rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $838.35. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] In this state a bank check is a direction by a creditor to a debtor for the disposition of funds, and it does not operate as an assignment of the funds themselves unless and until the bank accepts or certifies the check. Civ. Code, § 3265e. Consequently the vitality of a check, at least where it has not been accepted or certified prior to the knowledge of the death of the depositor, ceases upon receipt of such knowledge by the bank, and a bank which pays such a check after knowledge of the death of the depositor is liable to the estate of the depositor. Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; 35 Ann. Cas. 443, note; 7 C. J. 702. The sole issue in the present case is therefore whether or not the two $600 checks drawn by the decedent were paid by the defendant bank prior to the morning of March 15, 1918.

[2] The clearing house transaction on the morning of March 14, wherein the Wells Fargo Bank received the amount of the two checks from the Bank of Italy in credit or otherwise, did not, in and of itself, constitute a payment of the checks. As stated in Hentz v. Nat. City Bank, 159 App. Div. 743, 746, 144 N. Y. Supp. 979, 981:

> "A payment through the clearing house and a payment over the counters of a bank upon which a check is drawn are entirely different. The clearing house is simply a representative of all the banks who are members of it. Its purpose is to enable these banks to go to the clearing house each day and there present checks drawn on other clearing house banks received the day before and receive from the clearing house checks drawn on the presenting bank which have been sent in by some other member. The clearing house then balances the checks sent by a bank against those sent to it, and later in the day a bank either pays or receives the balance due to or owing by it; in other words, it is an adjustment of balances, solely for the convenience of the banks who are members of the association. It is in no sense a payment binding upon the bank upon which the check is drawn, so far as the payee named therein is concerned. * * * The payment of a clearing house balance is not a payment of any particular check. * * * This would seem to follow from the necessity of each case, because a bank upon which a check is drawn has no opportunity to examine it until after it has been received from the clearing house."

See, also, Columbia-Knickerbocker Trust Co. v. Miller, 156 App. Div. 810, 142 N. Y. Supp. 440; First Nat. Bk. v. Nat. Park Bk., 181 App. Div. 103, 168 N. Y. Supp. 422, affirmed 180 N. Y. Supp. 937.

[3, 5] Proceeding, then, upon the premise that the transaction at the clearing house did not constitute a payment, but was merely a presentation for payment and a preliminary adjustment of balances, the issue before us is narrowed to a consideration of the question as to whether or not the Bank of Italy did in fact accept or pay the checks between the time when it received them from its clearing house representative on March 14 and the morning of March 15, when it received news of the death of Sneider. Looking to the facts, we find not only that the bank did nothing which could be construed as an acceptance or payment, but, on the contrary, refused to pay the checks and perfected its refusal by returning the checks to and receiving a refunding check from the presenting bank. The effectiveness of the refusal to pay was in no way impaired by the fact that the reason assigned for the refusal was based on a mistake of fact. The rules of a clearing house, as such, do not govern the rights of a drawer or payee who are not members of the clearing house and do not contract with express reference to such rules. Brady, Law of Bank Checks, § 229; 7 C. J. 897. By the provisions of the Civil Code a check is not an assignment of funds and the drawee is not liable thereon to the holder until it accepts or certifies the same. Civ. Code, § 3265e. It is immaterial, therefore, in determining the question of payment, whether the bank had in fact a valid ground for refusal to pay, such as insufficiency of funds, and, through clerical error assigned an incorrect reason, or whether the refusal was entirely without justification; the drawee bank can refuse to pay a check for no reason at all without incurring any liability to the payee, and, where such a refusal is made, whatever the liability of the drawee bank to the drawer, there is, in fact, no payment of the check.

A situation similar to that presented in the instant case was passed upon in the case of Eastman Kodak Co. v. Nat. Park Bk. (D. C.) 231 Fed. 320, affirmed 247 Fed. 1002, 159 C. C. A. 662. In that case, a check which was presented through the clearing house was refused by the drawee and returned to the presenting bank, which refunded the money received through the clearing house to cover the check, the reason assigned by the drawee for the rejection of the check was based upon a mistake of fact. The court held there had been no payment of the check, and in discussing the question of the mistake in rejecting the check said:

> "The mistake was quite irrelevant. Had the National Park Bank refused to honor the check willfully and for no reason whatever, no liability would have attached to it; the payee can sue only the drawer, and the drawer must look to the drawee."

The fact that the presenting bank, upon receiving the rejected check, issued its own check to the drawee by way of reclamation, thus in form making a "repayment," instead of changing the clearing house entries, was also held an immaterial factor in the determination of whether or not there had ever been an actual payment. Upon this phase of the case the court said:

> "In form that was a repayment, but it was not such in its whole setting; it was only to avoid garbling the original entries and the footings, and so confusing the bookkeeping."

The clearing house settlement between the banks is only a tentative arrangement of balances for the facilitation of business, and the refunding of money or credit received in the course of such a preliminary settlement is no more than a step in the correction of errors in bookkeeping, temporarily tolerated in the interests of expedition.

[6] The undisputed facts of the present case further reveal that, as previously stated, on the afternoon of March 14, "some one" in the Bank of Italy told a clerk of the Wells Fargo Bank, over the telephone, to return the rejected checks to the Bank of Italy by messenger, and it is upon this point that appellant relies in support of the contention that the checks were, from that time, considered as paid by both banks. The answer to this argument is to be found in the following statement, quoted from appellant's own brief:

> "Had the messenger of the Bank of Italy tarried a few moments longer at the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank, and had the checks been given back to him pursuant to instructions, there would have been no litigation before this court."

It is possible that in the meantime additional deposits had been made by the drawer of the checks, and that therefore, had the checks been returned by messenger, they would have been paid on the afternoon of March 14, but the difficulty with appellant's position is that nothing of the sort ever happened. Upon hearing that the messenger had departed from the Wells Fargo Bank, no arrangement was made for the immediate return of the checks to the Bank of Italy, or for their immediate cancellation or acceptance. The direction was given to "put them through the clearing house again." It may be that, upon learning that the messenger had departed, the person in the Bank of Italy thought that the clearing house would provide the most convenient method for returning the checks, and that at that time there was no doubt but that the Wells Fargo Bank was entitled to receive payment. On the other hand, it is equally possible that, upon second thought, the said person deemed it more advisable that the defendant bank should have an opportunity to re-examine the checks in question. All this, however, is a matter of mere conjecture, and the rights of the present parties must be determined by what was actually done. The direction given, while it amounted to an abandonment for the time being of the reason assigned for the refusal to honor the checks, did not constitute an agreement to pay aside from the fact that the acceptance of a check must be in writing (Civ. Code, §§ 3265a, 3213), nor did it amount to actual payment. It left matters where they were before the clearing house transaction of March 14, and required a new presentation for payment, a new temporary adjustment of balances and a reconsideration of the checks by the defendant bank. Before the time for reconsideration arrived, a different or a new reason might be and was, in fact, found for the rejection of the checks, namely, the death of the drawer. The second rejection was promptly made, and the checks were not taken up and canceled until a considerable interval after knowledge of the death of the drawer.

There are other indications that the Bank of Italy did not consider that these checks had been paid on March 14. At the close of banking hours on March 14, there was, due to additional deposits on that afternoon, a balance on hand in Sneider's account which more than covered the amount of the checks in question. After the direction to the Wells Fargo Bank to return the checks in question through the clearing house, the defendant bank did not then and there debit them to Sneider's account, but, on the contrary, on the ensuing morning paid and honored other checks of Sneider's to the amount of $939, thereby so depleting his balance as to leave insufficient funds to meet the two checks being presented through the clearing house. This fact militates strongly against appellant's contention to the effect that the checks in question were paid as between the banks, conversationally or otherwise, on March 14.

The facts of the case show that there was no payment of the two $600 checks prior to March 15, 1918, and the trial court was therefore correct in holding that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the balance to the credit of Sneider without deducting the amount of the two checks.

The judgment is affirmed.

REALTY & REBUILDING CO. v. REA et al.

(S. F. 8988.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1920. Rehearing and Petition to Modify Judgment Denied Jan. 24, 1921.)

1. Corporations 🔑264—Limitations on stockholders' liability runs from creation of corporation's liability.

Limitations against stockholders' liability under Civ. Code, § 322, and Const. art. 12, § 3, begin to run from the creation of the corporation's liability, and not from the existence of a right of action against it.

2. Corporations 🔑264—When liability of corporation for rent created, relative to limitations as to stockholders.

Relative to running of statute of limitations against liability of stockholders under Civ. Code, § 322, and Const. art. 12, § 3, where a lease, providing that at expiration of its three-year term the lessee might, by giving notice, elect to take a three-year extension, was assigned to a corporation without any agreement on its part, its liability to pay the rent during the extended term was not created till it gave notice of exercise of option and entered into a contractual relation.

3. Appeal and error 🔑719(6)—Findings assumed supported in absence of specification of insufficiency of evidence.

There having been no specification of insufficiency of evidence, it must be assumed that the findings are supported by the evidence.

4. Corporations 🔑244(2)—To escape liability for debts, one selling his stock must try to have transfer.

A stockholder, to escape liability for corporation's debts contracted after he sells his stock without a transfer having been made on the books, must have done all in his power to have the transfer made.

5. Appeal and error 🔑694(2)—Record on appeal from nonsuit held not open to objection of no proper offer of evidence.

Plaintiff during the discussion of the motion for nonsuit on the ground that the covenants to repair did not require the lessees to rebuild, having made a general offer of evidence supporting all the averments of the complaint, which the court in granting the motion obviously considered sufficient to justify its consideration of the merits of the motion, as to the inadequacy of the covenants, there is no merit to defendants' contention, on plaintiff's appeal from the granting of the motion, that a sufficient record for the consideration of the question is not presented because there was no proper offer of evidence to support the averments of the complaint.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(5)—Covenant to restore destroyed buildings breached by refusal to comply therewith and by surrender before end of term.

If covenants of a lease are sufficient to require lessees to restore destroyed buildings, they are breached by lessees' refusal to comply therewith and by surrender of the premises, though before the end of the term.

7. Abatement and revival 🔑40—That action is prematurely brought must be specially pleaded to avail defendant.

A plea that an action has been prematurely brought is in the nature of a dilatory plea, which must be specially pleaded to be available.

8. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(3)—Covenant to repair a general covenant.

Covenant that lessees will repair the whole of the premises at their own cost, and that they waive all right to make repairs at lessor's expense, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 1942, is a general covenant, and not one for such repairs only as are contemplated in sections 1941, 1942; the conjunction "and" indicating a break in the thought equivalent to the commencement of a new sentence.

9. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(3)—Covenant to repair held general, notwithstanding mention of particular repairs.

Covenant of lessees to "keep in good order and repair all buildings and structures," and the piping and plumbing thereof and the sidewalks, is a general covenant, the enumeration of particular repairs not being intended to operate as a waiver of obligation to make other repairs naturally comprehended in the agreement.

10. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(5)—Rebuilding after fire not included in general covenant to "repair."

General covenant of lessee to repair held not to include rebuilding after total destruction, "repair" having no such meaning in its normal sense, and Civ. Code, § 1644, declaring that words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, unless used in a technical sense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Repair—Repairs.]

11. Landlord and tenant ⚷160(3)—Rebuilding not required by covenant to surrender in as good condition.

Rebuilding of leased premises, which lessee covenants merely to repair, is not required by covenant to surrender in as good condition as at beginning of or during term, where they were totally destroyed by fire without fault of lessee.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Realty & Rebuilding Company against L. A. Rea and others. From part of the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

See, also, (App.) 188 Pac. 621.

Charles S. Wheeler and John F. Bowie, both of San Francisco (Nathan Moran and A. A. Heer, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

A. E. Shaw and Bert Schlesinger, both of San Francisco, for respondent A. Ruef.

LENNON, J. The complaint in this action purported to state two causes of action, one for money claimed as rent and one for money claimed as damages for the breach of an alleged covenant to rebuild. The action was prosecuted against defendants Rea, Kehrlein, and Sullivan, the original lessees, against Fillmore Arcade Company, a corporation, the assignee of the lease, and against the remaining defendants as stockholders in the latter corporation.

The undisputed facts are these: On July 1, 1906, the original lessees accepted a lease of the premises in question. By this lease they obligated themselves to erect forthwith upon the demised land buildings of the approximate value of $150,000, and they further obligated themselves to pay the sum of $3,500 monthly as rent for the said premises for the period of three years. The lessees further agreed that at the expiration of three years from the commencement of the lease they would either surrender possession, together with all buildings constructed upon the premises, accepting one-half of the appraised value of said buildings, or, at their option, continue in possession under the lease for three additional years, paying as rent the sum of $2,500 monthly and surrendering all interest in the buildings to the lessor. The lease also contained certain covenants relative to repairs which will be considered in detail elsewhere in this opinion. On December 14, 1906, this lease was assigned to defendant Fillmore Arcade Company and accepted by it. On May 28, 1909, defendant company gave notice of its election to continue in possession for the additional three-year period. On May 29, 1911, the buildings on the leased premises were destroyed by fire. The rent was paid up to the 1st of June of that year. On August 7, 1911, this action was commenced to recover rent for the months of June, July, and August, and to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendant company's refusal to rebuild.

Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against the original lessees and against defendant Fillmore Arcade Company upon the first cause of action. It was held, however, that defendant company's liability to pay the rent had been created at a time over three years prior to the bringing of the action, and that therefore the action was barred as to the stockholders of the corporation under the provisions of section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution of California and section 322 of the Civil Code. Upon the second cause of action, a nonsuit was entered against plaintiff on the ground that the lease was not properly to be construed as requiring the lessees to rebuild in case of the destruction of the building by fire.

This appeal has been taken by plaintiff from so much of the judgment as was adverse to it. Two questions are therefore presented for our consideration; the first relating to the time of the creation of the liability of defendant Fillmore Arcade Company to pay rent, the second relating to the construction of the covenants in the lease obligating the lessees to make repairs.

[1, 2] It is conceded that if the liability of defendant Fillmore Arcade Company to pay rent during the second three-year period was created when it accepted the assignment of the lease, the stockholders are subject to no liability in the present action, and that if, on the other hand, this liability was not created until the company exercised its option to continue in possession for this further period, the stockholders are liable herein for the rent demanded by plaintiff and appellant.

In respect to the rights and liabilities of stockholders of a corporation there is a clear distinction between the creation of the liability of the corporation and the existence of a right of action against it. Upon this subject the cases uniformly hold that the liability of stockholders of corporations under section 322 of the Civil Code has its inception in the creation of the original liability of the corporation, and ceases at the end of three years after said date. of the time of the creation of the stockholders' liability in the instant case rests upon the recognized distinction between the nature of the liability imposed upon an assignee of a lease who takes possession under a bare assignment of the lease, and that assumed by an assignee who, in addition to accepting an assignment of the lease, expressly agrees to be bound by the covenants of the assigned lease. As stated by this court in Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 211, 146 Pac. 638:

> "A lease has a dual character—it presents the aspect of a contract and also that of a conveyance. Pollock on Contracts (3d Am. Ed.) p. 531. 'Consequently the lease has two sets of rights and obligations—one comprising those growing out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and said to be based on the "privity of estate," and the other comprising those growing out of the express stipulations of the lease, and so said to be based on "privity of contract."' Tiffany on Real Property, § 46."

See, also, Brosnan v. Kramer, 135 Cal. 36, 66 Pac. 979. An occupant of real property who holds by virtue of a bare assignment of the lease and without entering into any contract, either with his assignor or the lessor, affirmatively binding himself to fulfill the covenants of the lease, is subject only to such obligations as he impliedly assumes by entry and taking possession of the leased premises. Salisbury v. Shirley, 66 Cal. 223, 5 Pac. 104; Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 229, 27 Pac. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; Baker v. Maier, etc., Brewery, 140 Cal. 530, 74 Pac. 22; Lutton v. Rau, 37 Cal. App. 429, 173 Pac. 1111; Seventy-Eighth Street, etc., Co. v. Purssell Co., 166 App. Div. 684, 152 N. Y. Supp. 52. The obligations thus imposed as the result of the creation of the relation of landlord and tenant are said to arise from "privity of estate" as distinguished from "privity of contract"; liability of this nature continues only during occupancy by the assignee, and terminates upon reassignment. Bonetti v. Treat, supra; Lutton v. Rau, supra. Where, however, the assignee expressly agrees in writing to be bound by the terms of the lease, there arises, as distinguished from any obligation resulting from mere occupancy, a new and different obligation which which is not dependent upon occupancy of the premises, but is based upon privity of contract. By virtue of this agreement, a contractual relation is established, whereby the assignee becomes liable upon and entitled to the benefit of all of the covenants of the lease as such. Chase v. Oehlke, 185 Pac. 425; Lopizich v. Salter, 187 Pac. 1075.

It is an undisputed fact in the instant case that, neither at the time of the assignment of the lease to the defendant corporation, nor at any time subsequent thereto up to the time of the exercise of the option to extend the term of the lease, was there any express agreement on the part of the assignee to be bound by the covenants of the lease. By the assignment of the lease, and until the exercise of the option to extend the term of the lease, any obligation of the corporation with respect to the premises in question was dependent upon mere occupancy under the assignment, and arose solely by virtue of privity of estate.

The lease assigned to the defendant corporation contained a provision to the effect that, at the expiration of the three-year term, the lessee might, by giving notice, "elect to take a three years' extension of this lease at a monthly rental of twenty-five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars." The assignee elected to extend the term of the lease, and, in May, 1909, served a written notice of election, which contained the following statement:

> "This notice of election and intention is given under and upon and subject to all the terms and conditions in said lease contained."

This express declaration that the parties were to be governed by the covenants of the lease, signed by the assignee, and accepted by the lessor definitely created and established a contractual relation between the lessor and the assignee, and the covenants of the lease were made the measure of the rights and liabilities of the parties for the extended three-year period. It may be that, irrespective of the creation of a contractual relation, the liability of the corporation during the extended term arose upon its election to extend the term, inasmuch as, until that time, any liability for an extended term was entirely optional with the corporation. Chambers v. Farnham, 187 Pac. 732. It may be that the creation of a contractual relation between the lessor and assignee of the lease would be implied from the mere exercise of the option to extend the term of the lease, without any express adoption of the covenants of the lease. Probst v. Rochester Steam Laundry Co., 171 N. Y. 584, 64 N. E. 504. It is unnecessary, however, for the purposes of this case, to determine whether or not it would have been possible for the assignee to elect to extend the term without creating a new liability, inasmuch as the parties expressly assumed a contractual relation at that time.

The contractual liability for the payment of rent during the extended term was created at the beginning of the extended term or at the time of the exercise of the option, each of which was less than three years before the commencement of the present action, and it is upon this contractual liability upon the covenants of the lease that the present action is brought. It follows that the stockholders are liable for the rent sued for.

[3, 4] It then becomes necessary to determine the question of the liability of the defendant A. Ruef, sued as a stockholder of the defendant corporation. This defendant set up the defense that he was not a stockholder at the time the liability of the corporation was created, claiming that, in or about December, 1908, he transferred and assigned all of his stock in said corporation to one Henrietta Sittenfeld. The trial court found that said defendant Ruef was not the owner of the stock after December, 1908, basing its findings upon the testimony of said defendant to the effect that he had delivered a duly indorsed certificate representing his shares of stock to said Henrietta Sittenfeld, and had requested the secretary of the corporation to issue the stock to the transferee. The court, however, further found that no transfer was, in fact, ever made upon the books of the corporation, and that all of said shares have ever since remained on the books of the corporation in the name of said defendant Ruef. Judgment was rendered in favor of said defendant.

In view of the fact that there was no specification of insufficiency of evidence, we must assume that the findings are supported by the evidence. The fact remains, however, that the findings as made are not sufficient to support the judgment in favor of Ruef. It is to be noted that this is not a case where shares of stock have been issued without authority in the name of a person who never assumed the relation of a stockholder, as was the fact in the cases relied upon by respondent Ruef. Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 571, 82 Pac. 248; Shattuck, etc., Co. v. Gillelen, 154 Cal. 778, 99 Pac. 348; Shean v. Cook, 180 Cal. 92, 179 Pac. 185, 3 A. L. R. 1042. The defendant Ruef, having voluntarily acquired the stock in his name, sought to transfer it, and, under section 324 of the Civil Code, the transfer is, in general, ineffective, except as between the transferor and the transferee, unless the transfer has been recorded upon the corporation's books. It is true that, as a general rule, the presumption that a person is a stockholder as long as his name appears on the books of a corporation as such is not conclusive. Nevertheless an owner who claims to have transferred his stock cannot overcome the presumption of continued ownership, at least as to creditors of the corporation, without proof that he has done all in his power to have his name removed from the books, and thus placed himself in the position of an involuntary record holder. The trial court merely found that the defendant Ruef was not the owner of the stock after December, 1908; that he had delivered the indorsed certificate to the transferee, and had requested the secretary of the corporation to issue a new certificate. Ruef himself testified that he did not personally deliver the stock certificate to the secretary of the corporation, and that, so far as he knew, no one had ever delivered it to the secretary for the purposes of the transfer. No request was made by the transferee for the issuance of a new certificate, nor was the assignment exhibited to the corporation or the old certificate surrendered. To issue a new certificate under these circumstances might render the corporation liable both to the holder of the new and old certificates. Morawetz on Private Corporation (2d Ed.) § 186. In short, the findings fail to show that the defendant Ruef made any showing of a proper or diligent effort to procure a removal of his name as stockholder from the corporation's books, and they do show that his name appeared upon the books at the time of the creation of the liability sued upon. Therefore, assuming that the trial court was justified in finding that Ruef had transferred the stock, and was not in fact the owner after December, 1908, he, nevertheless, remained liable as a stockholder of record to the creditors of the corporation, and the judgment that he was not liable to plaintiff is not supported by the findings, and is erroneous. Plumb v. Bank of Enterprise, 48 Kan. 484, 29 Pac. 699; Borland v. Haven (C. C.) 37 Fed. 394, 407.

The next point for consideration is whether or not the trial court erred in granting a nonsuit upon the cause of action for damages on the ground that the covenants to repair the buildings did not require the lessees to rebuild in case of total destruction of the buildings by fire.

[5] We are not in accord with respondents' suggestion that appellant has not presented a sufficient record for the consideration of this question because no proper offer of evidence appears to support the averments of the complaint. During the discussion arising upon the making of the motion for a nonsuit, plaintiff made a general offer of evidence supporting all of the averments of its complaint, and the trial court in granting the motion obviously considered the offer sufficient to justify its consideration of the merits of the motion upon the larger ground of the inadequacy of the covenants in the lease to require the defendants to restore the destroyed structures upon the lands covered by it. The question in this larger aspect is, we think, properly before the court.

[6, 7] Nor do we favor respondents' contention that the action, if maintainable at all, has been prematurely brought, because the duty, if such existed, of the tenant in possession to restore the destroyed structures was one which, under the covenants in the lease requiring the tenant to surrender the premises in good order at the close of the term, could have been performed at any time before the close of such term, and that therefore there had been no default in its performance at the time of the institution of this action. If the covenants relied upon by appellant are sufficiently broad to require the tenant to restore the destroyed buildings, they were broken by the defendants' refusal to comply with the express demand in writing, served upon them by the plaintiff and by the surrender of the premises by the tenant in possession to the plaintiff prior to the commencement of this action. Moreover, the plea that an action has been prematurely brought is in the nature of a dilatory plea, which must be specially pleaded in order to be taken advantage of by the defendant in such action. Bemmerly v. Woodward, 124 Cal. 568, 57 Pac. 561.

We are also inclined to adopt appellant's contention that the covenants to repair contained in the lease are general covenants. These covenants read as follows:

> "That the said lessees will repair and keep in good order, condition and repair the whole of said premises, at their own cost and expense and said lessees hereby expressly waive all right to make repairs at expense of landlord, as provided for in section 1942 of the Civil Code of California."
> "The lessees hereby covenant and agree at their own cost and expense to keep in good order and repair all buildings and structures, and the piping and plumbing thereof, upon said property, and the sidewalks in front of the same. And in the event that new plumbing or piping, or new sidewalks or repairs to sidewalks, are at any time during the term or any extension thereof required by the municipal or other authorities, then as often as the same are so required the lessees shall furnish the same at their own cost and expense."
> "The foregoing provision shall apply to all structures now upon said property which are not removed to make way for new buildings as herein provided for, and also to the said buildings and other structures which shall be built hereunder."

The lease also contained an agreement on the part of the lessees to surrender the premises "in as good state and condition as the same are now or may be put into, reasonable use and wear thereof, and damages by the elements, excepted."

[8] With respect to the first covenant, it is urged by respondents that the term "repairs," as used in the first clause, means only such repairs as are contemplated in sections 1941 and 1942 of the Civil Code. This contention is unsound. A fair interpretation of the sentence requires a construction of the two clauses as expressing agreements independent of each other, the conjunction "and" in this instance indicating a break in the thought equivalent to the commencement of a new sentence. This being so, there is no basis for the argument that the term "repairs" in the first clause is not to be taken in its general sense.

[9] With respect to the second covenant, it is even more obvious that the enumeration of particular items of repair was not intended to operate as a waiver of the obligation to make other repairs naturally comprehended in the agreement to "keep in good order and repair all buildings and structures. * * * " (Italics ours.)

[10] It is appellant's contention that a general covenant to repair imposes an obligation to rebuild structures which have been completely destroyed. This must necessarily be the nature of appellant's claim, inasmuch as the amended complaint filed herein avers and repeatedly affirms the fact that the buildings upon the demised premises were destroyed by fire on the 29th day of May, 1911, and the general offer of proof made during the trial was confined to an offer to prove the averments of the complaint.

Upon the question as to whether or not a general covenant to repair imposes an obligation to rebuild structures completely destroyed, the decisions in the different jurisdictions are not harmonious. Appellant relies upon the early case of Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 95 Am. Dec. 115, and the more recent case of Egan v. Dodd, 32 Cal. App. 706, 164 Pac. 17, in both of which cases the tenant's liability to make repairs under a general covenant to repair was asserted and affirmed. In the latter case it affirmatively appears that the dilapidations were not such as to require the rebuilding or replacement of the entire structure. The case of Polack v. Pioche, supra, was primarily concerned with the determination of the meaning of the phrase "damages by the elements or acts of Providence"; it does not appear that there was a total destruction in that case, although the case has been cited as requiring the rebuilding of totally destroyed structures. Wattles v. Omaha, etc., Co., 50 Neb. 251, 69 N. W. 785, 36 L. R. A. 424, 61 Am. St. Rep. 554, 566, note. The reason for this interpretation is, perhaps, to be found in certain statements in the argument of counsel, a summary of which is printed in the California Reports, (pages 417–419), preceding the opinion in the case. The expressions therein contained, of course, were merely by way of argument, and were in no sense intended as a statement of the facts of the case. Moreover, even assuming that the case under discussion goes to the extent of requiring a rebuilding of a structure totally destroyed by fire without the fault of the tenant, and that such was the rule of the common law, that rule cannot be followed in the instant case.

The rule is at most a rule of construction and is necessarily subject to such contrary or inconsistent rules of construction as may have been devised and promulgated by our own Legislature. In 1872, after the decision in Polack v. Pioche, supra, section 1644 of the Civil Code was adopted, providing:

> "The words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than according to their strict legal meaning; unless used by the parties in a technical sense, or unless a special meaning is given to them by usage, in which case the latter must be followed."

There is no apparent reason why a lease of real property should not be construed as any other contract pursuant to the Code provisions, by the application of the prescribed tests. We must therefore look to the subject-matter of the contract and the language of the parties in its ordinary signification in order to determine therefrom what was their intention, upon what proposition their minds actually met, and to what they did consciously consent.

By the contract the lessees were to have the use of a small and very valuable tract of land in a city for a certain period of time, and in return for such use they were not only to pay a large sum of money each month but were also to place upon the land buildings of very considerable value which were to become the property of the lessor, not only by operation of law (Civ. Code, § 1013), but by the express terms of the contract itself. These buildings were to be kept and surrendered in good order, condition, and repair, damages by the elements excepted. It must be conceded that the exception of "damages by the elements" does not include damage by fire, unless the fire is caused by lightning or some other super human agency. Polack v. Pioche, supra; Pope v. Farmers' Union, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 139, 62 Pac. 384, 53 L. R. A. 673, 80 Am. St. Rep. 87; Ahlgren v. Walsh, 173 Cal. 27, 35, 158 Pac. 748, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 751. The extent of the liability of the lessees in respect to the damages in question is therefore dependent entirely upon the interpretation of the terms "repair" and "keep in repair." These terms are not technical, nor is there anything to indicate that they were used in any technical or special sense or in accordance with any special usage. A general covenant to repair on the part of the tenant is, as stated in Polack v. Pioche, supra, binding unless limited by express exception, but such a covenant, even if it be in the most general terms, does not constitute an agreement to rebuild unless the term "repair" means also to replace. It has no such meaning in its normal sense. To repair means to mend an old thing, not to make a new thing; to restore to a sound state something which has become partially dilapidated, not to create something which has no existence. Wattles v. Omaha, etc., Co., supra. When we speak of repairing a thing, the very expression presupposes a thing in existence to be repaired. If a workman undertakes to repair an article, he obviously contemplates making whole an existing article and not the manufacture of something new. Indeed, this very distinction is recognized in the covenants of the lease itself, wherein it is provided that the lessees shall furnish "new sidewalks or repairs to sidewalks." (Italics ours.) And the very fact that with respect to the plumbing and sidewalks the lease specifically required replacement as well as repairs in itself furnishes internal evidence of a very convincing nature that the parties did not use the term "repair" in any other than its ordinary and generally accepted meaning.

It is urged, in appellant's behalf, that the fact that the value of the buildings erected by the lessees constituted a substantial portion of the consideration for the lease indicates that it was the intention of the parties that the lessees should rebuild in case of destruction of the buildings. The lease under consideration sets forth the agreement on the part of the lessees to erect buildings on the property, and specifically limits the amount to be so expended by the lessees to $155,000. It is reasonable to suppose that, if it was intended that the lessees were to assume liability for an additional $155,000 in case of the accidental destruction of the buildings, such liability would have been set forth with equal particularity. Moreover, appellant's argument in this particular is further weakened by the fact that, while it is true that the value of the buildings erected constituted an important part of the consideration for the lease, still the covenants with respect to the erection of buildings had been fully performed prior to the fire, the performance had been accepted by the lessor, and, by the express terms of the lease, all liability upon these covenants had ceased. The lease provided that if, at the end of the first three years, the lessees did not elect to extend the term, the lessor was to purchase from the lessees the buildings erected by them at half of the appraised value. On the other hand, if the lessees elected to extend the term, then, immediately upon the exercise of the option to extend, the buildings were to "belong to and become and remain the absolute property of the lessor, and in such event the lessees do hereby sell, assign, transfer and set over the said building or buildings to the said lessor." The lease expressly provided that the lessees' "obligation to erect buildings" should terminate at the end of the first three-year period. The buildings were destroyed during the second three-year term, after the exercise of the option, and, therefore, after the buildings had become the property of the lessor, after performance of the covenants to build had been completed by the lessees and after these covenants "to erect buildings" had ceased to operate. The liability of a tenant cannot be extended to include the liability of an insurer of the property of another by implication or by aught save a clear and unequivocal agreement in any case where such liability is not created by operation of law.

[11] The general agreement to surrender the premises, at the expiration of the term, in as good condition as they may have been in at the beginning of or during the term must be construed with the other covenants in the lease prescribing the liability of the lessees in the event of damages to the premises. It follows that the agreements to keep the premises in good repair and, at the end of the term, to surrender them in as good condition as they were in at the beginning of or during the term are not, and do not include, a covenant to replace a structure totally destroyed by fire without the fault of the tenant. Wattles v. Omaha, etc., Co., supra; Miller v. Morris, 55 Tex. 412, 40 Am. Rep. 814; Levey v. Dyess, 51 Miss. 501.

We conclude, therefore, that, under the covenants of the lease now under consideration, neither the original lessees, nor their assignee, the tenant in possession, were required to rebuild the destroyed structures, and consequently that they are not bound to respond in damages for their failure to do so. The trial court did not err in granting a nonsuit as to plaintiff's second cause of action.

That part of the judgment which directs that the plaintiff take nothing upon the first cause of action as against the stockholders of the defendant corporation and the defendant A. Ruef is reversed; that part of the judgment which directs that plaintiff recover upon the first cause of action against the defendant corporation and the original lessees is affirmed. The judgment of dismissal of the second cause of action as to all of the defendants is affirmed.

MACMILLAN CO. v. CLARKE et al.

(Sac. 3113.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑168—High schools not part of elementary school system to be furnished free text-books.

High schools are not a part of the elementary school system within Const. art. 9, § 6, providing that the public school system shall include day and evening elementary schools and secondary schools, but come within Pol. Code, § 1720, declaring that secondary schools shall be known and designated as high schools and junior colleges, so the provision of article 9, § 6, for furnishing free text-books does not apply to high schools.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑168—Provision for supplying free text-books to elementary schools held not to prohibit supply to high schools.

Const. art. 9, § 7, providing that free text-books shall be supplied to elementary schools, does not prohibit the Legislature from directing the supplying free text-books to high schools, for there is nothing in the nature of the provision of text-books for the use of high school pupils which requires a different or more specific constitutional authority than has been found sufficient for the building and furnishing schoolhouses, employing teachers, supplying stationery and other equipment.

3. Constitutional law 🔑48 — Presumption of constitutionality.

There is a presumption in favor of the constitutionality of legislative acts.

4. Constitutional law 🔑26 — Legislature has power except as restrained by Constitution.

The Legislature is vested with the whole of the legislative power of the state, and may deal with any subject within the scope of civil government unless it is restrained by the provisions of the Constitution.

5. Constitutional law 🔑26—Enumeration of legislative powers is not exclusion of others.

Enumeration of legislative powers is not an exclusion of others not named unless accompanied by negative terms.

6. States 🔑119—Provision for free text-books in high schools is not a "gift" to individuals.

As Const. art. 9, § 1, provides that the Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of the intellectual, scientific, moral, and agricultural improvement, through the agency of a free public school system, the right to extend free text-books to high schools can only be questioned on the theory that it violates Const. art. 4, § 31, providing that the Legislature shall not have the right to make any gift or authorize the making of any gift of public money; the providing of free text-books being no more a "gift" than free instruction, and both being sustainable on the ground that they are for the benefit of the state and not the individual.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift.]

7. Schools and school districts 🔑99—Provision for free text-books for high schools held not to violate inhibition against taxes on counties and towns.

While Const. art. 11, § 12, declares that the Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes on counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations for any county, city, or other municipal purposes, but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes, the Free Text-Book Act of 1917, providing in section 1 that the high school board of every school district shall adopt text-books from a list prescribed by the state board and shall furnish the same free to pupils, is not invalid in view of the provisions of Pol. Code, §§ 1756, 1757, and 1763, relating to the levying of taxes for the maintenance of high schools, nor can the act be stricken down because of the provisions of section 2 for the reimbursement of a high school district for text-books furnished pupils outside of such district, on the theory that there was no legislative discretion left to the supervisors of the districts from which came the pupils so supplied.

8. Statutes 🔑64(2)—Invalidity of section of Free Text-Book Act held not to invalidate entire act.

As the Free Text-Book Act of 1917, providing for the furnishing of free text-books for high school pupils, contains a complete scheme in section 1, the fact that section 2, which provides for reimbursement for text-books furnished to pupils outside of the state, might be invalid, does not carry with it the entire act.

9. Schools and school districts 🔑99—Free Text-Book Act not invalid as placing on high school districts additional tax burdens.

As school districts are but instruments of the state, although quasi municipal in character, the Free Text-Book Act of 1917, requiring the furnishing of free books to high school students, cannot be deemed invalid under Const. art. 11, § 12, as resulting in imposing additional taxes on the school districts, for the Legislature may define the extent of the burden to be borne by the district and prescribe the duties of school boards in providing equipment.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by the MacMillan Company, a corporation, for a writ of mandate to be directed to E. P. Clarke and others, composing the State Board of Education, and another, to require the issuance of a list of high school text-books pursuant to Pol. Code, § 1750. Writ denied.

Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to require the respondents, the state board of education, and the state superintendent of instruction, to issue a list of high school text-books in conformity to the requirements of section 1750 of the Political Code.

The only question presented is as to whether said section of the Political Code has been repealed and a different procedure substituted by the act of the Legislature entitled "An act to provide for the adoption of text-books for use in the public high schools of the state and for furnishing text-books for the pupils of such schools," approved May 18, 1917, referred to as the Free Text-Book Act (Stats. 1917, p. 729). It seems to be conceded by petitioners that their right to the relief demanded depends upon a showing that the last-cited act is invalid and inoperative.

Petitioner concisely states its position in the following words:

"If the Free Text-Book Act contains provisions that conflict with this section (section 1750, Pol. Code), and therefore in form repeals the same, the repeal is void, since the repealing statute is unconstitutional. If, on the other hand, the provisions of the two statutes are not inconsistent, the Political Code section is likewise in exclusive force and effect, since the other statute is unconstitutional."

Two grounds of unconstitutionality are relied on: First, that there is no authority under the Constitution of California for providing free text-books to high school pupils; and, second, that the act in question is violative of section 12 of article 11 of the Constitution, in that it is an attempt to impose taxes upon the high school districts by direct legislative authority and without the interposition of the corporate officers in whom the power to assess and collect local taxes is vested.

The obnoxious portions of said act are contained in sections 1 and 2 thereof, which are as follows:

"Section 1. The high school board of each and every high school district shall adopt text-books for use in such district from a list prescribed by the state board of education. Such list shall include text-books in such high school subjects as in the judgment of the state board of education require the use of text-books; provided, that separate classics in English and modern languages need not be listed. The high school board of each and every high school district may purchase text-books for the use of pupils enrolled in the high schools of such district, which text-books shall at all times be and remain the property of such district, to be supplied to the pupils thereof for use without charge, or at an annual rental, payable in advance, which shall not exceed three dollars for all text-books required by any pupil during any school year; provided, that after July 1, 1920, text-books shall be so supplied to pupils of the high schools without charge. Whenever a majority of the heads of families or a majority of the electors in any high school district shall petition in writing the high school board to furnish text-books free for the use of the pupils enrolled in such high school district, it shall thereafter be the duty of the high school board to furnish such text-books free for the use of such pupils. The high school board may pay for text-books furnished in accordance with the provisions of this act, out of the special fund of such high school district. All moneys collected for rental of text-books shall be deposited in the county treasury to the credit of such high school district within thirty days after collection.

"Sec. 2. Whenever the high school board of any high school district purchases text-books for the use of pupils residing in portions of the county not included in any high school district and attending the high school of such district, and furnishes text-books free for the use of such pupils, the board may on or before August first of each year file with the county superintendent of schools of the county in which such pupils reside, a list of such pupils and an itemized statement of the amount expended for text-books for their use during the preceding school year. The county superintendent of schools shall include such amount in his estimate of the county high school fund required, and the board of supervisors shall include the amount in levying the county high school fund. Before the county superintendent of schools shall apportion any of the county high school fund on average daily attendance, he shall transfer from said fund to the fund of each of the several high school districts of the county, or draw a warrant in favor of the board of trustees of such high school district, for the amount claimed by each on account of text-books furnished free for the use of pupils residing in portions of the county not included in any high school district, and attending such high school."

[1] It may be conceded that there is no specific authority in the Constitution for furnishing free text-books to pupils of high schools. Section 7 of article 9 of the Constitution provides for the adoption of a uniform system of text-books for use in the day and evening elementary schools throughout the state, and directs that they "shall be furnished and distributed by the state free of cost of any charge whatever to all children attending the day and evening elementary schools of the state."

High schools are not a part of the elementary school system of the state. Section 6 of article 9 of the Constitution provides that "The public school system shall include day and evening elementary schools, and such day and evening secondary schools, normal schools and technical schools as may be established by the Legislature;" and in providing such secondary schools the Legislature has declared (Pol. Code, § 1720) that "The secondary schools of the state shall be known and designated as high schools and technical schools and junior colleges."

[2] While it is thus apparent that no direct constitutional provision has been made for free text-books in high schools, and that the free text-book provision of section 7 of article 9 only applies to elementary schools, no good reason has been suggested why any further constitutional authority should be needed for supplying free text-books to pupils in the high schools at the discretion of the Legislature than the general powers granted by the Constitution under which the high school system itself has been created, operated, and maintained. Section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution directs that the Legislature "shall provide for a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in the year," and section 6, in addition to authorizing such secondary schools as may be established by the Legislature, further provides that the Legislature may authorize and cause to be levied a special state school tax for the support of day and evening secondary schools and technical schools, and "that all revenue derived from such special tax shall be applied exclusively to the support of the schools for which such special tax shall be levied." The liberal policy of the state toward the maintenance of public schools is declared by section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution:

"A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement."

There are other references in the Constitution to supplement the conclusion that the organization, management, and support of the public school system has been left within the legislative discretion, subject to the few mandatory provisions quoted, whereby it was intended to safeguard certain features of elementary education by the Constitution itself.

There is nothing in the constitutional requirement that free text-books shall be supplied to the elementary schools which negatives a legislative power to also supply free text-books to secondary schools.

It is merely a question of how far the Legislature may go in its paternal provision for the cause of education without exceeding the bounds of the general constitutional discretion that has been granted. There is nothing in the nature of the provision of text-books for the use of high school pupils to require different or more specific constitutional authority than has been found sufficient for the building and furnishing schoolhouses, employing teachers, supplying crayons, pens, pencils and stationery, maps, charts, and other high school equipment.

[3, 4] The presumption which attends every act of the Legislature is that it is within the constitutional power. The Legislature is vested with the whole of the legislative power of the state, and may deal with any subject within the scope of civil government unless it is restrained by the provisions of the Constitution, and the presumption that the Legislature is acting within the Constitution holds good until it is made to appear in what particular it is violating constitutional limitations. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106.

We have been able to find no authority questioning the right of the Legislature to provide free text-books in the high schools. There are decisions holding that boards of education and trustees of school districts cannot exercise such power under general authority to provide necessary supplies for the schools, and without express legislative sanction, but such limitation of power is obvious. The implication is generally conceded, however, that such power does not rest with the Legislature in the absence of constitutional restraint. Board of Education v. Common Council, 80 Mich. 548, 45 N. W. 585; Harris v. Kill, 108 Ill. App. 305; Honey Creek School v. Barnes, 119 Ind. 213, 21 N. E. 747.

The people have seen fit to safeguard certain features of a free school system by mandatory provisions of the Constitution, relating particularly to elementary schools, but beyond this, in the matter of secondary and high schools, the Legislature seems to be left with plenary power to act in its discretion for the public welfare.

In considering the power of the Legislature of Indiana to establish a free library, the Supreme Court of that state (School City of Marion v. Forrest, 168 Ind. 94, 78 N. E. 187), applying the general provisions of section 1, article 8, of the Indiana state Constitution, which is the same, in substance, as section 1 of article 9 of our Constitution, says:

> "That article provides that, 'knowledge and learning, generally diffused throughout a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, it shall be the duty of the general assembly to encourage, by all suitable means, moral, intellectual, scientific, and agricultural improvement, and to provide, by law, for a general and uniform system of common schools, wherein tuition shall be without charge and equally open to all.' It may, with propriety, be said that a law providing for the organization and maintenance of public libraries is a part of the educational system of the state."

In McGee v. Franklin Publishing Co., 15 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 39 S. W. 335, the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, in applying section 1 of article 7 of the Constitution of Texas, which provides that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature of the state to establish and make suitable provision for the support and maintenance of an efficient system of free schools," says, in language very pertinent to the situation here, that—

> The section quoted "is a command to the Legislature to adopt such ends and means and appliances as, in its discretion, it may regard necessary or useful for the support and maintenance of an efficient system of free schools. The true meaning to be given the term 'efficient system' embraces the idea of instruction in an enlarged sense, and not that it should be confined to narrow lines. Its meaning is broad enough to allow such a scheme of instruction as the Legislature in the exercise of its discretion may provide. It may include all the * * * appliances that are used in this enlightened age that are necessary or useful as part of an efficient 'system' of public schools; and, in furthering and providing for this efficient system, the Legislature may exercise its discretion in determining what may be necessary or useful as a part of it."

[5] We see no grounds for holding that the express and mandatory requirement of our Constitution that free text-books shall be furnished to pupils of the elementary schools should be construed as a limitation upon the power of the Legislature to also furnish free text-books for the use of high school pupils. It may well be that it was considered expedient in this as in other respects to require legislative action in behalf of the elementary schools, and to leave the provisions for more advanced education to the discretion of the Legislature. Express enumeration of legislative powers is not exclusive of others not named unless accompanied by negative terms. Ex parte McCarthy, 29 Cal. 395. A construction of a provision of the Constitution of Colorado, involving the application of this doctrine, is upheld by the Supreme Court of that state. The Constitution of Colorado requires the Legislature to provide for the maintenance of a uniform system of free public schools throughout the state for the education of all residents between the ages of 6 and 21 years. On a question as to the power of the Legislature to establish a kindergarten for pupils under the age of 6 years the court in Re Kindergarten School, 18 Colo. 234, 32 Pac. 422, 19 L. R. A. 469, says:

> "The Legislature being invested with complete power for all the purposes of civil government, and the state Constitution being merely a limitation upon that power, the court will look into it, not to see if the enactment in question is authorized, but only to see if it is prohibited. Unless, therefore, the Constitution, in express terms or by necessary implication, limits it, the Legislature may exercise its sovereign power in any way that, in its judgment, will best subserve the general welfare. Read in the light of this rule of interpretation, and the wise and liberal policy of the state in educational matters, the section is clearly mandatory, and requires affirmative action on the part of the Legislature to the extent and in the manner specified, and is in no measure prohibitory or a limitation of its power to provide free schools for children under six years of age, whenever it deems it wise and beneficial to do so."

[6] It seems clear under the comprehensive direction of our Constitution, which requires that the Legislature "shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement," through the agency of a free public school system, that the right to extend the free use of text-books can only be questioned under some express constitutional limitation. It has been suggested, although the point is not raised by the petitioner in this proceeding, that such inhibition is found in section 31 of article 4, of the Constitution, whch provides that the Legislature shall not have power "to make any gift or authorize the making of any gift of any public money or thing of value to any individual." It would appear that this objection, if pertinent, applies to every phase of a free school system as well as to the free use of text-books. All the furnishing, equipment, and appliances of our public schools, the very tuition itself, is a contribution of something of value to the school patrons. To argue that some of these agencies and not all are expressly authorized for the benefit of the school population by the general constitutional provisions for the maintenance of a free school system, or that the scope of school service is limited to rudimentary education in the "three R's" and such equipment as was deemed sufficient when our Constitution was adopted, is to place our public schools under the blight of the "dead hand," with no chance for expansion and development in line with our growing culture and civilization. Such a construction would be a serious limitation upon the numerous high school centers throughout the state of California, and the normal and technical schools, with their costly and elaborate equipment of libraries, chemical, electrical, and mechanical laboratories and appliances provided for the use of pupils.

The true explanation of the apparent conflict of authority would seem to be that the free school system with all its equipment is not primarily a service to the individual pupils, but to the community, just as fire and police protection, public libraries, hospitals, playgrounds, and the numerous other public service utilities which are provided by taxation, and minister to individual needs, are for the benefit of the general public. It is so interpreted by the introductory declaration of our constitutional provisions for a free school system that—

> "A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence" is "essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people."

It is to be noted that under the Free Text-Book Act the books remain the property of the district, and the pupils have the use of them only in substantially the same manner that they have the use of other school appliances. To hold that the Legislature is without power to provide text-books for the high school pupils would place a limitation upon its discretion in encouraging "by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement" that might seriously cripple our boasted system of public education.

[7] The second point of contention is raised under section 12 of article 11 of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> "The Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, but may, by general laws, vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes."

It is claimed that a school district comes within the application of this section, and that taxes for high school purposes are for county or municipal purposes within the meaning of this section. McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 3 Pac. 836; Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 1067.

The general procedure for estimating and levying taxes for maintenance of high schools is provided in sections 1756 and 1757 of the Political Code. Under section 1756 it is made the duty of the high school board to make and file with the county superintendent of schools an estimate of the amount of money required for maintaining the high school of said district for the current school year, showing the amounts required for (a) teachers' salaries; (b) current expenses; (c) books, magazines, and apparatus; (d) sites, buildings, and furniture; (e) other miscellaneous expenses. Should the board of any county high school district fail to make this estimate it becomes the duty of the county superintendent of schools to make it. Such estimate, when fully prepared, is to be submitted to the board of supervisors. Section 1757 directs that the board of supervisors at the time of making the tax levy for the year for county purposes shall levy a special tax on the property of the high school district "sufficient in amount to carry out the purposes legally specified in the estimate."

The constitutionality of such a levy and its conformity to the limitations imposed by section 17, article 11, of the Constitution, is upheld by this court. People v. Lodi High School District, 124 Cal. 694, 57 Pac. 660; Board of Education v. Board of Trustees, 129 Cal. 599, 62 Pac. 173; Brown v. Visalia, 141 Cal. 372, 74 Pac. 1042. The money collected under the tax levy so provided for is required by section 1763 of the Political Code to be placed in a special fund for the high school district for which it was intended, to be used only for the purposes for which the same was levied, and such moneys are made available for all legitimate supplies for the schools. The Free Text-Book Act under consideration here provides that the high school board may pay for text-books furnished in accordance with the provisions of the act out of the special fund of such high school district. There thus appears to have been provided an adequate and valid method of procuring and paying for free text-books under this disputed act.

The decision in the case of McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 36 Pac. 836, relied upon by petitioner, is made inapplicable to the present case by the fact that the statute under which that decision was rendered now stands amended for the express purpose of meeting the objection there raised. At the time of the tax levy there called in question, the act to provide for the establishment of high schools, approved March 20, 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 182), required an estimate to be made by the county superintendent of schools and to be furnished to the board of supervisors, and made it the duty of such board of supervisors "to levy such rate as will produce the amount estimated to be necessary for such purpose." It was held in that case that the Legislature had attempted to vest in the county superintendent of schools legislative power to determine the amount of the tax levy and had deprived the local body whose duty it was to levy taxes of all discretion in fixing the amount to be raised, and was, therefore, unconstitutional. By the High School Act of 1895 (St. 1895, p. 293), this objectionable provision of the act of 1891 was amended so as to provide that upon receiving the estimate of the requirements of the district the supervisors were to include in the tax levy "an amount sufficient" to maintain the school. As is said in People v. Lodi High School, and Board of Education v. Board of Trustees, supra, this amendment was made to obviate the infirmity of the law of 1891. As thus amended this provision is upheld in the cases last cited, and is incorporated in the law governing taxation for high schools as it exists today. (Pol. Code, §§ 1756, 1757.) Petitioner, however, urges that the vice of the act of 1891 is repeated in section 2 of the Free Text-Book Act, where, in providing for reimbursement of a high school district for the cost of text-books supplied to pupils residing outside such district upon an estimate furnished by the superintendent of schools, "the supervisors shall include the amount in levying the county high school fund." It is argued that this provision leaves no legislative discretion to the supervisors, but requires them to increase their tax levy by the precise sum included in the superintendent's estimate. It, however, signifies no more than a direction to the supervisors to include in their tax levy a sufficient amount to cover this extra cost. It merely happens, this being a liquidated claim, that the estimate of the superintendent, if his figures are correctly compiled, must of necessity correspond with the "sufficient amount" covering the legislative discretion of the supervisors. If there is a debt of $1,000 to be provided for, there can be little difference in meaning between a direction to the supervisors to add the amount to the tax levy, or a direction to make the levy sufficient to cover the indebtedness. The element of discretion only exists in the fact that the taxing power is not bound to accept the superintendent's figures as correct and final any more than in the matter of estimates for teachers' salaries or other school expenses.

[8] But there is another answer to this last objection to the validity of the Free Text-Book Act. Section 2 is no part of the authority or procedure for providing free text-books. Section 1 of the act provides for the adoption by the high school boards of the respective districts of text-books for use in high schools, and directs that after July 1, 1920, text-books shall be supplied to pupils of the high schools without charge. This includes all pupils of the school, whether residents or nonresidents of the district. It is further provided that the high school board may pay for text-books furnished in accordance with the provisions of this act out of the special fund of such high school district. Section 2 is an independent and supplemental provision, in no way affecting the sufficiency or validity of the preceding enactment. It merely provides a method by which the district that has furnished and paid for free text-books to its pupils residing in other parts of the county may recover the moneys thus expended. It is not apparent how the invalidity of this provision, if it should be held invalid, could affect the constitutionality of the general scheme of providing text-books to pupils of the high schools, or in what way the elimination of this provision for reimbursement would entitle petitioner to the relief demanded. This particular fund provided for by section 2 has no relation to the payment of the publisher's claim for books supplied, referred to in section 9. We are of the opinion that, even though this provision of section 2 might be held invalid, it is not so vitally a part of the general scheme and purpose of the act as to nullify its main features, and the act would still stand as a valid substitute for section 1750, which petitioner is seeking to enforce, at least to whatever extent the two enactments are in conflict.

[9] If it is contended by petitioner that the act of the Legislature in placing upon high school districts the burden of providing free text-books must necessarily result in imposing additional taxes upon such districts and municipalities, the answer is that the obligation thus created is not different from those originating in the same manner for other school supplies, the validity of which have been repeatedly upheld by the courts. The school district is created by the Legislature as an instrument of the state. Such quasi municipal corporations are but the agents or representatives of the state. They are organized for the purpose of the Legislature in its province of providing for the general welfare. The organization and administration of a uniform public school system is especially delegated to the Legislature by the Constitution. The Legislature has provided for the institution and maintenance of schools through the agency of school districts and boards of education. If the Legislature is denied the power to fix the nature and extent of the burden to be borne by the districts, and to define and prescribe the duties of school boards in providing equipment for the schools, there would be an end to any coherent or uniform system of public education.

In State ex rel. Clark v. Haworth, 122 Ind. 462, 23 N. E. 946, 7 L. R. A. 240, at the petition of the relator for writ of mandate to compel the school trustees to certify the required text-books for their school and to procure and furnish such books under the provision of a certain act of the Legislature, a somewhat similar question of the invasion of local rights was raised. The Supreme Court of Indiana in that case, and under the general provisions of a Constitution similar to ours, uses this apt language:

> "Essentially and intrinsically the schools * * * are matters of state and not of local jurisdiction. In such matters, the state is a unit, and the Legislature the source of power. The authority over schools and school affairs is not necessarily a distributive one to be exercised by local instrumentalities; but, on the contrary, it is a central power residing in the Legislature of the state. It is for the lawmaking power to determine whether the authority shall be exercised by a state board of education, or distributed to county, township, or city organizations throughout the state. * * * Both by the Constitution and by the intrinsic nature of the duty and the power, the authority is exclusively legislative, and the matter over which it is to be exercised solely of state concern. * * * It is impossible to conceive of the existence of a uniform system of common schools without power lodged somewhere to make it uniform; and, even in the absence of express constitutional provisions, that power must necessarily reside in the Legislature. If it does reside there, then that body must have, as an incident of the principal power, the authority to prescribe the course of study * * * as well as the books which shall be used. * * * Having this authority, the Legislature may not only prescribe regulations for using such books, but it may, also, declare how the books shall be obtained and distributed."

Under the California law the Legislature has seen fit to create municipal districts through which to organize and conduct the schools. It retains all the powers not expressly conferred upon the school trustees or boards of supervisors.

It may well be questioned if the imposition of financial burdens upon school districts by general laws for maintenance of public schools comes within the restriction of the Constitution against taxation for local or municipal purposes. The public schools are state schools, and it is within the discretion of the Legislature whether to make them a charge upon the state at large, or to do as has been done in the matter of elementary schools, make them partly a charge upon the state at large and partly upon local districts, or, as in the case of high schools, place practically the entire burden for the local school upon a district organized for that purpose. But conceding the rule as recognized in McCabe v. Carpenter, supra, its application goes no further than to place the constitutional inhibition upon the power of the Legislature to assess and collect the tax.

In other words, in dealing with these local municipal agencies for conducting the state administration, the Legislature reserves the right to impose burdens which must be met by local tax levies. The whole county government system is based on that theory. The state, for example, enumerates the officers who are to conduct the public business of the municipality and fixes their compensation, which the county is required to pay through the levy, collection, and disbursement of local taxes. In the administration of the public schools the general laws of the state direct the purchase of certain supplies and require the directors or school board to include estimates for that purpose in their annual budgets, and impose upon the board of supervisors of the county the duty of including in the tax levy a sufficient amount to cover the cost. Section 1620 of the Political Code provides that—

> "Writing and drawing paper, pens, inks, blackboards, blackboard rubbers, crayons and lead and slate pencils, and other necessary supplies for the use of the schools, must be furnished under the direction of city boards of education and * * * of school trustees, and charges therefor must be audited and paid as other claims against the county school fund of their districts are audited and paid."

This section applies primarily to elementary schools, but the High School Act (Pol. Code, § 1741) provides that except as otherwise provided the powers and duties of high school boards shall be "such as are now or may hereafter be assigned by law to boards of education or boards of school trustees in school districts." And, as has been pointed out, section 1756 of the same Code requires every high school board to file annually with the board of supervisors an estimate of the amount of money required for the annual expenses of the high school, including that for "books, magazines and apparatus" and for "other miscellaneous expenses," and under section 1757 the supervisors are required to include in their tax levy as a special fund for such high school districts a sufficient amount to cover such expenses. This provision for free text-books stands upon precisely the same grounds.

Having reached the conclusion that there is no constitutional limitation upon the Legislature in supplying free text-books, it follows, on the facts and reasoning stated, that the method of procuring and paying for such text-books as provided in the Free Text-Book Act is not in violation of the limitation of section 12, article 11, of the Constitution.

The petition is denied.

SHAW, J. I dissent.

If an amendment of the Constitution was necessary to authorize the Legislature to provide for free text-books in the elementary schools, as would seem to be implied from the adoption of the amendment of 1912, expressly giving such authority (section 7, art.

9), I can see no reason why it is not also necessary in order to authorize the Legislature to provide free text-books for the high schools for the use of the pupils therein. Both, alike, are gifts by the state to the pupil, or to the parents or guardians of the pupil, of the use of the text-books during the attendance at school, and both are, therefore, gifts of a "thing of value" to an individual. As such it is expressly forbidden by section 31 of article 4, of the Constitution. If the prevailing opinion is correct, the submission by the Legislature and the adoption by the people of the free text-book amendment of section 7, article 9, in 1912, was a vain and useless performance.

There is not, as it seems to me, any force in the suggestion that providing free text-books to a high school pupil is no more a gift than is the providing of buildings and the furniture, fixtures, and appliances therein which are reasonably necessary to carry on the schools. The Constitution itself provides that the Legislature "shall provide for a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported" (section 5, art. 9), and that "the public school system shall include * * * elementary schools and * * * secondary schools" (section 6, art. 9). The history of section 6 and its successive amendments shows that the term "secondary schools" has been substituted for the term "high schools" and means, or at least includes, high schools. The authority to provide for and support high schools, of necessity, implies authority to provide the buildings and the furniture, fixtures, and appliances therein necessary to carry them on. The authority to provide all these things is therefore derived from the express language of the Constitution.

The fact that a provision for free text-books is not essential to the maintenance of the high school system is demonstrated by the history of the common or elementary schools in this state and elsewhere. Such schools were successfully and effectively carried on in this state for more than 60 years before any free text-books were furnished for the pupils. Consequently, the authority to keep up and support high schools does not, by implication, include authority to furnish text-books for the pupils who attend them.

If it were not for the aforesaid constitutional prohibition against gifts by the state to any individual, I believe the Legislature would have power under the general grant of section 1, article 4, and under the command of section 1, article 9, to "encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral, and agricultural improvement," to go to the length of providing free text-books for pupils in all of the schools. But with this inhibition in force such gift is, in my opinion, beyond the legislative power.

MERVYN INV. CO. v. BIBER et al.

(S. F. 9000.)

1. Partnership 🔑227—Partner's rights under contract held not terminated by copartner's conveyance of interests to corporation.

Where partnership agreement between owner of apartment house and manager thereof provided for conveyance to manager of a one-third interest after indebtedness incurred by owner had been paid and advances made by owner had been repaid, and stipulated that owner could transfer interests to corporation which should be bound by the contract, owner's conveyance of his interests to a corporation, which agreed to be bound by such contract, though it terminated partnership relation between manager and owner, did not terminate manager's rights, under the contract, to pay off the liabilities of the business and acquire a one-third interest therein freed from such liabilities.

2. Partnership 🔑227—Assignee of partnership interest who agrees to be bound by partnership contract steps into assignor's shoes.

A partner's assignee who agrees with copartner's consent to be bound by the partnership contract steps into the partnership shoes of the assignor.

3. Corporations 🔑379—May enter partnership if so authorized by charter.

A corporation can become a partner if so authorized by its articles of incorporation and charter.

4. Corporations 🔑389—Burden of proving that charter did not permit corporation to become partner held on corporation.

A corporation which was organized to take over a partner's interest in certain business, and which for a time through its board of directors operated the business conjointly with the copartner, had burden of proving that its charter did not permit it to become a partner, to substantiate its claim that such a relation was ultra vires.

5. Corporations 🔑379—May be held liable as a partner to prevent injustice.

Though a corporation is without authority under its charter to form a partnership with another, it may be held liable as a partner to prevent injustice.

6. Partnership 🔑263—Withdrawal of partner prior to expiration of term does not affect interests of remaining partners.

Under Civ. Code, § 2451, a partner may withdraw from copartnership, notwithstanding agreement for a fixed term, but such withdrawal does not terminate partnership interests of remaining partners or deprive them of the right to carry out the articles of copartnership.

7. Partnership 🔑233—Right to control and disposition of assets in remaining partners after sale of partner's interest to stranger.

If one partner sells his interest to a stranger, the right to the control and disposition of the firm assets vests in the other partners, and a receiver may not be appointed in the absence of a showing of prejudice to retiring partners in permitting the remaining partners to liquidate the business.

8. Partnership 🔑81—Accounting to be governed by the copartnership agreement.

The accounting between partners is to be governed by the copartnership agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Action by the Mervyn Investment Company against George V. Biber and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Aitken & Aitken, Aitken, Glensor & Clewe, and R. H. Morrow, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Milton A. Nathan, of San Francisco (Crabbe & Webster, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The appellant and one Carl Werner were associated in the business of conducting an apartment house in the city of San Francisco.

Werner held a 10-year lease on the premises and had advanced money and incurred indebtedness for outfitting the apartments and otherwise financing the business. The appellant was operating the business and giving his entire time and attention to its management.

The business was conducted for some months under an oral agreement which was on the 8th of March, 1913, reduced to writing and duly executed by the parties. The agreement recites that:

> "Whereas the parties hereto have been and now are engaged in the business of conducting an apartment house on those certain premises located at 766 Sutter street, city and county of San Francisco, state of California, commonly known and designated as the Lucerne Apartments; and whereas, the said business has been financed by the said Carl Werner, both by advances in money and by the pledging of his financial credit; and whereas, since the commencement of said business the said George V. Biber has given his entire time and attention to the management of it: Now, therefore, it is agreed as follows."

The contract then declares:

That the parties have been and now are partners, and that they shall share in all profits and losses of the business in the proportion of one-third by appellant and two-thirds by Werner; that appellant shall devote all his time to the business and shall receive as compensation therefor $100 per month and the use of an apartment; that the indebtedness of the business shall be paid out of such income and profits as may be available for that purpose; and that Werner shall receive out of the first profits available for that purpose the sum of $3,855.70, and some further sums, with interest, on account of money advanced by him to finance the business.

It is provided further that when said sums have been repaid, Werner shall immediately convey to the appellant, Biber, a "one-third interest in all the property of the said Lucerne Apartments, including one-third interest in the lease thereof and of the business itself."

After other details, not material here, it is provided that the party of the first part, Werner, may at any time assign to a corporation all his rights, title, and interest in and to said apartment house and business, but that in the event of such transfer said corporation and the party of the second part, Biber, "shall be bound by all the terms and conditions of partnership herein contained."

The record discloses that within three weeks after the execution of this contract Werner made an assignment of all his interests in the partnership and in and to the apartment house and lease to the plaintiff corporation.

It appears that Werner organized this corporation, and it seems to be conceded that he organized it for the purpose of taking over the interests so conveyed, and that he held and owned substantially all the stock. The corporation accepted such transfer and assignment subject to all the terms and conditions set forth in the agreement between Werner and appellant and agreed to be bound thereby.

Thereafter Werner transferred all his stock in the corporation to one Jacoby, and at the time of the commencement of this action had no further interest in the apartment house or its business.

This suit was begun by the corporation, the respondent Mervyn Investment Company, which obtained a judgment adjudging the corporation to be the owner of the apartment lease, equipment, and business, subject to the rights of Biber accruing upon the completion of the payments under the original partnership agreement. It was further decreed that the assets of the partnership be sold and the proceeds be applied to payment of the remaining debts, together with the amounts advanced by Werner and claimed by plaintiff under its assignment from Werner, and that any remaining amount be paid to plaintiff and defendant Biber in the proportion of two-thirds to the former and one-third to the latter; also a receivership was created to take charge of the business and carry out the judgment of the court. It is from this judgment that the appeal is taken by defendant Biber.

The trial court, upon sufficient evidence, finds the facts substantially as herein stated, and further finds that the appellant was faithfully carrying out the terms of his contract; that the business was making a substantial profit; that the running expenses had been paid, as well as several thousand dollars of the indebtedness on Werner's credit; that appellant had not paid to Werner or to plaintiff the advances of money made by Werner in financing the enterprise. These payments were under the contract to be made only from available profits, and, as the profits of the business had thus far been applied to other indebtedness incurred by Werner, there had not come into appellant's hands any money available to that purpose. It does not appear from the contract in what order payments were to be made as between the amounts due Werner for advances and the amounts due his creditors, but the latter claims had to be met to keep the business going, and no question is made as to appellant's right to give preference to such claims. In short, there is nothing in the findings or in the evidence to indicate that there had been any default on the part of appellant in the faithful performance of the conditions of his contract.

There is nothing in the record tending to support the judgment other than the conclusion of the trial court that the copartnership between Werner and appellant terminated on the assignment by Werner of all his interest to the plaintiff.

[1] The assignment by Werner of his interest did undoubtedly terminate the partnership relation between Werner and Biber, but it did not terminate the right of Biber under the contract to pay off the liabilities of the business from the profits and acquire a one-third interest therein freed from these liabilities.

There is no express agreement under the contract that the partnership relation should continue for any given time. But the nature of the interest acquired thereunder by Biber, and the agreement that in the event of Werner selling out to a corporation the corporation was to accept the assignment subject to all the stipulated conditions, established a mutual understanding that the business relations were to continue and Biber was to remain in control until the debts were paid from the profits. The rule laid down in 30 Cyc. 417, is applicable here:

> "Oftentimes the parties do not state their intentions explicitly. In such event the term of the partnership is a matter of inference from the contract provisions and surrounding circumstances. If the partnership has for its object the completion of a specified piece of work or the conduct of a business which obviously continues through a particular season, it will be presumed that the parties intended the relation should continue until the object had been accomplished."

In the absence of any failure of Biber to conduct the business at a profit, or to carry out his part of the agreement, he cannot be deprived of the rights so guaranteed.

There is no finding by the trial court as to the effect of the acceptance by the plaintiff corporation of the assignment and transfer by Werner, as agreed to by Biber, with the express stipulation that it would be "bound by all the terms and conditions of the contract." Under the terms of this agreement and transfer the corporation was to stand in Werner's shoes as a partner. It is contended, however, on the part of respondent that the attempt to create such a relation was ultra vires.

In the first place, the contract between Werner and Biber was something more than the mere assumption of the business relations of partners. It was an agreement which vested in Biber the right to acquire a one-third interest in the assets of the business from its profits, and to conduct and manage it until from the proceeds he could receive that interest freed from existing debts and liabilities. Neither Werner nor his assigns could deprive him of this right by arbitrarily dissolving the partnership and shutting down the business. Conceding the right of Werner to withdraw from the partnership relation and the incapacity of respondent to enter into it, the property rights of appellant remained, and this right does not permit that the business be thrown into the hands of a receiver, sold at forced sale, and that he accept in satisfaction of his interest one-third of what was left, if anything, after all liabilities were paid out of the assets of the business itself instead of from its profits. If the respondent and its assignor from choice or legal necessity withdrew from the partnership relation, through no fault of appellant, equity, if not the law, should protect him in his right to the fruits of his contract.

[2, 3] It is not clear that the plaintiff did not consummate partnership relations with Biber. It accepted the assignment from Werner subject to precisely that condition and with Biber's consent. That under such conditions an assignee of one partner steps into the partnership shoes of his assignor is well recognized by the courts. Gorder v. Pankonin, 83 Neb. 204, 119 N. W. 449, 131 Am. St. Rep. 629; Rowley Mod. Law of Partnership, p. 768; Merrick v. Brainard, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 579; Heck v. McEwen, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 101; Tyrrell v. Washburn, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 470. Conceding that ordinarily the assuming of such a relation would be ultra vires on the part of a corporation, we know of no reason why it could not enter into a partnership if so authorized by its articles of incorporation and charter. White v. Pecos L. & W. Co., 18 Tex. Civ. App. 634, 45 S. W. 207; Bates v. Coronado Beach Co., 109 Cal. 160, 41 Pac. 855. Our Civil Code provides (section 286) that:

> "Private corporations may be formed for any purpose for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves."

[4, 5] It appears here that this corporation was organized by Werner, and that he was the principal stockholder. It is alleged by appellant, and not disputed, that the corporation was organized for the purpose of taking over Werner's interest in this business. The corporation did, through its board of directors, assume to exercise this power and for a time operated the business conjointly with Biber. The burden should rest upon it under such circumstances to show that its charter did not permit such a contract. Belch v. Big Store Co., 46 Wash. 1, 89 Pac. 174. It has not done this so far as this record discloses. Even where a corporation is without authority under its charter to form a partnership with another, it may be held liable as a partner to prevent injustice. Rowley Mod. Law of Partnership, vol. 1, §§ 193–197; Cleveland Paper Co. v. Courier Co., 67 Mich. 152, 34 N. W. 556; Boyd v. Am. C. B. Co., 182 Pa. 206, 37 Atl. 937.

[6] It is not necessary to a decision of this case in appellant's favor that it should appear that plaintiff corporation became a partner with appellant upon Werner's transfer to it of his interest. If it did become a partner, it was not precluded from withdrawing from such partnership. Even where a copartnership is for an agreed and fixed term any of the partners may withdraw. Section 2451 of the Civil Code provides that—

> "A general partnership may be dissolved, as to himself only, by the expressed will of any partner notwithstanding his agreement for its continuance."

The words we have italicized, however, indicate that the partnership interests of remaining partners are not thereby to be terminated. One member of a partnership created for a designated term may not of his own volition dissolve the same, so as to deprive remaining partners of the right to carry out the articles, and courts may not decree a dissolution against the will of remaining partners without other causes justifying it. Ferrero v. Buhlmeyer, 34 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 33.

It is entirely clear that the plaintiff by accepting this assignment under the expressed conditions of the original contract is in no better condition than Werner would have been after a voluntary withdrawal from the partnership.

Biber was left in a position where under the law he was entitled to continue the business as a liquidating partner until the contractual conditions and liabilities were carried out. Miller v. Brigham, 50 Cal. 615; Page v. Summers, 70 Cal. 123, 12 Pac. 120; Civ. Code, § 2458 et seq.; Crossen v. Murphy, 31 Or. 124, 49 Pac. 858.

The powers of remaining partners with respect to rights created pending the partnership remain after dissolution. Braun v. Woollacott, 129 Cal. 107, 61 Pac. 801; Davis v. Megroz, 55 N. J. Law, 427, 26 Atl. 1009.

[7, 8] If one partner sells his interest in the firm to a stranger, the right to the control and disposition of the firm assets vests in the other partners. 30 Cyc. 664; Reece v. Hoyt, 4 Ind. 169; Chase v. Scott, 33 Iowa, 309; Macdonald v. Trojan, etc., Co., 56 Hun, 648, 10 N. Y. Supp. 91. And a receiver may not be appointed in the absence of a showing of prejudice to retiring partners in permitting the remaining partners to liquidate the business. Painter v. Painter, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 636, 36 Pac. 865; Bates, Law of Partnership, § 993. The accounting between partners is to be governed by the copartnership agreement. Neudecker v. Kohlberg, 3 Daly [N. Y.] 407. Although there is nothing in the findings or judgment fixing Biber's status as a liquidating partner, he is recognized and referred to as such in the findings here. We think he was entitled to be so recognized, and as such to remain in possession and control of the business, and to liquidate its obligations and liabilities and carry out the objects of the partnership under the terms of the original agreement.

The conclusions of law and the judgment of the court should have so determined under its findings of fact.

Upon the showing made here of entire faithfulness and good management of the business and that it was a going concern operated at a profit there was no valid ground, in our judgment, either for ordering a forced sale of the property to liquidate its liabilities, or for creating a receivership.

The judgment is reversed.

BERNHARD v. WALL. (Sac. 2784.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1921.)

1. Public lands ⚷54(5) — Mandamus proceeding by applicant held to keep application to purchase alive.

Under St. 1885, p. 139, under which an application to purchase state lands could not be considered void, though on file for more than six months, if approval of the application had been demanded by the applicant, a mandamus proceeding by the applicant to compel approval of the application was in effect a continuing demand for such approval, and kept the application alive.

2. Public lands ⚷54(5) — Contest involving validity of prior deeds should have been referred to superior court or to court in which mandamus proceeding was pending.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3499, requiring contests between applicants for the purchase of state lands involving a question of law to be referred to the superior court, where an application was refused because the applicant would not pay certain taxes, penalties, etc., and a mandamus proceeding was instituted to compel approval of the application, pending which third parties filed an application to purchase, the surveyor general should have referred the applications to the superior court, or presented the matter of the conflicting claims to the court having jurisdiction of the mandamus proceeding.

3. Public lands 🔑54(5) — Prior applicant's claim paramount to that of subsequent applicant.

If one applying for the purchase of state lands, but refusing to pay certain taxes, penalties, etc., had a right to purchase on the terms proposed by him, his claim was paramount to that of subsequent applicants, and the surveyor general had no right or power to postpone his claim to that of the subsequent applicants.

4. Public lands 🔑54(9) — Patent issued to prior applicant in response to mandamus held to relate back and prevail over patent to subsequent applicant.

Where the surveyor general rejected an application for the purchase of school lands because the applicant refused to pay certain taxes, penalties, etc., but was compelled by mandamus to receive the application and issue a patent, the applicant's rights under the patent related back to the time of the application, and prevailed over patents previously issued to subsequent applicants.

5. Public lands 🔑54(7) — Foreclosure decree not void because copy of summons misdescribed land where judgment recited service.

A decree, forfeiting the rights of the purchaser of state lands for failure to make the deferred payments, was not void because a copy of the summons attached to the proof of publication included in the judgment roll misdescribed the land, where the decree recited that the purchaser was regularly served with process and the original summons was not on file, as it would be presumed from the recital in the decree that there was a summons actually published or served, correctly describing the land, if such description was required.

6. Public lands 🔑54(8)—Purchaser need not pay taxes, etc., where tax deed to state is void.

Pol. Code, § 3788, providing that when land purchased from the state is sold to the state for taxes and a tax deed issued to the state it shall again become subject to sale, but that the applicant must pay the delinquent taxes, penalties, etc., necessarily implies a valid tax sale, and does not apply where the deed is void on its face, because showing that the first publication of the notice of sale was more than 28 days prior to the date fixed for sale.

7. Taxation 🔑734(9)—Tax deed void, when first publication of notice of sale is more than 28 days prior to date fixed.

Under Pol. Code, § 3767, providing that the notice of tax sale shall designate the time of sale which must not be less than 21, nor more than 28, days from the time of the first publication, the publication was insufficient, and the deed based thereon void, when the notice was first published more than 28 days prior to the date fixed for sale.

8. Taxation 🔑788(5) — Tax deed only prima facie evidence that sale was at proper time and overcome by recital showing contrary.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 3786, 3787, tax deeds are only prima facie evidence that the tax sales were made at a proper time, and this prima facie proof is refuted by recitals in the deeds showing that the sales were made more than 28 days after the first publication of the notice of sale.

9. Taxation 🔑788(2)—Statute as to conclusiveness of tax deed construed as to deeds to which applicable.

Pol. Code, § 3786, providing that "such deed" is primary evidence of certain facts, and section 3787, providing that "such deed" is conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, refers to tax deeds authorized by section 3785, as well as those authorized by section 3785b.

10. Judgment 🔑713(2) — Estops defendant from claiming that matter not relied on would have been a defense if relied on.

The judgment in a mandamus proceeding, requiring the surveyor general to approve an application for the purchase of state lands without requiring the applicant to pay certain taxes, penalties, etc., estopped the surveyor general from claiming that a tax deed, not relied on in such proceeding, would have been a defense thereto, as it was conclusive of any fact which might have been alleged and proved to show that the applicant was not entitled to the relief given by the judgment.

11. Judgment 🔑702—Judgment on mandamus against surveyor general, requiring approval of application to purchase state lands, was binding on the state.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 497, 3395–3573, inclusive, relative to the duties of the surveyor general, a judgment in a mandamus proceeding, requiring him to approve an application for the purchase of state lands, was binding and conclusive against the state to the same extent that it bound the surveyor general.

12. Mandamus 🔑178 — Judgment, requiring approval of application to purchase lands, relates back to beginning of proceeding.

A judgment in a mandamus proceeding, requiring the surveyor general to approve an application for the purchase of state lands, related back to the beginning of the proceeding, and fixed the respective rights of the parties and of the state as of that time, based on the conditions then existing.

13. Vendor and purchaser 🔑239(6) — Innocent purchaser from apparent record owner takes title free from undisclosed and unrecorded title of third party.

Under Civ. Code, § 1214, where land is unoccupied and a person holds title thereto by an unrecorded contract or deed, and a third person, in ignorance thereof, and in good faith, and for value, buys the land from the apparent record owner, he takes the title free from the prior, but undisclosed and unrecorded, title of such other party.

14. Vendor and purchaser 🔑223—Rule as to rights of innocent purchaser inapplicable where his deed or patent is void.

The rule that an innocent purchaser of land for value from the apparent record owner takes title free from the undisclosed and unrecorded title of another does not prevail where the innocent purchaser holds under a deed or patent which is absolutely void.

15. Public lands 🔑54(10) — Rejected application to purchase state lands held not to give applicant equity superior to that of subsequent innocent purchasers.

Where the surveyor general refused to receive or file an application for the purchase of state lands, but was subsequently compelled to do so by mandamus, the mere rejected offer did not withdraw the land from sale to other applicants, or put the applicant in privity with the state so as to give him an equity superior to that of innocent purchasers, paying for the land on the faith of the record title, during the pendency of the mandamus proceedings.

16. Judgment 🔑702 — Innocent purchasers held not represented by surveyor general in mandamus suit so as to render judgment conclusive on them.

Where the surveyor general refused to receive or file an application for the purchase of state lands and pending a mandamus proceeding to compel approval of the application accepted the application of third persons and issued patents to them, innocent purchasers from such patentees were not represented in the mandamus proceeding by the surveyor general so as to be bound by the judgment.

17. Lis pendens 🔑18 — Innocent purchasers held not charged with constructive notice of mandamus proceeding not filed.

Where notice of the pendency of a mandamus proceeding against the surveyor general to compel approval of an application for the purchase of state lands was not filed under Code Civ. Proc. § 409, innocent purchasers were not charged with constructive notice of the pendency of the proceeding, whether or not such section applies to such a proceeding.

18. Vendor and purchaser 🔑220 — Innocent purchaser need not allege and prove grantor's possession.

As, in California, a deed by a person out of possession passes all the title of the grantor, one claiming to be an innocent purchaser for value without notice need not aver and prove that at the date of his deed his grantor was in possession of the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Peter D. Bernhard against J. H. Wall. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Bolton, of San Francisco, and Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, for appellant.

L. T. Hatfield, V. L. Hatfield, and W. H. Hatfield, all of Sacramento, and R. M. Rankin, of Orland (Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from the judgment. The objects of the action, as expressed in the prayer of the complaint, were to obtain a decree declaring void certain state land patents issued to Robert M. Rankin and Thomas J. Dunlap, respectively, or, in case the patents should be held legal, to declare that defendant holds title to the lands described therein in trust for the plaintiff, and that he be compelled to convey said lands to plaintiff, and for general relief. The findings are within the issues, and the principal, if not the only, points urged in support of the appeal are that the findings do not support the judgment, and the facts will be stated as we proceed with the argument.

The land in controversy is the south half, the northwest quarter, and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 36, township 34 north, range 9 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, situated in Lassen county. Said section is one of the school sections granted to the state by the United States. On May 11, 1903, Peter D. Bernhard, the plaintiff, offered to the surveyor general an application and affidavit, in due form, to purchase said land, and also offered to pay the fee and make the deposit required by law on the filing of such an application. The surveyor general refused to receive or file said application and affidavit or accept the money tendered, claiming that the land was subject to certain taxes assessed against it while it was held under a previous purchase from the state, after the purchase and before said purchaser's right became extinguished by foreclosure, and that Bernhard was required to pay the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs so assessed, as a condition of making his entry. Bernhard on the same day began an action in the superior court of Sacramento county against the surveyor general for a writ of mandate to compel him officially to accept said fee and receive and file said application and affidavit as of the date of May 11, 1903. An alternative writ of mandate was issued in said action on May 14, 1903, and was duly served on the surveyor general on May 15, 1903.

Notwithstanding this offer to purchase and the pendency of the action and service of the writ upon him, the surveyor general, on May 27, 1903, accepted from Dunlap an application and affidavit to purchase the south half of said section (Dunlap then paying the fees, the deposit, and also the taxes claimed by the surveyor general, assessed as aforesaid), and thereafter issued a certificate of purchase, in pursuance whereof a state patent was issued to Dunlap on November 29, 1904. On May 27, 1903, Rankin also applied in like manner to purchase the remainder of the land in controversy, paying the deposit, the fee and the taxes. His application and affidavit were accepted, and in pursuance thereof a state patent was issued to him on November 29, 1904. At the time these patents were issued there had been filed in the proceeding in mandamus, a demurrer to the amended complaint therein, and said demurrer had not been disposed of by the court. Afterwards, and before the present action was begun, the mandamus suit was decided, resulting in a final judgment commanding the surveyor general to receive the said application of plaintiff to purchase said land, on payment of the fees and deposit provided by law, and to file the same in his office as of the 11th day of May, 1903. The payment was made, the surveyor general thereupon complied with the judgment, received and filed the application, and thereafter in pursuance thereof, full payment having been made, a state patent was issued to the plaintiff, purporting to convey to him the lands described in the complaint herein. This patent bears the date of August 29, 1913.

Upon the facts above stated, considered apart from the other findings of the court, it is clear that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief asked. Section 1 of the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 434) provides that applications to the surveyor general to purchase school lands must be accompanied by a deposit of $20, and that the surveyor general should give the applicant a receipt therefor, and that the receipt should be accepted by the county treasurer as part payment of the purchase price. Section 2 provided:

> "Any number of filings on any section of land is hereby permitted and allowed under the provisions of this Act. Should the first filing be abandoned by the applicant, the next filing on such section, in order, shall have the same right as if it had been the first filing."

[1-4] Section 3499 of the Political Code then provided that "if two or more claim the same land," the contest must be determined as provided in section 3414. That section provides that when "a question of law is involved," the contest must be referred to the superior court of the county in which the land lies. Under section 3498, as it read at that time (St. 1885, p. 139), an unapproved application to purchase land from the state could not be considered void, although on file for more than six months, if approval thereof had been demanded by the applicant. The proceeding in mandamus was, in effect, a continuing demand for such approval and it kept alive the application of Bernhard. When the applications of Dunlap and Rankin were made for the same land, it made a case where two or more persons claimed the same land. The determination of their respective rights, as will be seen, involved a question of the validity of the previous deeds to the state for the taxes above mentioned, which was a question of law. Consequently, it was then the duty of the surveyor general to refer the applications to the proper superior court, or to present the matter of the conflicting claims to the court having jurisdiction of the mandamus proceeding, instead of accepting the later applications and issuing unqualified certificates thereon to the said applicants. With respect to the rights of the persons in this situation, in Hinckley v. Fowler, 43 Cal. 63, where Fowler's application antedated that of Hinckley for the same land, the court said:

> "The application of Fowler, thus made in accordance with law, gave him, as against the state, and, so long as the statute remained in force, a privilege to purchase the land he applied for. As against the officers of the state, and all applicants for the same land subsequent in point of time, it conferred upon him a right to purchase, which could only be lost by his own failure to pursue the further steps which the statute had prescribed. The malfeasance or misfeasance of any of the officers could not deprive him of the benefit of his application, nor operate to postpone him to the claim of a subsequent applicant."

See Pollard v. Putnam, 54 Cal. 630; Sherman v. Winkle, 121 Cal. 503, 53 Pac. 1090, 54 Pac. 270; Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 647, 26 L. Ed. 875, to the same effect. Upon these principles, and under the provisions of the act of 1889, above quoted, it is plain that if Bernhard had the right to purchase on the terms he proposed, his claim was paramount to that of Dunlap or Rankin, and that the surveyor general had no right or power to postpone his claim to that of a subsequent applicant. With reference to the rights of the parties in such circumstances, when the land department of the state has proceeded, notwithstanding the law, to issue certificates and patents to different persons for the same land, this court said:

> "In cases of conflicting patents from a paramount source of title, it is well settled that, even at common law in actions of ejectment, the court will look behind the patents and ascertain which party had the prior equity. When this is ascertained, the equity will attach itself to the legal title, which will take effect by relation at the time when the equity accrued. Thus it often happens that a junior patent, founded on a prior equity, is held, even in a court of law, to prevail over an eider patent founded on a junior equity." Smith v. Athern, 34 Cal. 511.

Other cases to the same effect are Yates v. Smith, 38 Cal. 65; Poppe v. Athearn, 42 Cal. 615, and Young v. Shinn, 48 Cal. 28.

It follows that the right of the plaintiff, under his patent, would relate back to the time when he made his application and offered the necessary deposit to make the same good, and that as this was prior to the applications of the other patentees, the plaintiff's patent would prevail.

In the court below the defendant contested the priority of the plaintiff's patent upon substantially the same grounds that were presented by the surveyor general in opposition to the writ of mandate in the mandamus proceeding. The court below held that the judgment in the mandamus case was not binding on the defendant as an adjudication of his right or title, and on the defense set up it made findings in favor of the defendant. We proceed to consider the points arising from these findings.

In 1873 one George Foster obtained a certificate of purchase from the state for the south half of the section, upon a partial payment of the price. On January 24, 1881, his right to purchase was forfeited by the filing of a certified copy of a foreclosure decree against him in the surveyor general's office, and the land thereupon again became subject to entry and sale. Pol. Code, §§ 3458 to 3554; Directors v. Abila, 106 Cal. 355, 39 Pac. 794. In 1886 Lawrence J. Parkinson obtained from the surveyor general a certificate of purchase for the whole of section 36, and made a partial payment thereon. He afterwards transferred his right thereunder to Boggs & Champlain. The deferred payments to the state were not made, and on June 20, 1896, a foreclosure decree, purporting to forfeit the said right, was entered in the superior court, and was filed in the surveyor general's office on July 6, 1896. The court below found that the summons in the action was never served, and that consequently the court did not have jurisdiction to make said decree. In 1895 the land was assessed for taxes in the name of Boggs & Champlain, and on September 13, 1901, a tax deed to the state, in pursuance of a sale based on said assessment, was filed in the surveyor general's office. In 1896 the south half of the section was assessed for taxes in the name of George Foster, and on August 26, 1902, a tax deed to the state, made in pursuance of a sale based on the Foster assessment, was filed in the surveyor general's office. When Bernhard applied to purchase the land in 1903 he did not offer to pay the sums due under these tax deeds. The court below held that he should have made such payments, and that his application was ineffectual because of his omission to do so.

[5] The court below was in error in holding that the record in the Parkinson foreclosure did not show jurisdiction. Its decision on that point was based on the fact that in a copy of the summons attached to the proof of publication included in the judgment roll the description of the land described the section as "section 16," instead of section 36. No other form of proof of service was on file, nor was the original summons among the papers. The decree itself, however, contained the following recital:

> "In this action the defendant Lawrence J. Parkinson having been regularly served with process, as required by law, and having failed to appear and answer the complaint of the plaintiff herein, and the legal time for answering having expired, and the default of said defendant Lawrence J. Parkinson having been duly entered according to law."

It further recited that the case was legally brought on for hearing, and duly submitted to the court, and that the court heard "the proof necessary to enable it to render judgment herein." The defect in failing to correctly state the number of the section in the description of the land was not fatal to the jurisdiction. Where there is a recital of service, such as that contained in the present decree, the fact that there appears among the papers what purports to be a copy of the summons which incorrectly describes the land is not sufficient to overcome the recital in the decree. "It will be presumed that other proof than that contained in the judgment roll was made, for not to so presume would be to deny to the record that absolute verity which must be accorded to it." Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 408, 94 Am. Dec. 742; McCauley v. Fulton, 44 Cal. 361; Reiley v. Lancaster, 39 Cal. 354; People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 678, 77 Pac. 651; People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 609, 24 Pac. 311. The result of these decisions is that where the judgment itself recites service, as in this case, and the original summons is not on file, nor any other evidence of service except the affidavit of publication with the defective description in the copy of summons, it will be presumed from the recital, that there was a summons actually published, or actually served, which did correctly describe the land, if any description was required. We are not to be understood as holding that any description of the land was necessary under section 407, Code of Civil Procedure, as then existing. It follows, therefore, that the court had jurisdiction, the decree was valid, and the right to purchase under the Parkinson certificate became extinguished on July 6, 1896, when the copy of the decree was filed in the office of the surveyor general.

[6, 7] The conclusion of the court that it was necessary for a purchaser, in order to make a legal application to purchase these lands, to pay the taxes assessed against the land while it was under the Parkinson purchase, is also erroneous. This conclusion was founded upon the provisions of section 3788 of the Political Code that, when land purchased from the state, and not fully paid for, has been sold to the state for delinquent taxes assessed thereon against the purchaser or his successor in interest, and a tax deed has been issued to the state upon such sale, and has been filed with the surveyor general, the land "shall again become subject to entry and sale" in the same manner as before, except that the applicant must, as a condition to purchasing, pay into the state treasury, in addition to the price fixed for such lands, a sum equal to the delinquent taxes, penalties, costs, and accruing costs, by virtue whereof the state became a purchaser of the land at the tax sale and also the taxes subsequently accrued on the land prior to the date of the application. These provisions necessarily imply a valid sale to the state upon the tax assessment. They have no application where a deed has been made which is void on its face. In the present case both the deed executed upon the Foster assessment and that on the Boggs & Champlain assessment recited that the notice of publication of the delinquent sale was first published on a day which was more than 28 days prior to the day fixed therein for the delinquent sale. The statute on the subject (Pol. Code, § 3767) provided that the notice published must designate the day and hour when the property will be sold to the state, which sale "must not be less that twenty-one nor more than twenty-eight days from the time of the first publication" of the notice. It necessarily follows that the publication was not sufficient to authorize the sale and that the deed based thereon was void.

[8, 9] Section 3787, which makes the tax deed "conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings," from the assessment down to the deed does not apply to or cure this defect. Sections 3786 and 3787 must be read and construed together. The phrase "all other proceedings," in section 3787, refers back to section 3786, and therefore includes only such proceedings as are not included in section 3786. The presumption as to the proceeding which fixes the time for the sale is prescribed by section 3786. It declares that the tax deed is "primary," meaning prima facie, evidence of the fact that the property was sold "at a proper time." Subdivision 5. The statement in Warden v. Broome, 9 Cal. App. 175, 98 Pac. 252, to the effect that this matter was covered by section 3787, is inaccurate, and this was evidently overlooked or considered unimportant by this court in denying a rehearing in that case. The "proper time" here referred to is the time designated in the published notice, as provided in section 3767. That time is to be fixed by the tax collector when he prepares the notice and publishes it with the delinquent list. Sections 3764, 3765. The tax deeds here in question were therefore only prima facie evidence that the tax sales on which they were founded were made "at a proper time." This prima facie proof was completely refuted by recitals in the deeds to the effect above stated, showing that the sales were not made at "a proper time," but were made at a time when any lawful proper time had expired. Each tax deed was therefore void on its face. It is proper here to explain that the phrase "such deed," with which both sections 3786 and 3787 begin, must, in the present condition of the Code, be understood to refer both to the deed authorized by section 3785 and to that authorized by section 3785b. When the Code was first enacted, and until the year 1909, the three sections, 3785, 3786, and 3787, appeared therein in regular consecutive order, with no intervening sections. The phrase "such deed" in sections 3786 and 3787 then necessarily referred only to section 3785, it being then the only section authorizing a tax deed. In 1909 section 3785a, and in 1913 section 3785b, were interpolated between section 3785 and section 3786, thus giving rise to some uncertainty as to the particular deed or deeds to which the phrase "such deed" applied. We are satisfied that it now refers both to section 3785 and section 3785b, and applies to the deeds authorized by both sections.

The result is that the surveyor general was not authorized to demand payment of any taxes by the plaintiff as a condition of accepting and approving plaintiff's application to purchase the land in controversy, and that he should have accepted and approved the same upon plaintiff's tender of the necessary amount of money.

[10-12] The validity of the foreclosure decree against Parkinson and the validity of the tax deed filed in the surveyor general's office based on the assessment to Boggs & Champlain were questions directly put in issue in the mandamus proceeding of Bernhard against the surveyor general. That judgment was an adjudication that the Parkinson foreclosure was valid, and that the tax deed was invalid. It was conclusive, not only of the matters actually alleged in opposition to the writ, but also of any fact which might have been alleged and proven in that proceeding to show that Bernhard was not entitled to the relief given by the judgment. Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 149, 51 Pac. 38. It follows, therefore, that if the tax deed on the Foster assessment would have been a defense to the mandamus proceeding, it would have been the surveyor general's duty to plead it therein, and, failing to do so, he would be forever estopped to claim that it was a defense. Unquestionably that judgment was a final adjudication of the right of Bernhard, binding on the surveyor general in his official capacity. He is the state official in charge of all matters pertaining to the disposal of the public lands of the state. He is ex officio register of the state land office. Pol. Code, § 497. His duties in relation to public lands are prescribed in sections 3395 to 3573, inclusive, of the Political Code. In any proceeding against him to compel him to perform an official duty in disposing of the public land, he represents the state, and the judgment rendered in such proceeding is in all respects binding and conclusive against the state to the same extent that it binds the officer in his official conduct with respect to the matter decided. Such a judgment bars the state from afterwards setting up to the contrary of what is there adjudicated. Furthermore, it related back to the beginning of the proceeding, and fixed the respective rights of the parties and of the state as of that time, based upon the conditions then existing. It therefore follows that the right of Bernhard to have his application to purchase and his deposit of money accepted on the 11th day of May, 1903, was conclusively determined by that judgment, not only as against the surveyor general, but also as against the state. The state and all its officers were thereby estopped to deny such right, or to claim that thereafter in disregard of that right, it had regularly or lawfully disposed of the land to other and subsequent applicants, or that it could so dispose of it, so long as Bernhard's right continued.

But, although the Attorney General and the state were both precluded from claiming any right or title to the land adversely to Bernhard's title under his patent, or from disposing of the land contrary to the decision in the mandamus proceeding, the defendant, Wall, claims that he occupies a different position in regard to the matter. The surveyor general made no entry or memorandum whatever in the records of his office concerning the making of the application by Bernhard or the service of the alternative writ of mandate against him or the pendency of those proceedings. The records and files of his office disclosed nothing relating thereto. After Dunlap and Rankin obtained their patents in 1904, their titles by mesne conveyances became vested in one Burgess. The land never was occupied. Wall desired to purchase the land, and with that in view he had the records of Lassen county searched to ascertain the condition of the title. Bernhard had not caused any notice of the action to be filed in the recorder's office of that county, as provided in section 409 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Wall found nothing in the records to show any interest, right, or title of Bernhard in or to the land, but ascertained that the record showed that the title was vested in Burgess under state patents, and, being wholly without knowledge that Bernhard had any right or title to the land or made any claim thereto, the land itself being unoccupied, Wall thereupon purchased the land from Burgess, paid him $8,000 therefor, and, on November 21, 1907, received from him a deed therefor, which he duly recorded. He stands in the position of an innocent purchaser for value without notice of any adverse claim, and he contends that thereby he holds the title free from any claim of Bernhard under his previous application and subsequent patent.

[13, 14] The rule is well settled that where land is unoccupied and a person holds title thereto by a contract or deed which is not recorded, and a third person in ignorance thereof, in good faith and for value, buys the land from the apparent record owner thereof, he takes the title free from the prior, but undisclosed and unrecorded title of the other party. Civ. Code, § 1214. The plaintiff claims that this rule does not prevail where the party claiming to be an innocent purchaser holds under a deed or patent which is absolutely void. The proposition cannot be denied. It applies as well to private conveyances as to patents issued for public lands of the state or of the United States. If the land in question never were public property, or if it had previously been disposed of or withdrawn from sale or disposition, or if the law had not made any provision for the sale thereof, or had reserved it from sale temporarily at the time the initiatory steps for its acquisition were taken and the proceeding initiated had not been subsequently ratified or authorized, a patent issued to a claimant would be absolutely void, at least as against a prior valid claim, although regularly obtained in form as provided by law. Lake Superior, etc. Co. v. Cunningham, 155 U. S. 354, 15 Sup. Ct. 103, 39 L. Ed. 183; Parker v. Duff, 47 Cal. 554; McGarrahan v. New Idria, etc., Co., 49 Cal. 335.

[15] The plaintiff claims that the land was withdrawn from sale the moment Bernhard made his application to purchase, accompanied with the legal tender of the fees and the required deposit of money. The argument is that this application, although not accepted or approved, was the first initiatory step in his proceeding to obtain the state patent, that it has been diligently followed up to patent, and that, under the decisions of this court and of the United States Supreme Court, his patent is founded on a prior equity, and, though later in date, must prevail over the patents issued upon the subsequent applications of Dunlap and Rankin, even if the land has passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser for value. The general rule invoked is that—

> "The party who takes the initiatory in such cases, if followed up to patent, is deemed to have acquired the better right as against others to the premises." Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 337, 23 L. Ed. 424.

The patent afterwards issued, it is said, relates back to the date of the initiatory act, and cuts off intervening claimants. Id. There are many decisions to this effect. For the most part, however, the facts upon which the status of an innocent purchaser for value must depend did not exist in those cases, and the question was not discussed or mentioned. The cases in which the first pre-emption claimant has been held to have the prior equity as against a subsequent entryman whose patent was first issued could not come within the conditions necessary to raise the question, for in order to obtain any right at all under the pre-emption laws, the claimant must have first settled upon and improved the land claimed, and must have thereafter personally and continuously resided upon it. Bohall v. Dilla, 114 U. S. 51, 5 Sup. Ct. 782, 29 L. Ed. 61. Such continuous residence and improvements would constitute possession and occupancy, and would impart constructive notice to all subsequent claimants of the land. All such cases may therefore be excluded from consideration. The following cases, cited and relied on by plaintiff, come within this category: Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330, 23 L. Ed. 424; Weeks v. Bridgman, 159 U. S. 541, 16 Sup. Ct. 72, 40 L. Ed. 253.

The same reasoning applies to the cases wherein the initiatory step which created the prior equity was the filing of some paper in the public land office, or the making of some entry in the books thereof, showing the claim of such first claimant and constituting a part of the public record and files of the office. Such writings would impart notice to a subsequent claimant, and would prevent him from occupying the position of an innocent purchaser. The following cases, cited by the plaintiff, are of this class: Smith v. Athern, supra; People v. Carrick, 51 Cal. 325; Stoddard v. Chambers, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 284, 11 L. Ed. 269; McCreery v. Haskell, 119 U. S. 327, 7 Sup. Ct. 176, 30 L. Ed. 408; Webster v. Clear, 49 Ohio St. 397, 31 N. E. 744; Hinckley v. Fowler, supra; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. (49 U. S.) 531, 12 L. Ed. 1170; Moyer v. McCullough, 1 Ind. 340; Kempner v. State, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 363, 72 S. W. 888; Roseberry v. Hollister, 4 Ohio St. 297; Huntington v. Donovan, 192 Pac. 543.

The only other case cited by plaintiff on this point is Boyles v. Kelly, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 217. The facts in that case occurred before, during, and immediately after the War of the Revolution, and it concerned land subject to sale under the laws of Pennsylvania, to which we have not access. It appears from the opinion, however, that the prior settler whose successors finally prevailed had, in regular form, made application to the public land officers to buy the land, and that the only defect in his proceeding was the failure of the public surveyor to return the survey he had made for that settler. As to that, the court held that such misconduct of the officer could not prejudice the claimant, who was in no default, that the survey must "be considered as if it had been actually returned," and that the person who bought bona fide from a subsequent claimant who had secured a patent "was bound to take notice of the survey at his peril," and for that reason did not stand in the position of an innocent purchaser for value. The case is somewhat similar to the class of cases last mentioned. At all events, the first claimant was in actual privity with the state as a purchaser, and was shown to be so by the record, at the time the second claim was initiated.

In all cases where a prior equity has prevailed over a patent issued upon a subsequent claim, it appeared that the first applicant had done some act which had the effect, under the law, of bringing him into privity with the state as a purchaser of the land. He had been recognized, both by the law and the officers who were administering it, as an eligible purchaser. In the case of a preemption claimant, his settlement and residence on the land and the improvement thereof, with intent to purchase, were sufficient to bring him into privity with the United States as a purchaser. In the case of land which could be purchased without a previous entry thereon, the making of a proper application by one qualified under the law to purchase it, accompanied with the payment of the legal fees and the deposit of the required part of the purchase price, and the acceptance and filing thereof, would bring the applicant into privity with the state as a purchaser, even before the officer approved the application. But we know of no case which holds that the mere offer of such application, fees, and deposit, and the refusal of the officer to receive them, will give the applicant privity with the state, and enable him to resist the claims of third persons. The decisions are to the contrary. In Burling v. Thompkins, 77 Cal. 261, 19 Pac. 429, the court said that only one in privity with the paramount title of the United States can attack collaterally a patent issued for lands listed to the state as lieu lands, and that—

> "The refusal of the register of the United States Land Office to allow him [the defendant] to make proper application, and pay the fee required, does not, under the circumstances, establish any privity with the United States."

To the same effect see Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 411; Dreyfus v. Badger, 108 Cal. 64, 41 Pac. 279; Youle v. Thomas, 146 Cal. 543, 80 Pac. 714; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 326; Burrell v. Haw, 40 Cal. 377; Damrell v. Meyer, 40 Cal. 170.

The terms of the statute do not sustain the claim that the mere rejected offer of Bernhard operated to withdraw the land from sale to other applicants, or to put him in privity with the state. It is the making of a filing which establishes the status of the applicant and gives him preference over subsequent filings, unless his filing is abandoned. It is therefore clearly apparent that so far as third persons are concerned, who acted without knowledge of his offer and paid money for the land on the faith of the record title, the plaintiff has no prior equity. He paid nothing for the land until long after the defendant purchased it. The delay of nearly seven years in bringing to judgment the action in mandamus indicates that he used little diligence in prosecuting the same. There was ample time before the Dunlap and Rankin applications were approved for him to have had them brought in as defendants to the action, and thus have concluded them by that judgment. Plaintiff's case does not present as strong an appeal to the principles of equity as that of the defendant.

[16] The plaintiff claims, however, that the surveyor general, as a public officer in charge of the land department of the state, represented the state in the mandamus proceeding and all persons thereafter coming in privity with it, and consequently that the judgment in mandamus concluded the subsequent patentees and all persons claiming under them, citing Lyman v. Faris, 53 Iowa, 498, 5 N. W. 621; Ashton v. Rochester, 133 N. Y. 187, 30 N. E. 965, 31 N. E. 334, 28 Am. St. Rep. 619; and similar cases. These are cases where in an action by or against a public officer the validity of a tax levy or local assessment and the duty of the officer relating thereto were involved and determined. They establish the rule that in such cases the officer represents all persons whose property is affected by the tax or assessment, and that the judgment therein finally determines the validity or invalidity of the tax, and is binding on the entire class of persons interested, although not parties to the action and having no knowledge thereof. We do not think this principle is properly applicable to the case where an officer is dealing officially with a specific parcel of land which he is authorized by the state to sell, and is compelled by mandate to perform a particular duty respecting the same to a person desiring to purchase it.

> "This doctrine, tersely stated, is to the effect that where it appears that a particular party, though not before the court in person, is so far represented by others who are before the court that his interests receive actual and efficient protection, his actual joinder may be dispensed with, and the decree may be held to be binding upon him." 15 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 627.
> "Like most of the other exceptions to the general rule, the doctrine of virtual representation rests upon considerations of necessity and paramount convenience, and was adopted to prevent a failure of justice." Id. 629.

One of the conditions to which the doctrine applies is where the parties are too numerous to be conveniently brought before the court in the action. The cases cited are of this class. This condition does not exist here. No person was or could be interested in the proceeding in mandamus until he had himself applied to purchase the identical land, in which event, as we have said, the law provides a mode for settling the respective rights of the several claimants. Pol. Code, § 3414. We know of no case in which the doctrine of representation has been enforced against a person who was not a party to the action and who, during its pendency, purchased the property involved therein without notice and for value, from one who also was not a party. The reasons upon which the doctrine rests do not exist in such a case, and its application would produce manifest injustice.

[17] No notice of the pendency of the action in mandamus as provided in the Code was filed either in Sacramento county, or in Lassen county, where the land lies. It is at least doubtful if section 409, Code of Civil Procedure, applies to such actions. If it does, the terms of that section, in effect, declare that, if there is a failure to comply with it, there can be no constructive notice of the pendency of the action. If that section does not apply to such action, it then comes within the rule stated in MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 108, 170 Pac. 616, and other decisions there referred to, to the effect that section 409 is exclusive, and that an action of any other character than is there provided for does not constitute constructive notice of its pendency.

[18] Finally the plaintiff claims that the defendant cannot assert his title as an innocent purchaser for value without notice, unless he avers and proves that, at the time of the execution of the deed from Burgess to him, Burgess was in possession of the land. He supports this claim by the following quotation from Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 167, 3 Pac. 644:

> "To entitle a party to protection as such a purchaser he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, the purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith, and without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment, for if he had notice, actual or constructive, at any moment of time before the payment of the money, he is not a bona fide purchaser."

This passage is a part of the argument to support the proposition that one claiming as an innocent purchaser must show that he took without notice of the adverse claim. The question of possession was not involved. Several later decisions of this court are cited, each of which either paraphrases or quotes the passage in Eversdon v. Mayhew. All of them, however, were directed to the subject of notice and the question of possession was not involved. The rule there stated is substantially that enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 210, 9 L. Ed. 388. That case related to transactions which took place near the beginning of the last century. The law applying to such transactions of that period was the common law of England, and the rule regarding bona fide purchasers was the rule obtaining under the old common law. The reason for the insertion of the statement in the rule that the one claiming as a bona fide purchaser must show that his grantor was in possession is readily perceived when we consider the common-law rule that a deed for land then in the adverse possession of another was inoperative and void, excepting against the grantor and persons claiming under him. Steeple v. Downing, 60 Ind. 486; Patterson v. Nixon, 79 Ind. 251; 1 Jones on Real Property, § 121. It is but a variation of the rule already stated that the innocent purchaser cannot claim as such if his deed is void. It being necessary for him to aver and prove that he holds under a valid deed, it was, of course, necessary under the common law for him to allege that his grantor was then in possession, for otherwise his deed would be void. This is the foundation of that part of the rule, and this is the effect of all the decisions on the subject. It has no application in this state, where a deed by a person out of possession is effective to pass all the title of the grantor both as against the person in adverse possession and all others. Consequently, the foundation of the rule invoked by the plaintiff does not exist. The patents from the state to Dunlap and Rankin operated to transfer the title of the state to them, and the subsequent conveyances transferred it to the defendant. If all the purchasers had had notice of the claims of Bernhard, it may be that they would be bound to hold the land in trust for him. But inasmuch as Wall did not have such notice, the title has passed, notwithstanding the fact that the land was at the time unoccupied.

CURTIN v. MORAN & CO. (Civ. 2184.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence 🔑450(8)—Sale agreement held ambiguous, justifying admission of parol testimony.

In a contract for the sale of a specific number of cows at a price per head, a provision that "all stock for delivery are to be selected by a representative of the buyer" held obscure as to whether the buyer was to select 75 head, or to select such number at fixed price as representative might desire, so that parol testimony was admissible, not to modify the agreement, but to explain its language.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where a conflict in evidence has been resolved by the trial court in favor of plaintiff, that finding is binding on the District Court of Appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by John B. Curtin against Moran & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for appellant.

J. B. Curtin and J. T. B. Warne, both of Sonora, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The action arises out of a written contract entered into by and between the parties on June 1, 1919, for the sale of 90 head of cattle by the plaintiff to the defendant.

The said contract provided that the plaintiff would sell to the defendant and that the latter would purchase and receive 90 head of "fat cattle" as follows: Seventy-five head of cows at $75 per head, five bulls at $75 per head, 1 bull at $20, and nine head at a price to be later agreed upon or at the time of the selection of the cattle by defendant or its agent. Upon the execution of said contract, the defendant paid to the plaintiff the sum of $2,000 on the purchase price. The contract further provided:

> "All of said cattle to be selected by a representative of the buyer, and the prices hereinbefore stated include delivery f. o. b. cars at Warnerville. All stock for delivery are to be selected by a representative of the buyer in time for delivery as aforesaid. Said seller agrees that he will maintain, feed, and water and care for said stock, and deliver them as herein provided, in a fat and merchantable condition, and that he will not deliver any swaybacks, big jaws, dwarfs, or otherwise deformed or unhealthy stock, on this contract, and same shall be free and exempt from state and federal quarantine regulations, and free from all liens and incumbrances whatsoever; also that no stock shall be removed or sold from the above-described live stock until after the delivery of all the stock included in this contract, without the written consent of the buyer; all stock to be shrunk per cent. and * * * stood hours in a dry pen without feed or water before weighing, and all stock to be dry and free from any foreign matter when weighed. These cattle are to be from 84 head at Jewel Ranch."

The specific controversy between the parties is as to the 75 head of cows which were delivered to the defendant, there being no dispute as to the bulls delivered under the contract. It appears that the plaintiff is an attorney at law, and that at the time the cattle were selected (on the 24th day of June, 1919) he was engaged in the trial of a case in the superior court of Alameda county. Because of being so engaged, the plaintiff, by his request, was represented, at the time of the selecting by and delivery of the cattle to the defendant, by his brother, Robert A. Curtin. The testimony shows that on that occasion the representative of the defendant selected 65 cows from the 84 head of cows at $75 per head, and 10 of the cows of the 84 at $40 per head. The 9 head at any "agreed price" were not taken by defendant.

The plaintiff claims that the contract expressly and without qualification called for the payment of $75 per head for 75 head of cows, and testified that it was understood that the 75 head were to be picked by defendant from the 84 head of cows owned by plaintiff and inspected by defendant; that the agreement by his brother to accept $40 per head for 10 of that number of cows was contrary to the terms of the contract and wholly without authority from him.

The defendant, in his brief, expressly concedes that Robert A. Curtin was without authority to change or modify the terms of the contract, or enter into a new one respecting the sale or to agree to receive less for any of the cattle than the amount agreed upon in said contract, but declares that respondent is seeking to read into the contract "a provision that appellant was to pay $75 per head for a pick of 75 cows out of the 84 head in the pasture, and that the remaining 9 cows were to be paid 'at agreed price,'" and contends that such is not the contract, and that no such construction can be placed upon the contract. It adds, quoting from the brief:

> "When Mr. Mitchell (the agent and representative of the defendant in this transaction) and Robert A. Curtin (brother of plaintiff) agreed upon the price of $40 per head for the 10 head, this became as much a substantive part of the contract as the provision for the payment of $75 per head for the 75 cows."

[1] The contract in the main appears upon its face to be clear enough, and seems plainly to provide for the sale of 75 cows at $75 per head; yet the provision that "all stock for delivery are to be selected by a representative of the buyer," etc., throws some obscurity around it, and it is by reason thereof not certain whether the buyer was to select 75 head of cows at the price named, or to select such number at that price as the representative of the buyer might desire to accept. It was therefore proper for the court to receive, as it did, parol testimony, not, of course, for the purpose of varying or modifying the terms of the agreement, but to throw some light on what was meant by the language of the contract above quoted. The plaintiff testified that, at the time the written contract was executed, he exhibited to the representative of defendant, among other cattle, 84 head of cows; that it was then and there agreed between them that the defendant might purchase its pick of 75 cows out of the 84 head in the pasture, and that the price would be $75 per head for the 75 head of cows so picked or selected; that the defendant selected 75 head, which were delivered to its representative as agreed, but that, when he received the check for the balance assumed by defendant to be due on the purchase price of the entire lot of cattle sold, he found that the check was short of the amount actually due under the contract in the sum of $350.

The court below found the facts in accordance with the testimony of the plaintiff, and that testimony is, of course, sufficient to support the findings as to the transaction. The contention of the defendant that the agreement by Robert A. Curtin to accept $40, instead of $75, per head for 10 of the cows accepted by defendant, "became a substantive part of the contract," is obviously untenable. Not only so, but the contention is plainly inconsistent with the concession of counsel for the defendant, made in their brief, that Robert A. Curtin was without the authority as agent of his brother to change the contract, or to make any different or other arrangements regarding the sale of the cattle than those provided by the contract. Obviously, an agreement by an agent unauthorized by his principal, or having no implied or ostensible authority to make it, changing the terms of a contract previously made and entered into by the parties, cannot become a "substantive" or any part of the contract as it was originally made.

It is not disputed but that the defendant selected and accepted 75 head of cows. It is, indeed, directly so admitted by the defendant, and manifestly, if the representative of the latter concluded, when making the selection, that there were any of the 75 head so selected not of the value of $75 each, or for any reason did not measure up to the provisions of the contract as to the character or quality or condition of the cattle, he should either have refused for that reason to accept such cattle, or, desiring to take them, have negotiated any new agreement or arrangement which he might have thought justly should be made with the plaintiff himself, or some other person vested with authority by the plaintiff to change or modify the contract as it was originally made and subscribed to.

[2] Robert A. Curtin was not called as a witness by either side, and the only witness testifying for the defendant was Mills Mitchell, who represented the defendant in the transaction. It is true that Mitchell, in testifying, gave a different version of what was said and the understanding that was had by and between the parties immediately preceding the execution of the written agreement; but thus there was merely produced a conflict in the evidence which, having been resolved by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff, is binding upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

RANSOME-CRUMMEY CO. v. COULTER.

(Civ. 3406.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1099(3) — Determination on former appeal as to validity of lien law of case on subsequent appeal.

In action to foreclose street assessment lien under the Vrooman Act, determination on former appeal as to validity of lien notwithstanding city's acceptance of roadway with agreement to make repairs out of city's general fund instead of by assessment held the law of the case on subsequent appeal, where the findings on retrial were almost identical with those under review on the first appeal.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑487 — Successor of owner making discriminatory agreement with contractor cannot avoid assessment.

A charter provision making street contractor's agreement with owner liable to be assessed to accept less than the price specified in the contract with the city, a fraud on all persons assessed other than parties to such contract, held not available to the successor in interest of a party to such a contract to defeat assessment lien, since successor in interest merely stands in the shoes of his predecessor.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑444 — Preparation of resolution of intention by street contractor does not invalidate assessment.

That resolution of intention to order street work adopted by the mayor and city council was prepared by the street contractor and presented by the contractor to the city for passage held not to affect the validity of the assessment lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welsh, Judge.

Action by the Ransome-Crummey Company against William A. Coulter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. A. Coulter, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a street assessment lien. The lower court held that the assessment was a nullity, and that the plaintiff had no lien or right of action. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals after the denial of its motion for a new trial.

The proceedings were taken under the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147), incorporated in, and thereby made a part of, a former charter of the city of San Jose. They relate to regrading and paving the roadway of the crossing of Santa Clara and Twelfth streets in that city. Two trials have been had. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant on the first trial. On appeal the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the court's decisions. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Coulter, 177 Cal. 574, 171 Pac. 308; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, 177 Cal. 560, 171 Pac. 304. On the going down of the remittitur, the plaintiff filed an amendment to its complaint, and the defendant, Coulter, filed an amended answer consisting of denials and separate defenses. The lower court found the allegation of the complaint to be true, except the general averment of adverse claims on the part of certain defendants, which was found to be untrue. The regularity of the proceedings is not challenged, and the plaintiff is entitled to a reversal of the judgment, unless its right to a lien is destroyed by the effect of the court's finding on the separate defenses set up by the defendant.

The respondent claims that his property is exempt from the assessment by reason of a previous acceptance of the roadway by the city. He alleged, and the court found, that by an ordinance passed long before the present proceedings were initiated the city of San Jose had accepted the roadway of Santa Clara street, with an agreement on its part that thereafter it should be kept open and in repair by the city, the expense to be paid from the city's general fund. This ordinance, it appears, was declared valid by the superior court of Santa Clara county, in an action between other parties, in July, 1893. The same contention was directly passed upon and the point completely disposed of on the former appeal. The freeholders' charter of the city of San Jose, in force at the time of these proceedings, adopts, and makes part of itself, when not inconsistent with its express provisions, the general street law, commonly known as the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1885, p. 147), as the said law was at the time of the adoption of the charter, and as such law should be thereafter amended. It was pointed out on the former appeal that section 20 of the Vrooman Act was the only legal basis for such an acceptance as claimed by respondent. As that section had been repealed on April 5, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 635), and there was not, when the proceeding for the street work here involved was subsequently commenced, any such provision, either in the Vrooman Act or the freeholders' charter of the city of San Jose, the court held that the facts embraced in the former findings as to the acceptance of the street by the city constituted no defense to plaintiff's action. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Coulter, supra, 177 Cal. 575, 171 Pac. 308; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, supra, 177 Cal. 566–568, 171 Pac. 304.

[1] The findings on this point made on the retrial of the case are almost, if not quite, identical with those under review on the first appeal, and we regard the question as settled by the former decision, with the possible exception that it is now made to more clearly appear that the ordinance of acceptance has never been amended or repealed and is (at the time of the trial) in full force and effect. Respondent urges that this last-noted fact constitutes an important and material addition to the findings which he claims was not considered by the Supreme Court on the former appeal. His argument is, in brief (although the findings do not show the facts), that the freeholders' charter of the city of San Jose, adopted in 1897, by apt provision, continued the ordinance of acceptance in force, and it, not having been repealed, constituted a contractual relation between the city and the property owners along Santa Clara street which could not be interfered with by the repeal of section 20 of the Vrooman Act. We think respondent is incorrect in his estimate of the weight of the decision on the former appeal, and what was there considered. The Supreme Court said:

> "We shall assume that the facts were such as to authorize the enactment of this ordinance under this section, and that it was a valid enactment precluding further repair and improvement of the roadway at the expense of the property fronting thereon for so long as it remained effective. * * * 'Appellant contends that the repeal [of section 20 of the Vrooman Act] struck dead the ordinance of acceptance.'"

The court, after giving fully its reasons, then held "that the legislative repeal of section 20 of the Vrooman Act operated to repeal the power conferred upon the city of San Jose in the matter under consideration," and that the effect of that repeal was to revoke the privilege of exemption theretofore enjoyed by the property owners along Santa Clara street. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, supra.

A provision of the charter of the city of San Jose requires the contractor for street work, before any assessment can be made, to file an affidavit to the effect that he has not entered into any private agreement with any person liable to be assessed for such street work to accept less than the price named in the contract, nor to make a rebate or reduction to him from such price. Any such agreement, the charter provides, shall be deemed a fraud upon all persons liable to be assessed, other than property owners who were parties to the contract, and operates to void as to such persons so defrauded any assessments made for the work done under the contract. Such an affidavit was filed in this proceeding. Respondent contends that its statements do not conform to the facts, and that by reason of an agreement entered into by the plaintiff, and respondent's predecessor in ownership of the lot, and to which compact respondent was not a party, he (respondent) was defrauded, and that the property is not now liable for the assessment.

In this connection the trial court found that a private agreement was entered into June 21, 1909, by the plaintiff with the owners of lots fronting on Santa Clara street (to which contract the defendant, Coulter, was not a party, but to which his predecessor in interest, Walter, was) for the paving and improvement of that street, including the crossing of Santa Clara and Twelfth streets. The agreed prices for doing this work were 16 cents per square foot for asphalt paving, including grading, $35 each for catch-basins, and 65 cents and 75 cents for specified pipe drains. So much was considered on the former appeal, and it was held that the lower court's finding made it clear that such private contract had no reference to any contemplated street improvements by the city, and did not constitute a defense to plaintiff's claim. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Coulter, supra. On this appeal, however, additional facts are presented, the effect of which, respondent contends, is to bring the lien now sought to be foreclosed within the ban of the charter provisions.

The court now finds that work under this private agreement of June 21, 1909, was commenced by the plaintiff and carried on until the roadway of Santa Clara street was improved as far as the intersection of that thoroughfare with Twelfth street. Plaintiff then presented a bill to Walter, then in possession of the lot now owned by defendant, which is adjacent to the crossing named, for the amount due under the private agreement for the frontage work on Santa Clara street. Walter demurred to the bill, claiming that under the agreement the intersecting crossing of Santa Clara street and Twelfth street should have been improved by plaintiff before the work could be considered completed. By way of settlement Walter paid to plaintiff the sum of $232.24, and took in return the following agreement:

> "Received of Dr. C. H. Walter $232.24, said sum being in full payment for paving and constructing concrete gutters on Santa Clara St. on frontage of 63.98 ft., beginning at the southeast corner of Twelfth and Santa Clara Sts. and running easterly said distance of 63.98 ft., said sum being in full payment for 1311.98 sq. ft. of asphalt paving including grading at 16c per sq. ft. and 160 sq. ft. of concrete gutter at 14c per sq. ft., and said sum being paid pursuant to the agreement made and entered into on the 21st day of June, 1909, between ourselves and certain property owners on E. Santa Clara St. In consideration of having received said sum of $232.24 on this date, we hereby agree that, should you be required to pay said sum or any other sum to any other person or corporation for said work, to protect you against, and to assume, any assessment that should be levied for said work against your property.
> "Nothing herein contained shall in any wise release us from our liability under said contract of June 21, 1909, to do such work as may be required to be done on the crossing and intersection of Twelfth and Santa Clara Sts. and for which said work you agree to pay for asphalt paving at the rate of 16c per sq. ft. according to the portion for which you are liable according to the street law.

"Ransome-Crummey Company,
"By Henry W. Whipple."

Some 15 months after the giving of this receipt by plaintiff to Walter the public proceedings for the improvement of the Twelfth street crossing on Santa Clara street were initiated by a resolution of intention adopted by the city council October 9, 1911. The plaintiff entered into the public contract for doing the work, under which the present lien arose, February 28, 1912, at a price of 25 cents per square foot for constructing asphalt pavement, including concrete foundation, and regarding, $75 each for catch-basins, and $1 per foot for pipe drains. These prices are in excess of those named in the private contract entered into with all the property owners for the improvement and the price for the crossing work named in the receipt of July 30, 1910.

While the agreement entered into by plaintiff and Walter in July, 1910, appears to be but little more than a receipt for money paid for work already done under the private contract with all the property owners along Santa Clara street, and a reaffirmance of that agreement by the plaintiff so far as it related to the further work demanded by Walter, the trial court found that it "was made and entered into by plaintiff with full knowledge on its part of an intention to apply for, and improve said Twelfth street crossing under a public contract with the city."

[2] On these facts the respondent argues that he was a party defrauded by the transaction, and that the assessment against the lot he now owns is void. We seriously doubt if the additional matter now presented for consideration is sufficient to remove the private contract of June, 1909, and the settlement thereunder arrived at by plaintiff and Walter, from the holding on the former appeal. The trial court was of the opinion that it did, and the respondent so argues. Whether it did or did not seems to us immaterial, for the respondent is not "one of the persons liable to be assessed for such work" who is protected from fraud by the charter inhibition against private contracts between the street contractor, and some of the other property owners. He stands in the shoes of his predecessor, Walter, who was a party to the alleged unlawful agreement, and who is accorded no protection by the charter provision. Respondent asserts that, as the successor of Walter, who made the private agreement with plaintiff, he is by virtue of his assignment of Walter's contract to purchase the lot, and his assignment of Walter's contract with the plaintiff, entitled to all defenses Walter might have in the premises against plaintiff's claim. But Walter was directly excepted from the beneficent provision of, and was given no right of defense by, the charter provision. Neither is the respondent.

Respondent asserted as another defense to plaintiff's claim and the court found that he saw and read the agreement between plaintiff and the lot owners on Santa Clara street, and the subsequent agreement with Dr. Walter, and knew that a permit had been issued by the city to plaintiff to do the street work referred to in the former contract, and that, being deceived by the guaranty of plaintiff, he was deceived and induced into purchasing the lot "to his damage and loss from the expenses imposed in litigation, loss of time," etc. What his losses were does not appear but that is immaterial here, for the facts embraced in the findings do not avail as a defense in this action.

[3] The fact that the resolution of intention to order the street work adopted by the mayor and city council was prepared by the plaintiff, and presented by it to the city for passage requires but little notice. There is nothing in the record to indicate that such action was the result of corruption or fraud. Of like import is the contention of respondent that the plaintiff was guilty of constructive fraud, in that it entered into a private agreement to do the work upon certain terms, and then induced the city to award it a contract to do the work at greatly increased prices. He insists, therefore, that plaintiff is estopped from enforcing its alleged lien upon the lot. This contention has no support in the findings.

On the record brought here, and under the law of the case so well established on the former appeal (Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Coulter, supra; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, supra), the lower court should have found for the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court, with the direction that it enter judgment upon the findings in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

SACRAMENTO SUBURBAN FRUIT LANDS CO. v. WHALEY et al. (Civ. 2194.)

1. Covenants 🔑61—"Direct benefit of property" as used in statute relating to covenants running with land defined.

The words "direct benefit of the property," as used in Civ. Code, § 1462, providing that covenants made for the direct benefit of the property run with the land, means any covenant which affects the title to real property or any interest or estate therein of the covenantee, and such covenant, is one which is intended to restore to the covenantee or the owner of the land some right with respect thereto which he has parted with pro re nata or for a special purpose; in other words, a covenant for the direct benefit of the estate or interest of the covenantee in the land mortgaged.

2. Mortgages 🔑310—Covenant for removal of lien from certain portion of property is for "direct benefit of the property" under statute.

While under the statutory law of the state a mortgage does not vest in the mortgagee an estate or interest in the mortgaged land, yet the mortgage affects the mortgagor's title, and a covenant in a mortgage providing for the removal of the lien of the mortgage from certain specified portions of the land mortgaged is a covenant for the unfettering pro tanto of the title, and is therefore a covenant for the "direct benefit of the property," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1462, providing that such covenants run with the land, in view of section 1463.

3. Mortgages 🔑310—Covenant of release pro tanto held not too indefinite for enforcement.

Provision in mortgage, "Said mortgagee shall release any 10-acre lot or more from the lien of this mortgage upon the payment by the said mortgagor to the mortgagee of $125 per acre for each acre so released," was not unenforceable because of indefiniteness and uncertainty as to the particular 10-acre lot upon which the release was to operate; it being evidently the intention of the parties that the mortgagor was at liberty to select any particular 10-acre tract or more that he desired to select.

4. Mortgages 🔑310—Right of mortgagor to release pro tanto inured to subsequent mortgagee.

If mortgagor had right to have fractions of land released upon payment to mortgagee of a specified amount per acre, such right inured to his grantee under a subsequent trust deed.

5. Mortgages 🔑310—Right to partial release available after default in payment.

Under a mortgage providing that 10 acres or more would be released from the lien of the mortgage on payment of a specified amount per acre to the mortgagee, the mortgagor could exercise his right even after default in payment of mortgage and commencement of a foreclosure suit, where the release clause contained no provision specifying a particular time at which such right might be exercised.

6. Mortgages 🔑310—Offer to pay whatever sum was due held sufficient tender under partial release clause.

Under a clause in a mortgage providing for a release of any 10-acre lot or more upon payment of $125 per acre for the lot selected by mortgagor, an offer to pay $125 per acre. "together with such further sums as said * * * company may have expended for taxes, or other charges against said property," was a sufficient tender by reason of the fact that the total sum of the taxes paid by the mortgagee on the lots and interest was presumably known to the mortgagee, but probably not known to the mortgagor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Company against Martha M. Whaley and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. S. Butler and B. F. Van Dyke, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

William M. Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HART, J. The defendants Martha A. Whaley and A. O. Whaley (whose middle initial is printed in the transcript both "G." and "C." by mistake), husband and wife, executed on February 19, 1914, a mortgage to appellant upon seven lots in Rio Linda subdivision No. 2, a portion of the Rancho Del Paso in Sacramento county, Cal., to secure the payment of a note for $6,748 due on or before February 19, 1919, with interest at 6 per cent. per year, payable yearly. Said mortgage contained the following provision:

> "Said mortgagee shall release any ten-acre lot or more from the lien of this mortgage upon the payment by the said mortgagors to the mortgagee of one hundred and twenty-five ($125.00) per acre for each acre so to be released."

Said covenant, it will be noticed, did not run to heirs and assigns.

The seven lots so mortgaged ranged in area from 5.689 acres to 13.309 acres, and the total area was 59.889 acres. Subsequent to the execution and delivery of said mortgage the said mortgagors executed and delivered a trust deed to J. R. Hicks, a trustee for Los Angeles Finance Company, and said Whaley and husband, covering the land described in said mortgage, which trust deed recited that it was made to secure a note for $1,000 and was subject to said mortgage for $6,748. Thereafter said note and trust deed were assigned to cross-complainant, First National Bank of Orange county, Cal. Defendants failed to pay interest or taxes after February 19, 1917, and in March, 1918, plaintiff announced its intention to consider the whole sum of principal and interest due, and so notified the mortgagors and J. R. Hicks, trustee, and defendant First National Bank of Orange. Thereafter, said interest, taxes, and principal being due, unpaid, and in default, on May 24, 1918, defendant J. R. Hicks, as trustee, and defendant First National Bank of Orange, tendered to plaintiff the sum of $4,375, being a sum in excess of $125 per acre for the acreage contained in said five lots, to wit. lots 97, 98, 99, 100, and 101 (amounting to 34.86 acres), but not sufficient to cover the delinquent taxes on these lots paid by the plaintiff for the mortgagors, and leaving out of consideration the interest then due on said mortgage note.

The answer and the cross-complaint of defendant First National Bank of Orange county and defendant R. J. Hicks, trustee, contain the following allegation, which is undenied by the plaintiff in its answer to said cross-complaint:

> "That on or about the 24th day of May, 1918, these cross-complainants duly tendered to the said Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Company the sum of $4,375, together with such further sum as said Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Company had expended in taxes or other expenses for the lands next hereinafter described, and requested said company to release from the lien of said mortgage the lands described in said mortgage as lots numbered 97, 98, 99, 100, and 101 of Rio Linda subdivision No. 2, that said lots contain 34.86 acres, but that said company refused to release said property from the lien of said mortgage."

Paragraph XII renews the above offer.

The court made its interlocutory decree, which also embraced findings harmonizing with the allegations of the cross-complaint of defendant First National Bank of Orange, etc., and R. J. Hicks, as trustee, etc., as to the execution and delivery of the promissory note and the trust deed to secure said note above referred to, and the offer of the cross-complainants—

> "to pay plaintiff the sum of $125 per acre for the release from the lien of plaintiff's said mortgage of said lots Nos. 97, 98, 99, 100, and 101 aforesaid, containing in the aggregate 34.86 acres of land, together with all sums previously paid by the said plaintiff for taxes on said lots since the 19th day of January, 1916, the same being the date of said note and deed of trust, as aforesaid (which said taxes so paid to this date the court now finds amount to the sum of $134.93), with interest on said payments from the date of the payment thereof to the date of repayment at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; * * * that at the time the said offer was made by defendants as aforesaid, the said mortgagors, to wit, the defendants Martha M. Whaley, A. C. Whaley, John L. Whaley, Theophile Giraud, and Los Angeles Finance Company, a corporation, were in default to the said plaintiff in the performance of the terms of said promissory note and mortgage, and that said plaintiff had prior to said time elected to treat all sums of principal and interest under said promissory note as due and payable, and that notice of such election and also notice of such default had prior to the making of said offer been served by said plaintiff on the said defendants, and also upon First National Bank of Orange, Cal., a corporation, and upon R. J. Hicks, trustee, as aforesaid; that no sale of the property secured by said deed of trust under the power contained in said deed of trust given has ever been had, and that, subject to plaintiff's mortgage and to said deed of trust and the power of sale therein contained, the defendant John L. Whaley is now, and at all times herein mentioned has been, the owner of said property described in plaintiff's mortgage."

The operative terms of the decree are as follows:

> "Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that if the defendants First National Bank of Orange, Cal., a corporation, and R. J. Hicks, trustee as aforesaid, shall, within ten days from the date of service of notice of the entry of this order upon them or upon their said attorney, pay into the court for the use of plaintiff the sum of $4,357.50, together with the sum of $134.93 taxes paid by plaintiff on said land prior to this date with interest thereon as aforesaid, then they shall be entitled to final judgment that said lots Nos. 97, 98, 99, 100, and 101 are released from the lien of said mortgage, and that as to said lots no sale shall be made under the foreclosure of said mortgage. The plaintiff shall, in that event, be entitled to final judgment foreclosing said mortgage as to the remainder of the property described in said mortgage and in plaintiff's complaint, and hereinabove described, and directing sale thereof in the manner provided by law. If said sum be not so paid within the time limited as above, then plaintiff shall be entitled to final judgment foreclosing said mortgage as to all of said property in said mortgage described and hereinabove described, and adjudging that a sale be made thereof in the manner provided by law, and further adjudging that defendants and cross-complainants First National Bank of Orange, Cal., a corporation, and R. J. Hicks, trustee as aforesaid, take nothing by reason of their answer and cross-complaint herein, and that they be forever restrained and enjoined from asserting any right, title, claim, or interest of, in, or to said property or any part thereof."

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the said interlocutory decree.

In support of his appeal the plaintiff contends: (1) That the covenant to release from the lien of the mortgage any 10-acre lot or more of the tract upon which the mortgage lien exists upon payments made by the mortgagor as provided in said covenant does not inure to the benefit of subsequent incumbrancers; (2) that the release clause of the mortgage is indefinite and uncertain as to the particular 10-acre lot from which the mortgage burden may be removed upon the compliance by the mortgagor with the condition therein specified, inasmuch as the interlocutory decree shows "that there was no 10-acre lot in the mortgaged tract"; (3) that, conceding that said release clause is under any circumstances enforceable as in favor of a subsequent incumbrancer, the defendant in this case is not entitled to its enforcement in his behalf for the reason that "the mortgagor was in default for interest and taxes," and the mortgagee had, for such default, and previously to the demand by the defendant for the release of 10 acres of the mortgaged tract, with an offer to pay for the same, including taxes and interest, as required by the release clause, declared the whole amount of principal, interest and taxes due and payable.

The first proposition to which attention is invited involves the question whether the release clause of the mortgage may be taken advantage of by a subsequent incumbrancer, and this question must find its solution in the determination of the further question whether said release clause involves a covenant running with the land subject to the lien of the mortgage or is a mere personal privilege running alone to the benefit of the mortgagor.

[1, 2] Covenants running with the land are those only that are specified in title 3, third division, of the Civil Code (Civ. Code, § 1461), and section 1462 describes generally such covenants as follows:

> "Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property, which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land."

Section 1463, Id., provides:

Unless, however, the covenant comes clearly within the description of those specifically mentioned in section 1463, the general test determinative of the question whether a certain covenant runs with the land would seem to be whether it is for the direct benefit of the land. And this naturally opens up an inquiry as to the scope or meaning of the phrase "for the direct benefit of the land."

We do not understand that that phrase or expression, as it is used in section 1462, was intended to be or is restricted in its meaning to such physical benefit only as may directly accrue to the land from the covenant, but that it means also any covenant which affects the title to real property or any interest or estate therein of the covenantee. A covenant made for the direct benefit of the land is one which is intended to restore to the covenantee or the owner of the land some right with respect thereto which he has parted with pro re nata or for a special purpose. It is, in other words, a covenant for the direct benefit of the estate or interest of the covenantee in the land mortgaged. Standard Oil Co. v. Slye, 164 Cal. 435, 442, 129 Pac. 589. While under the statutory law of this state a mortgage does not vest in the mortgagee an estate or interest in the mortgaged land, yet the mortgage affects the mortgagor's title. A covenant in a mortgage providing for the removal of the lien of the mortgage from certain specified portions of the land mortgaged is a covenant for the unfettering pro tanto of the title, and is therefore for the direct benefit of the land.

Section 1463 of the Civil Code lends support to the foregoing views, for, as will be observed, it is by said section declared that the "last section (1462) includes covenants of warranty, for quiet enjoyment," etc. In other words, the Legislature has itself, by section 1463, interpreted or given us the meaning, to an extent, of the phrase, as used in section 1462, "direct benefit of the property," and it seems to be clear from said section 1463 that, if the covenant is one which concerns the land itself, or in any manner or measure affects its title or any interest therein, then it is, within the meaning of that phrase as it is employed in section 1462, "made for the direct benefit of the real property" to which it relates.

Mr. Washburn, in his work on Real Property (volume 2, § 1205), states the rule as follows:

> "Such covenants, and such only, run with the land as concern the land itself, in whosesoever hands it may be, and become united with, and form a part of, the consideration for which the land, or some interest in it, is parted with, between the covenantor and covenantee."

In Coburn v. Goodall, 72 Cal. 498, 14 Pac. 190, 1 Am. St. Rep. 75, the action was to recover damages for the breach of a covenant in a lease, whereby the lessee covenanted to surrender the demised premises, with the improvements thereon, at the expiration of the term. The Supreme Court held said covenant to be one running with the demised land, and said:

> "It is claimed that these four defendants, if liable at all under the covenant to surrender (which is denied), are liable only in respect of their privity of estate, and that such liability is several and proportionate to the interest acquired by each of them. To this proposition we cannot assent. There are some authorities to that effect, but the weight of opinion, we believe, is contrary thereto, and with better reason it is held that, while assignees of a lease hold as tenants in common, they are jointly and severally liable on covenants to repair and to deliver up at the end of the term. These covenants, which are connected with the estate, run with the land, and vest in point of benefit and liability in the assignee, while the personal privity of contract between the lessor and lessee remains unaffected by the transfer. 1 Washburn on Real Property, 435, 329; 2 Platt on Leases, 351; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (7th Ed.) § 530, note; Hayes v. Morrison, 38 N. H. 95; Fitch v. Johnson, 104 Ill. 117."

In the present case the covenant, as we have seen, provides for a release from the mortgage lien of any 10-acre lot or more for which the sum of $125 per acre, together with interest and taxes, has been paid. This in effect is a provision that any 10-acre lot of the tract under mortgage as to which the payment terms of the covenant were complied with would be surrendered to the mortgagor free from the mortgage lien; in other words, to restore to the mortgagor an unqualified dominion over the property which he would not enjoy with the title to the fee incumbered by a lien to secure a debt. And manifestly it constituted a part of the consideration for which the mortgagor or covenantee surrendered such dominion by the execution of the mortgage on the land.

While the precise question here has never been, so far as we are informed upon the subject, passed upon by the appellate courts of this state, there is direct authority for the conclusion that such a covenant as we are now considering runs with the land.

Mr. Jones, in his work on Mortgages (volume 1, § 79), says that—

> "Whether such a covenant [for the partial release of lots embraced in the mortgage upon the payment of a stipulated sum] running only to the mortgagors, without mention of his assigns, is personal in character, and cannot be enforced by a purchaser from him, is a question upon which the authorities are not agreed, but the better view is that such a covenant runs with the land."

In Vawter v. Crafts, 41 Minn. 14, 42 N. W. 483, the mortgage contained a covenant for partial releases of the mortgage lien upon platted lots of the mortgaged land upon the payment by the mortgagor of certain stipulated sums of money, equal to the value of the lots. This covenant did not run to the assigns of the mortgagor. Foreclosure proceedings against the entire tract were brought by the mortgagee after the mortgagor had sold some of the lots. The mortgagee having refused to accept the price of the lots so sold, together with interest and cost of foreclosure, tendered to him by the grantee of the mortgagor, action was brought by said grantee against the mortgagee to compel a release; the former offering to pay the amount due on the lots. The principal question there was as to the nature of the covenant for partial release, and, in holding that said covenant was one running with the land, the court said so much that has cogent application to the present case that we feel justified in quoting from the opinion in extenso as follows:

> "Defendant's first contention is that this covenant as to releases is a purely personal one with the mortgagors, and did not pass with the land to their grantees. Much abstruse and technical learning has been wasted in discussing the question what are and what are not covenants running with the land. But we think it will be found, by considering the principle underlying the subject, that, according to the best-considered modern authorities, the law corresponds with common sense, and annexes a covenant to the land when the subject of it has something to be done or refrained from, about or touching, concerning or effecting, the covenantee's land (though not upon it), which would benefit the same, or increase its value in the hands of the holder. Shaber v. Water Co., 30 Minn. 179, 14 N. W. 874. It is not necessary here to enter into a consideration of the distinction in certain respects that may exist between a transfer of the burden of a covenant running with the land and of the benefit of the covenant; in other words, of the liability to fulfill the covenant, and of the right to exact its performance. The rule, we think, is universal that the benefit passes with the land to which it is incident. In the case at bar the agreement or covenant is one relating to the rights of the parties in the land. It affects the title, and hence affects the value of the estate of the holder. The release is for the benefit of the owner; in fact, no one but the owner could be benefited by it. It would be against reason if it did not inure to the grantee of the covenantee. This provision was manifestly inserted in the mortgage with reference to the sale of these lots, when platted, to different parties, and to facilitate such sales. These sales could be made in two ways: First, by the mortgagors paying the sum or sums stipulated, and obtaining a release, and then conveying clear title to the purchaser; or, second, selling subject to the mortgage, and leaving it to the purchaser to pay and obtain the release. It is argued, from the fact that the covenant does not contain the words 'or assigns,' it was intended as a personal one with the mortgagors. We do not think that fact is entitled to any weight. The question must be determined from the nature and subject-matter of the covenant itself."

See also, Gammell v. Goode, 103 Iowa, 301, 72 N. W. 531.

[3] 2. There is no legal force to the contention that the release cannot be enforced because it is indefinite and uncertain as to the particular 10-acre lot upon which the release was to operate. This contention would be as tenable against the mortgagor as it would be as against his assignee or grantee, and, as it would not be maintainable as against the former, it certainly cannot be as against the trustee under the trust deed who stands in the shoes of the mortgagor with respect to any rights created by the release clause.

[4] The appeal here is supported alone by the judgment roll, and, if there was evidence received extrinsic to the mortgage itself, disclosing a particular purpose for the insertion in the mortgage of the covenant of release, it is not here. But it is to be remarked that such covenants in mortgages covering tracts of land are not uncommon, and very often, if not generally, are in furtherance of a scheme whereby the mortgagor has purchased a tract of land for the purpose of subdividing it into smaller lots and selling the subdivisions, has borrowed money to pay the purchase price of the whole tract, and mortgaged the land to secure the debt so incurred, or perhaps has purchased the land from the mortgagee and given the latter a mortgage on the same to secure the purchase price, and for the purpose of enabling the mortgagor to sell the subdivisions and give to his grantee a title free from the mortgage lien a release clause such as the one here is inserted in the mortgage. But, whether or not this was in fact the scheme involved in the transaction resulting in the execution of the mortgage in this case, the fact remains that it was the evident intention of the parties that, under the release clause, the mortgagor was at liberty to select any particular 10-acre tract or more that he desired to select, pay the stipulated amount per acre therefor to the mortgagee, and thereupon be entitled to receive a release of the mortgage lien from the lot thus selected. And, as above suggested, if this was his right under the release clause, so it was his grantee's right, since, as we have held, the said clause inured to the benefit of the latter.

The cases of McComber v. Mills, 80 Cal. 111, 22 Pac. 55, and Ontario Land Co. v. Bedford, 90 Cal. 181, 27 Pac. 39, dealt with mortgages containing release clauses substantially like the one in this case, and, while no point was made therein of the indefiniteness of the clause by reason of the fact that no specifically designated or described lot was therein referred to, it was nevertheless held that the release clauses were sufficient and binding on the mortgagee. See, also, Gammell v. Goode, 103 Iowa, 301, 72 N. W. 531, supra. But in Lane v. Allen, 162 Ill. 426, 44 N. E. 831, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that, under a release clause in a mortgage to the effect that the mortgaged premises might be subdivided and that "on payment of $500 or more, at any time or times, on the indebtedness secured hereby, a part or parts of said premises shall be released" from the lien of the mortgage, the contention that the subdivision must precede the payments, in order to entitle the party paying to a partial release, was not in harmony with a rational construction of the release clause. See, also, Clark v. Fountain, 135 Mass. 464. The larger number of the cases relied upon by the appellant to sustain its position as to the nonenforceability of the clause in question because it does not contain a specific or some sufficient description of the 10-acre lot or more for which a release might be had upon payment therefor have to do with actions involving conveyances of property which did not contain such a description of the real property sought to be conveyed as to facilitate a ready identification of the property from the deeds themselves, and the instruments of conveyance were held void because of patent ambiguities in the descriptions. Two of those actions were in ejectment, and one to reform a mortgage by correcting the description of the land. But in McCormick v. Parsons, 195 Mo. 91, 92 S. W. 1162, cited here by appellant, it was held that (quoting from the syllabi)—

> "When a deed of trust contains a provision that for every $600 paid one acre of the tract conveyed shall be released from the lien of the * * * trust, the provision is void for indefiniteness of description of the part to be released."

It was further held that—

> Such a release provision in a trust deed "cannot be aided by the demand of the parties giving the deed that a certain part of the tract which they definitely described be released on account of the payments made by them."

The above case is the nearest approach to the appellant's position here of any other to which our attention has been called. The conclusion reached therein is expressly based upon the rule applicable to cases of conveyances of real property heretofore referred to. There is, however, a distinction which, we think, is substantial or does not involve a mere refinement in logic between the release clause in McCormick v. Parsons and the release clause in this case. It will be noted that in the former case the clause reads "for every $600 paid one acre of the tract conveyed shall be released," etc., whereas, the clause in this case is that the release shall be upon "any 10-acre lot or more * * * upon the payment," etc. In other words, while in McCormick v. Parsons the mortgage provides for the release upon some one acre of the tract, in the present case the provision is for the release of any 10-acre lot or more, which, as that language clearly implies, may be selected by the mortgagor himself, and that such was the intention of the parties is plainly evidenced by the fact that there is no provision in the release clause or anywhere in the mortgage for the platting or subdivision of the tract into lots of any size or dimensions.

Moreover, it seems to us (and this suggestion is with the utmost deference to the court deciding the case) that if, in McCormick v. Parsons it was made to appear that the grantee of the trustee had actually paid the required amount for one acre of the tract, the court, exercising its extraordinary equity powers, could well have so framed its decree as to have prevented so unjust and inequitable a result as the court seems to have been compelled to arrive at in that case. But, however that may be, we still think the distinction between the two cases pointed out above is sufficient to deprive the McCormick-Parsons Case of its force as an authority in support of the position of the appellant here.

[5] 3. No California cases are cited upon the point involving the question whether the right to an enforcement of the release clause still subsisted after default in the payment of interest and taxes and after the mortgage holder had declared the whole amount of principal, interest, and taxes due and payable because of such default. The following cases from other jurisdictions, however, hold that the right to a partial release, by the payment of the stipulated sum, is available after default in payment and the commencement of a foreclosure suit: Vawter v. Crafts, 41 Minn. 14, 42 N. W. 483, supra; Gammell v. Goode, 103 Iowa, 301, 72 N. W. 531, supra; Nims v. Vaughn, 40 Mich. 356; Chrisman v. Hay (C. C.) 43 Fed. 552.

In Gammell v. Goode, it is said:

> "It is thought that the right is not available after default in payment and the commencement of suit to foreclose. There is no such limitation in the covenant. The right seems coextensive with the existence of the mortgage. We do not see how the doctrine of laches can affect this right of release, under the terms of the stipulation. The only laches claimed is the default in payment. When E. J. Goode purchased the lot in question, he had the right to understand that, upon the payment of so much, he would be entitled to a release. The stipulation in the mortgage does not say upon payment of so much in a particular time, or without default, but on payment of so much 'at any one time.'"

It will be observed that the release clause with which we are directly concerned contains no provision specifying a particular time at which payments may be made.

[6] 4. Another point made by the appellant (not included in the points as they are above stated) is that the defendant failed to tender the amount due on the lot. We think the tender was sufficient. The cross-complaint alleges, as we have shown, and the court found, that the cross-complainant (defendants in plaintiff's action) on or about the 24th day of May "tendered to the said Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Company the sum of $4,375, together with such further sum as said * * * company had expended in taxes or other expenses for the lands," and further alleges that "these defendants now renew said offer to said * * * company in gold coin of the United States the sum of $125 per acre for every acre contained in the lots described in * * * this cross-complaint, together with such further sums as said * * * company may have expended for taxes or other charges against said property."

What the total sum of the taxes paid by the plaintiff on the lots and the interest was was presumably known to the plaintiff, but probably not known to the defendants, and in that case the offer to pay whatever that sum was, with the offer to pay the exact amount due upon the principal, constituted, under the circumstances, a sufficient tender.

The decree appealed from appears to provide for an equitable adjustment of the controversy between these parties. The plaintiff will receive precisely what its contract calls for and what it agreed to take for the lots, and there is nothing to indicate that in the selection of the particular lots involved herein that plaintiff will suffer any loss or disadvantage. To the contrary, the release clause itself clearly indicates that it was a matter of indifference to the plaintiff what particular portions of the tract might be selected upon payment therefor, so long as the lots were 10 or more acres in size.

The decree is affirmed.

ROSS v. SAN DIEGO GLAZED CEMENT PIPE CO. (Civ. 3154.)

1. Judgment 🔑137 — Court may on terms relieve party from default.

As provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 473, a court may on such terms as may be just relieve a party or his legal representatives from a judgment order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; the application being made in the time and in the manner provided.

2. Judgment 🔑155 — Notice of motion to open default should state the grounds.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, a notice of motion to open a default judgment should state the grounds on which it will be made.

3. Judgment 🔑158—To open default affidavit of merits necessary.

An affidavit of merits is essential to a motion to open a default judgment.

4. Judgment 🔑160 — Affidavit that defendant stated his defense to counsel insufficient.

On motion to open a default judgment, an affidavit of merits stating that defendant has fully and fairly stated his defense to his attorney is insufficient as it is the case, and not the defense, that must be disclosed.

5. Judgment 🔑160 — Affidavit that defendant stated to attorney facts on which cross-complaint is based insufficient.

On motion to open a default judgment given to a defendant on a cross-complaint, an affidavit of merits showing that cross-defendant fully and fairly stated the facts on which the cross-complaint herein is based to her attorney, and she was advised that she had a good defense to the cause of action alleged in the cross-complaint is insufficient.

6. Judgment 🔑151 — Inadvertence in the abstract no cause for opening a default.

Inadvertence in the abstract is no plea upon which to set aside a default, as the court must be made acquainted with the reasons for the inadvertence.

7. Judgment ⚷143(12) — Negligence of attorney in failing to answer cross-complaint not ground for opening default.

The negligence of attorney for plaintiff who after receiving cross-complaint made no notation with stenographer as to answering it and failed to pay any further attention to it, and default judgment was thereafter taken on the cross-complaint on the day that attorney died, there is no ground for opening the default; there being no showing of any previous disability of the attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Trix Ninde Ross against the San Diego Glazed Cement Pipe Company. From an order setting aside a judgment on the cross-complaint and setting aside plaintiff's default, defendant appeals. Order reversed.

John H. McCorkle, of San Diego, for appellant.

C. O. Whittemore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant and cross-complainant from an order setting aside the judgment rendered on the cross-complaint and setting aside the default of the plaintiff and cross-defendant for failure to answer the cross-complaint of defendant, and allowing plaintiff and cross-defendant to file an answer to the cross-complaint.

[1-3] As provided in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, a court may, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; the application therefor being made within the time and in the manner provided. The notice of such a motion or application should state the grounds upon which it will be made. Code Civ. Proc. § 1010. An affidavit of merits is essential to such a motion for relief from a judgment. Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 342, 345, 139 Pac. 805. In this case the record shows that the notice of motion did not purport to state the grounds upon which the application would be made, but merely stated that it would be based upon two certain affidavits, which were served with the notice, and upon the records and files in the action.

[4, 5] An affidavit of merits must show that the defendant has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to his counsel, before the advice of counsel can amount to a prima facie showing of merits on behalf of the defendant. For a defendant to say that he has fully and fairly stated the facts of his defense to his attorney is not a compliance with the rule requiring that he shall state the facts of the case. Morgan v. McDonald, 70 Cal. 32, 11 Pac. 350; Andrews v. Jacoby, 39 Cal. App. 382, 178 Pac. 969. The affidavits of respondent and of her counsel, C. O. Whittemore, do not purport to state that respondent stated all of the facts of the case to said attorney. They only say that "she has fully and fairly stated all of the facts upon which the cross-complaint herein is based" to her attorney, and was by him advised that she had a good defense to the cause of action alleged in the cross-complaint. As affidavits of merits, these are no better than those which were held to be insufficient in the cases above cited.

[6, 7] The facts leading up to the entry of the judgment upon the cross-complaint appear without dispute, and are as follows: On December 10, 1918, a cross-complaint was duly served on the plaintiff by delivery to her then attorney of record, J. R. Whittemore, who on the following day by letter to appellant's attorney acknowledged receipt of copy of the cross-complaint. On receiving the cross-complaint J. R. Whittemore instructed his stenographer to place the same in the office files in the action, but gave no instructions whatever regarding the necessity of having to prepare an answer to the cross-complaint or of noting the date when such answer should be filed. No further action regarding the case was ever taken by said J. R. Whittemore. There is no evidence that any negotiation was had or application of any kind made for an extension of time to answer. On the 21st day of August, 1919, the default of plaintiff for failure to answer the cross-complaint was entered. Four days later a pro forma hearing was had before the court, and upon the evidence thus received judgment for the relief demanded by the cross-complaint was duly entered. J. R. Whittemore died on August 25, 1919, the day on which said judgment was entered. There is, however, nothing in the record showing that he was suffering from illness or otherwise unable to attend to his professional affairs prior to the day of his death. The application for the order setting aside the judgment and default is totally wanting in any showing of reasons or causes or excuses for the inadvertence or negligence of the attorney in failing to file an answer to said cross-complaint.

> "Inadvertence in the abstract is no plea upon which to set aside a default. The court must be made acquainted with the reasons for the inadvertence; and, if satisfactory, will act upon them and relieve from burdens caused by them; but, if the inadvertence is wholly inexcusable, as if it arises from gross negligence, the court will not look upon it kindly, and will have none of it." Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 Pac. 863.

The fact that by reason of the attorney's death it became impossible to obtain his explanation of his apparent negligence cannot be accepted as raising a presumption that such negligence was in fact excusable. Regrettable as the circumstance may be, the stubborn fact remains that there is in the record no evidence sufficient to justify an order setting aside the judgment or default in this case.

The order is reversed.

DAVIS v. CLINE, Sheriff. (L. A. 6087.)

1. Pleading 🔑377 — Not necessary to prove matter admitted by answer.

In replevin action against a sheriff, where the possession of the property alleged by plaintiff was admitted by the answer's failure to deny, evidence on such point was not necessary and would have been improper.

2. Trial 🔑252(4)—Refusal of instruction on estoppel not error where evidence thereof was lacking.

Refusal of defendant's instructions on estoppel was not error where there was no evidence to sustain the defense.

3. Estoppel 🔑118—Evidence held insufficient to support.

In a replevin action, evidence held not to show facts sufficient to estop plaintiff from claiming property levied upon under execution against her husband; there being no evidence that the sheriff or execution creditor suffered any loss or parted with any right to enforce the judgment.

4. Records 🔑2—Statute relating to sale of motor vehicles not applicable to prior transfers.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 8, relating to the transfer of ownership of motor vehicles, does not affect a purchase prior to its enactment by plaintiff seeking recovery from sheriff who seized under execution against another.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Replevin action by Pearline Davis against John C. Cline, Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

I. Pacht, of Los Angeles, and H. L. Sacks, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, John C. Cline, sheriff of Los Angeles county, from a judgment for $2,087 in favor of the plaintiff, Mrs. Pearline Davis, in an action to recover the possession of two motor sight-seeing trucks.

On June 12, 1914, the Pacific Auto Tours Company, a corporation, was organized for the purpose of conducting sight-seeing trips in the city of Los Angeles. The names of W. A. Davis, husband of the respondent, C. O. De Long, and A. G. Gillespie appeared in the articles of incorporation as the directors and the only subscribers to the capital stock. Subsequently the corporation acquired and operated the two trucks involved in this action. Davis personally conducted the sight-seeing tours and managed "the working part" of the trucks, which were registered with the state motor vehicle department in his name.

Some time in the year 1915, Mrs. Retta Farnsworth recovered a money judgment against Davis, and on September 24, 1918, appellant caused execution upon that judgment to be levied on these trucks as Davis' separate property. This action was commenced on October 4, 1918, respondent alleging that she was the owner and entitled to the possession. In his answer appellant denied respondent's ownership, that he had wrongfully taken possession of the trucks, or that he unlawfully detained them, set up the levy under execution, and, as a separate defense, alleged as an estoppel that respondent had held out Davis as the owner and that in the case of Farnsworth v. Davis the plaintiff therein believed and relied upon respondent's conduct in such holding out. The cause was tried by jury. At the close of respondent's case appellant moved for a nonsuit, but the motion was denied. The jury found that the trucks were respondent's separate property, and that she was entitled to recover their possession or, in the event they could not be delivered to her, the sum of $2,087 in lieu thereof.

[1] 1. Appellant claims first "that there was no evidence that the defendant had possession of the auto trucks." The denial in the answer on this point was as follows:

> "Defendant denies * * * that the defendant wrongfully took possession * * * of any of said property. Defendant further denies that he still unlawfully holds or retains said property." (Italics ours.)

This is almost the identical language of the answer in Ammex Motion Picture Mfg. Co. v. Ervay, 182 Pac. 312, wherein the court held it was "an admission of possession * * * at the time of the commencement of the action." See, also, Woodworth v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 168. Since possession of the property was thus admitted by the failure to deny the allegation in the complaint that appellant "still retains possession of the same," it would have been improper to admit evidence on this point. This contention is without merit.

[2, 3] 2. Appellant next claims that—

> "It was error to refuse to give defendant's instructions 1 to 8, inclusive, for the reason that the jury was authorized to find * * * that Pearline Davis by her acts, words, or conduct allowed her husband, William A. Davis, to appear as the owner of said trucks, * * * and the defendant believed that the said William A. Davis was the owner and levied on all said property as the property of said William A. Davis, and the plaintiff was estopped by her conduct to assert her ownership of said trucks."

These instructions were hypothetical in form and contained a statement of the necessary facts upon which the jury might find that the respondent was estopped to set up her ownership because she had held out Davis as the owner. But, unless there was evidence upon which the jury might have found the facts essential to an estoppel, it was not only not error, but it was the duty of the court to refuse to instruct them on that subject.

The evidence on this point was as follows: De Long, called for the respondent, testified that in May, 1914, he purchased three trucks, two of which were the ones which respondent here seeks to recover; that at that time respondent had bought a one-third interest in the three, and had given in payment therefor her check on the All Night and Day Bank (which later became the Hellman Bank) for $1,000 or $1,500; that subsequently he sold another one-third interest in the trucks to Gillespie, and thereupon he, Gillespie, and respondent organized the Pacific Auto Tours Company; that Davis had been hired at $3 per day "to look after the trucks," given one or two shares of stock, and made president of the corporation; that respondent visited the offices of the company "frequently, four or five times a week"; that thereafter respondent purchased Gillespie's interest; and that on the dissolution of the corporation the trucks were sold outright to her. This testimony was corroborated by Gillespie and respondent herself. The latter further testified on cross-examination that her husband acted as her agent in conducting the business; that with her knowledge and consent the licenses had been issued to him; that she had allowed him to draw checks on her account at the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank; that she could not remember how much she paid to De Long or Gillespie for the trucks; that after the dissolution of the company she continued to conduct the same business under the fictitious name of "Red Auto Bus Line"; but that she had never filed for record that name or "any papers designating my husband as my agent." On redirect examination she stated that—

> "The reason why the licenses on the trucks were taken out in the name of W. A. Davis was because he was in the corporation and they [De Long and Gillespie] thought he was the best one to have the licenses. He was there as a driver, and he took the licenses in his name. Even before the corporation the licenses were in his name. I myself paid the motor vehicle department for the licenses. * * * The only time I permitted my husband to draw checks on my bank account was one time when I made a trip East and another time when I was sick in the hospital. Mr. W. A. Davis had no interest whatever in either of the trucks the subjects of this suit."

There were four witnesses called by appellant. A. W. Frye, auditor for the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, testified that from July 26 to September 26 respondent and Davis maintained a joint account in that bank. A. J. Campbell, bookkeeper of the Hellman Bank, stated that respondent had opened a personal account therein on March 17, 1914, and that all the checks drawn by her with one exception were for sums less than $250. A. M. Beaman, assistant cashier of the Security National Bank, one of the banks in which it was claimed the Touring Company had an account, denied that the concern had ever had an account there. And H. L. Sacks stated that prior to the levy of the execution in the Farnsworth v. Davis case he and a Mr. Melinkoff called on Davis and Mrs. Lucas, both of whom told them that Davis was the owner of these trucks.

Thus, while it is true that respondent allowed the trucks to be registered in her husband's name, there is no evidence that either Mrs. Farnsworth or appellant in levying on the trucks relied upon any acts, statements, representations by, or other conduct on the part of respondent indicating that Davis was the owner.

But we do not find it necessary to decide whether, as appellant claims, "Pearline Davis * * * allowed her husband to appear as the owner of said trucks," since it does not appear that appellant has done anything in reliance upon respondent's conduct except to make a levy on the property in suit. It is a well-settled rule that—

> "In order to create an estoppel in pais the party pleading it must have been misled to his injury; that is, he must have suffered a loss of a substantial character or have been induced to alter his position for the worse in some material respect. * * * Where no available right is parted with and no injury suffered there can be no estoppel in pais. * * * In the absence of injury, it is of course immaterial that the other elements of estoppel are present." 21 C. J. 1135.

See, also, Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279.

As we have seen, appellant has admitted, by his failure to deny it in his answer, that the trucks are still in his possession. By merely levying on the property neither appellant nor Mrs. Farnsworth has parted with any right to enforce the latter's judgment against any other property, nor has either of them "suffered a loss of a substantial character." It follows that one of the essential elements of an estoppel is lacking. We cannot hold, therefore, it was error to refuse to give the instructions requested by appellant.

[4] 3. Finally, it is asserted by appellant that under section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1917, p. 391) the intended transfer of the trucks from Gillespie and De Long to respondent "was incomplete and not valid or effective for any purpose." Section 8 reads in part:

> "Upon the transfer of ownership of any motor vehicle, the person in whose name such vehicle is registered and the person to whom ownership of such vehicle is to be transferred shall forthwith join in a statement of said transfer. * * * Upon such registration the department shall * * * forward * * * a new registration certificate. * * * Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof, * * * delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose."

Appellant's position is that, since the trucks were at all times registered in Davis' name, it must be held that the respondent never acquired title thereto. It is a sufficient answer to this claim to remark that the transaction by which respondent asserts she became the owner, through the sale to her by De Long and Gillespie of their interests, occurred in 1915. The statute just quoted was not enacted until 1917 and could not affect the prior transfer. Appellant's contention cannot be upheld.

F. CHEVALIER CO. v. COLLINS et al.
(L. A. 6365.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1010(1)—Supreme Court will not weigh evidence supporting findings.

Where the findings are fully supported by the evidence, the Supreme Court will not weigh the evidence.

2. Property ⚷1—Joining in execution of mortgage gives no interest in property.

That persons joined in the execution of a mortgage gave them no interest in the property, in the absence of an agreement.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⚷143—Landlord's property in tenant's possession not subject to judgment against tenant.

Civ. Code, § 3440, making a transfer of personal property presumptively fraudulent as to transferor's creditors while transferor remains in possession, and as to purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith subsequent to transfer while property is in transferor's possession, held not to entitle creditor of tenant in possession of hotel to subject hotel and contents to judgment, though tenant remained in possession on change of ownership; the statute being inapplicable where it is sought to take landlord's property to satisfy tenant's debt.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Creditors' bill by the F. Chevalier Company against John L. Collins and others. Judgment for named defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Scherrer & Guthrie and Frank C. Scherrer, all of Independence, and Harvey W. Guthrie, of Bishop, for appellant.

A. H. Swallow, of Bishop, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. [1, 2] This is a creditors' bill brought to subject the Hotel Istalia and the personal property therein, standing of record in the name of defendant John L. Collins, to plaintiff's judgment for $4,927.50 against defendants Bertrand Rhine and Leora B. Rhine. The property in question was purchased by the payment of $11,000 and by the giving of a mortgage for $8,000 executed by the three defendants to C. T. Crowell. The defendants testified in effect that defendants Bertrand Rhine and Leora B. Rhine were indebted to defendant Collins, a brother of defendant Leora B. Rhine, in the sum of $7,000; that Bertrand Rhine inherited $3,000 from his mother and paid it to John L. Collins on account of the aforesaid indebtedness; that the defendant Rhine executed the mortgage in question as an accommodation to defendant John L. Collins and in response to the suggestion of the mortgagee. It is claimed by plaintiff and conceded that defendants Rhine at all times involved herein were bankrupt. As the findings of the court are fully supported by the direct evidence of the defendants, we cannot consider the contention of the appellant that the evidence preponderates in his favor. The fact that the defendants Rhine, who were admittedly bankrupt, executed a mortgage, gave them no interest in the property in the absence of an agreement to that effect. There was no such agreement.

It is claimed that the trial court erred in excluding the findings of the referee in the supplementary proceedings in the action in which the judgment was obtained. It appears from the referee's report that defendant Collins was examined as a witness, but the findings of the referee were in no way binding upon him; moreover, the conclusions of the referee are in accord with the admitted facts, with the single exception of the statement in his report that "Bertrand Rhine transferred and turned over to said John L. Collins the sum of $3,000 to invest in said hotel property, and which, it appears, was so invested by said John L. Collins, and which said (nor any part thereof), it appears, has not been repaid by said John L. Collins to said Bertrand Rhine." The testimony on the trial of this case is also that $3,000 was turned over to be invested in the hotel property, but in addition that it was so "transferred" in payment of the prior indebtedness owing by Rhine to Collins.

[3] Appellant contends that there was no change of possession of the hotel or its contents within the meaning of section 3440, Civil Code, and hence that the hotel is liable for the debts of Rhine. Rhine had been in the possession of the hotel as tenant: First, under the Hotel Istalia Company; second, under Foorman and Woodworth, who subsequently became the owners thereof; and later under Collins. The point is without merit; the section relied upon has no application to this case, where it is sought to take the property of the landlord to satisfy the debt of the tenant.

Judgment affirmed.

HICKMAN v. LONDON ASSUR. CORPORATION et al. (Sac. 2845.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1920.)

1. Witnesses 🔑293½—Immunity as to incriminating testimony held not to apply to a private examination.

Constitutional immunity from giving incriminating testimony does not apply to a private examination arising out of contractual relationship.

2. Witnesses 🔑293½—Immunity as to incriminating testimony does not justify refusal to submit to examination by insurer.

The constitutional immunity against being required to give incriminating testimony did not justify insured's refusal to submit to examination by insurer under policy providing for such examination, on the ground that he had been accused of arson, and that his testimony on examination by insurer might be used against him in the prosecution for arson.

3. Insurance 🔑548—Insurer not required to make a new demand for examination after dismissal of charge of arson.

Where insured refused to testify on examination by insurer provided for by the policy on the ground that he had been charged with arson, and that he was protected by the Constitution against giving testimony that might be used in the arson trial, the insurer, to avail itself of such refusal to defeat payment of policy, was not required to make a new demand on insured for examination after the charge of arson had been dismissed, since insured was in default by refusal to submit on the first examination, and insurer was under no obligation to reopen the matter.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Frank Hickman against the London Assurance Corporation and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to enter judgment for defendants.

Watt, Miller, Thornton & Watt and Miller, Thornton, Miller & Watt, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Earl Rogers, of Los Angeles, and H. P. Brown, of Hanford, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff, Frank Hickman brought this action against the defendants, London Assurance Corporation, New Zealand Insurance Company, Limited, British & Federal Fire Underwriters of Norwich, England, Law Union & Rock Insurance Company, Limited, Yorkshire Insurance Company, Limited, Providence Washington Insurance Company, Sterling Fire Insurance Company, the Home Insurance Company of New York, and North British & Mercantile Insurance Company of London and Edinburgh, to recover for loss by fire on their respective policies. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the several defendants appeal. The record is presented in typewriting.

Prior to November 21, 1915, the said policies were issued to respondent to cover his stock of general merchandise kept and used by him in his "clothing and gents' furnishing goods store" in a two-story brick building at 1922–1924 Mariposa street in the city of Fresno.

On the night of November 28, 1915, practically the entire stock of goods insured was destroyed by fire, and it is this loss which is the basis of respondent's asserted cause of action. Each of the policies was in the standard form prescribed by the Legislature (Stats. 1909, p. 404) and contained a warranty that gasoline or benzine in excess of one quart would not be kept, used, or allowed on the premises. To the allegation of the complaint that the fire originated from causes unknown the defendants set up in their answer that the fire was started with the knowledge, connivance, and design of the respondent, and that in violation of the above waranty gasoline in excess of one quart was kept, used, and allowed on the premises.

In the employ of respondent at the time of the fire and for some years previously was W. H. Jenks, who testified in detail that in July, 1915, a portion of respondent's stock was destroyed, and that the latter was dissatisfied with the settlement made by him with the companies then carrying his insurance; that thereafter the policies in suit were issued; that respondent had planned with him "to have the stock totally destroyed," and had told him to bring oil and gasoline upon the premises "and make all the arrangements for burning the store"; that between the 5th and the 15th of October he purchased five gallons of gasoline in a tin container, which he placed in the basement of the store, and told respondent of this; that subsequently respondent gave him "a gallon jug and a black grip or handbag," in which he brought five or more gallons of kerosene and a number of gallons of gasoline into the store; that prior to November 28 he distributed gasoline around the basement, in vessels, and used shavings and different articles to absorb it, so that by seepage the gasoline would be ignited by the gas "pilot lights"; that about 4 or 5 o'clock on the afternoon of November 28 he raised a trapdoor in the basement, so that the draught thereby created would cause the gasoline to ignite, and went home, where he remained until notified by telephone that evening there was a fire in the store, and that thereupon, pursuant to the instructions of respondent, who had gone to San Francisco "to throw off all suspicion from him," he sent in his own name the following telegram to respondent: "Frank Hickman, care Washington Hotel, San Francisco. Don't buy more goods. Your store is burning."

The respondent testified that he went to San Francisco "to visit the Fair" and admitted having received the telegram while there, but denied that he induced Jenks to burn the property, or that he had any knowledge that it was to be done; that he had ever spoken to Jenks about burning the store or bringing gasoline or oil on the premises, or that he knew of any gasoline or oil being on the premises.

On December 2, 1915, a complaint was sworn to by J. G. Goehring, chief of police of Fresno, and filed on the following day, charging respondent and Jenks with the crime of arson alleged to have been committed in the burning of the store. December 22 they were held to answer. The district attorney filed an information on December 31, upon which the accused were arraigned January 8, 1916, when respondent was released on bail. An amended information was filed January 13. February 14 respondent pleaded not guilty. The trial opened on April 18, and on April 24, while it was still in progress, the district attorney moved the court for an order dismissing the information on the ground "that the people have not sufficient evidence on which to warrant a conviction." The motion was granted, the information dismissed, and the bail exonerated.

On May 22 Jenks pleaded guilty and applied for probation. The application was referred to the probation officer, who reported on June 9, recommending that probation be denied, and it was so ordered. Jenks thereupon withdrew his plea of guilty and pleaded not guilty. He was tried, convicted on October 11, 1916, and released on probation for the term of five years.

This action was commenced on February 27, 1917. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. It was found in effect that Jenks set fire to the store, and that at the time he was insane; that the gasoline was carried upon the premises by him, without the knowledge or connivance of respondent; that respondent did not know there was any gasoline in the store; and that the fire occurred without any complicity on his part.

Each of the policies also contained the following warranty:

> "The insured shall exhibit to any person designated in writing by this company all that remains of any property herein described and shall submit to examination under oath, as often as required, by any such person, and subscribe to the testimony so given, and shall produce to such person for examination all books of account, bills, invoices and other vouchers, and permit extracts and copies thereof to be made. * * * No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustained until full compliance by the insured with all of the foregoing requirements."

On February 5 appellants made a written demand upon respondent that he appear before Leon Levy, a notary public, on February 11, and, pursuant to the above warranty, submit to examination and produce "all original invoices, bills and vouchers of goods * * * claimed by him to have been damaged or destroyed, * * * and all books of account pertaining to the business." On the last-mentioned date the hearing was continued by consent to the following day, when respondent appeared. The following took place:

Respondent's counsel read into the record of the proceedings each of the letters in which the respective appellants had designated H. M. Farrar as their representative or adjuster "in any matters pertaining to the loss." Respondent was then sworn and this colloquy ensued:

> "Farrar. Q. Your name in full? A. Frank Hickman. Q. Your age? A. Forty-four. Q. Your residence? A. 430 Neilson avenue. Q. Business location? A. 1922 Mariposa. Q. How long have you been in your present business location? * * * A. I refuse to answer on the advice of counsel. Q. Now, Mr. Hickman, you refuse to answer any more questions? A. For the same reason, at this time."

Thereupon respondent served and filed "a written statement" to the effect that he had been accused of arson and was about to be tried upon that charge; "that any material testimony which he might give at said examination would relate either to the amount, value, cost of, or extent of damage to the goods * * * or to the cause of the fire, * * * both of which questions are at issue in said criminal proceeding"; that the criminal charge had been initiated and was being prosecuted by H. M. Farrar, appellants' adjuster; that he (respondent) had been advised by counsel that any testimony given by him at any examination could and would be used against him on his trial for arson; that, by virtue of article 1, § 13, of the Constitution, he refused to submit to examination or to produce any books or papers at that time; that he was ready "to stipulate and agree that he will" submit to examination "immediately after the conclusion of the said criminal prosecution and immediately after the trial of said cause and verdict and judgment therein"; and that, if appellants or Farrar would cause the arson charge to be dismissed, he would submit to examination at any time. In reply the following statement was made by Farrar:

> "The insurance companies * * * refuse to accept Mr. Hickman's offer * * * and further demand that he now submit to examination and furnish the books, bills, invoices, etc., heretofore demanded."

Whereupon respondent said:

> "I stand by my reasons given this morning and the course adopted this morning."

No other demand by appellants or offer by respondent to submit to examination and produce the required books and papers was made at any time.

The court found:

> "That the examination of said plaintiff at said time [February 12] * * * would have had for its purpose inquiry into matters necessarily involved in a criminal prosecution; * * * that the course and conduct of said plaintiff in the matter of said hearing * * * was proper and right, and that he was justified in said course and conduct; that the plaintiff did comply with all * * * the terms and conditions of said policies; * * * and that he was justified in refusing to submit to an examination under oath at said time when said information and trial were pending."

The court justified respondent's refusal solely on the ground of his claim of privilege.

Appellants contend:

> That respondent cannot recover because he "refused to submit to examination under oath, or to permit his books, or vouchers, or bills, or other papers concerning the property * * * to be inspected by the defendants herein, which refusal was in violation of the provisions of said policies"; further, "that the excuse given by plaintiff * * * has no merit for the reason that in * * * section 1324 of the Penal Code it is expressly declared that no information which might be obtained from him on his examination * * * could be used against him in any criminal proceedings"; and that "the provision of the policies * * * is equivalent to a positive unconditional promise on the part of plaintiff that he will comply therewith, irrespective of how such compliance may affect him, and * * * his refusal would constitute such a violation * * * of the provision as would preclude him from instituting any action thereon."

Respondent's claim of privilege is thus stated in his brief:

> "A defendant on trial for his liberty has the right to refuse to submit to a private inquisition."

It is a fact, as already appears, that two days after respondent's refusal issue was joined on the criminal charge, and thereafter until April 24 it was pending against him.

The validity of provisions of the character here under consideration has been frequently upheld. Gross v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (C. C.) 22 Fed. 74; Fleisch v. Insurance Co., 58 Mo. App. 596; Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Sims, 115 Ga. 939, 42 S. E. 269; Pearlstine v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 70 S. C. 75, 49 S. E. 4; Southern Home Ins. Co.

v. Putnal, 57 Fla. 199, 49 So. 922; Liverpool L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Cargill, 44 Okl. 735, 145 Pac. 1134; National Fire Ins. Co. v. Humphreys (Tex. Civ. App.) 211 S. W. 811; Richards on Ins. Law, 416; 1 Clement on Fire Ins. 251; 5 Joyce on Ins. § 3330; 19 Cyc. 853; 4 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 3395.

This rule is thus expressed in 13 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 358:

> "As the facts with respect to the amount and circumstances of a loss are almost entirely within the sole knowledge of the insured, and the opportunity and temptation to perpetrate a fraud upon the insurer is often great, it is necessary that it have some means of cross-examining, as it were, upon the written statements and proofs of the insured, for the purpose of getting at the exact facts before paying the sum claimed of it. Such considerations justify the provision universally to be met with in policies, requiring the insured as often as demanded to submit to an examination under oath touching all matters material to the adjustment of the loss, and provisions of that character are held to be reasonable and valid."

And in Ostrander on Fire Insurance, § 172, it is said:

> "The right to require the insured to submit to an examination under oath concerning all proper subjects of inquiry is clearly stipulated for in the form of policies now in general use. The intent of this provision is to prevent fraudulent concealment, and to enable the insurer to obtain material information in regard to the origin and circumstances of the fire, the value of the property, and the claimant's interest therein. The requirement is a reasonable one, and will often, no doubt, be useful in securing important and truthful disclosures that would otherwise be withheld, to the injury of the insurer. When the insured refuses to be examined under oath, he will forfeit all right to recover."

In Conn. Fire Ins. Co. v. George, 52 Okl. 432, 153 Pac. 116, the court held:

> "There may be logic in plaintiff's argument that defendant was not conducting the examination in good faith, but the fact still remains that defendant was acting within the terms of an expressed stipulation found in the policy, which gave it the right to demand such an examination, and it is not for the insured to inquire into the motive actuating the company in exacting the examination, but on his part to comply therewith and to answer all material questions, notwithstanding he might believe that the principal object of the company is to find a loophole whereby it might evade payment of the policy."

It was in Bonner v. Home Ins. Co., 13 Wis. 677, that the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Dixon, said:

> "This action should have been dismissed because prematurely commenced; for, until examination was had, the losses were not, by the terms of the policy, due and payable."

And it was declared in Wheeler v. Conn. Ins. Co., 82 N. Y. 543, 37 Am. Rep. 594, that—

> "To excuse nonperformance it must appear that the act to be done could not by any means have been accomplished."

It is to be noted that under the policies a loss was not payable until 90 days after the receipt by appellants of respondent's preliminary proofs of loss, and that no action on the policies should be sustained "unless begun within 15 months next after the commencement of the fire." The latter period would have expired on February 28, 1917, and the action, as we have stated, was commenced the day before.

No case has been cited, and we are aware of none, where the constitutional immunity of an insured was urged as a ground for refusing to submit to examination, or to produce books and papers. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110, and Ex parte Clark, 103 Cal. 352, 37 Pac. 230, however, are cited by respondent in support of his failure to comply with the demand. In the first of these cases Counselman had been subpœnaed to appear before a federal grand jury and give testimony concerning certain alleged violations of the Interstate Commerce Act (24 Stat. 379). He refused to testify on the ground that any testimony he might give could be made the basis for a criminal prosecution against him under said act. Upon his continued refusal to testify he was committed for contempt, and he sued out a writ of habeas corpus. The Supreme Court, in discharging the petitioner, said:

> "It is impossible that the meaning of the constitutional provision can only be that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal prosecution against himself. It would doubtless cover such cases; but it is not limited to them. The object was to insure that a person should not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which might tend to show that he himself had committed a crime. * * * It is an ancient principle of the law of evidence that a witness shall not be compelled, in any proceeding, to make disclosures or to give testimony which will tend to criminate him or subject him to fines, penalties or forfeitures." (Italics ours.)

The Clark Case was also a proceeding in habeas corpus. The petitioner had been adjudicated an insolvent, and he was cited to appear before the superior court to be examined concerning his assignee's charge that he had fraudulently concealed property which should have been turned over to such assignee for the benefit of his creditors. Clark declined to testify "upon the ground that his answers might be made the foundation of a criminal action against him." He was committed for contempt, and in discharging him from custody this court, speaking through the late Chief Justice Beatty, said:

> "To bring a person within the immunity of [the constitutional] provision, it is not necessary that the examination should be attempted in a criminal prosecution against the witness, or that such a prosecution should have been commenced and actually pending. It is sufficient if there is a law creating the offense under which the witness may be prosecuted. If there is such a law under which the witness may be indicted or otherwise prosecuted for a public offense arising out of the acts to which the examination relates, he cannot be compelled to answer in any collateral proceeding unless the law absolutely secures him against any use in a criminal prosecution of the evidence he may give."

And the court followed Counselman v. Hitchcock, supra.

[1, 2] But those and other authorities of similar import refer only to the attempted compulsion of a witness in a trial, either civil or criminal, a hearing or other lawful inquiry of a public nature. The compulsion secured against by the Constitution is a compulsion exercised by the state in its sovereign capacity in some manner known to the law. Constitutional immunity has no application to a private examination arising out of a contractual relationship. The examination to which appellants demanded respondent should submit was an extrajudicial proceeding, not authorized by any constitutional or statutory provision, but purely by virtue of a contract between the parties. To bring a case within the constitutional immunity, it must appear that compulsion was sought under public process of some kind. This being so, respondent's refusal to undergo examination and produce his books and papers acquires no sanctity because he urged his constitutional right not to be compelled to be a witness against himself. The demand was made upon him by virtue of the stipulation in the contract and by the stipulation alone must his refusal be judged. The stipulation constituted a promissory warranty under which appellants had the right to demand compliance by respondent "as often as required," and the performance of such stipulation was a condition precedent to any right of action. No question was raised as to the sufficiency of the demand, or, aside from the claim of privilege, as to the reasonableness of the time and place designated in the demand. The obligation to perform the warranty was as binding on respondent as his obligation to pay the premiums on the policies. The respondent did not fulfill his obligation, and stands here as having recovered a judgment upon an express contract one of the conditions of which he has failed to perform; in other words, when he commenced this suit he was without a cause of action.

Respondent cites certain cases holding that the right to demand the performance of the condition precedent must be exercised in a reasonable manner. Thus in Thomas v. Burlington Insurance Co., 47 Mo. App. 169, and Gordon v. St. Paul Fire & M. Ins. Co., 197 Mich. 226, 163 N. W. 956, L. R. A. 1918E, 402, it was held under a similar stipulation that the insured was justified in insisting that his counsel be present at his examination and in refusing to be examined unless he were permitted to be present. In Phillips v. Protection Ins. Co., 14 Mo. 220, the court declared that the prevalence of a cholera epidemic at the place designated excused the nonattendance of the insured. Under a stipulation to submit to examination as often as required and a special promise to reappear after the original examination, which the insured after notice failed to do, it was held in Porter v. Trades Insurance, 164 N. Y. 504, 58 N. E. 641, 52 L. R. A. 424, that because he was sufficiently examined at the first hearing the insured was not in default. In all of these cases, however, the question was merely as to the reasonableness of the time, place, or mode of examination. No objection to the examination on any such ground was made here.

[3] Respondent's offer of February 12, as we have seen, is twofold—an offer to comply with the demand after the charge of arson was dismissed, or at any time if appellants would cause such charge to be dismissed. The point is made that in view of this offer, which was a part of the respondent's refusal to submit to examination, the appellants, after the dismissal of the charge of arson should have made a new demand upon the respondent for his examination, and that, such demand not having been made, he was not in default. But the respondent was already in default, as he had no right to refuse on the ground stated to submit to examination in the first instance. It may be that, if he himself had made an offer, after the criminal charge against him had been dismissed, to then and there submit to an examination, and such offer had been refused, his default would have been removed. But he did not so offer, and, since he was in default, the appellants were under no obligation themselves to reopen the matter.

It may be conceded that the position in which respondent found himself between February 12 and April 24 was one of difficulty, but it was a difficulty created by the contract he made. It has been said that—

> "Mere hardship or difficulty will not excuse a party from carrying out a contract; and, where one contracts to do any act which is possible, he is liable for a breach, even though circumstances arise, without his fault, making it difficult, or even impossible, for him to perform. Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527; Ballance v. Vanuxem, 191 Ill. 319, 61 N. E. 85; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 152 Ill. 59, 30 L. R. A. 33, 38 N. E. 773. The breach of this contract by appellants relieved the other parties from performance on their part. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 150, and cases there cited." Ptacek v. Pisa, 231 Ill. 522, 83 N. E. 221, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 537.

And it was declared in Bastian v. British American, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 287, 77 Pac. 63, 66 L. R. A. 255:

> "If the insured cannot bring himself within the terms and conditions of the policy, he cannot recover. The terms of the policy constitute the measure of the insurer's liability. If it appears that the contract has been violated, and thus terminated by the assured, he cannot recover. He seeks to recover by reason of a contract, and he must show that he has complied with such contract on his part."

See, also, Smoot's Case, 15 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 107.

It follows that the conclusion of law that respondent's refusal to submit to examination and produce his books and papers on the ground of his constitutional immunity was "justified, * * * proper, and right" is erroneous, and that upon the findings of fact as to his refusal judgment should have gone for the appellants. This renders it unnecessary to consider appellants' other contentions, that the evidence is not sufficient to support either the finding that respondent was not implicated in causing the fire, or the finding that the gasoline was brought on the premises without his knowledge or consent, or to pass on their assignments of error to numerous rulings on evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the defendants.

LAUMAN et al. v. SPRINGFIELD FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. OF SPRINGFIELD, MASS. (L. A. 6446.)

1. Insurance ⚷229(3)—Authority to procure insurance not authority to consent to cancellation leaving property wholly uninsured.

The authority of a broker or agent to keep property insured is not authority to receive notice of and consent to a cancellation of the insurance which would leave the property wholly without insurance, especially where the policy entitled insured to protection for ten days after notice of cancellation.

2. Insurance ⚷229(3)—Not canceled as to mortgagee by notice to mortgagor or consent by him.

Where an insurance policy was made payable to a mortgagee and provided that the company might cancel the policy on ten days' notice to the mortgagee, the relationship between the mortgagee and mortgagor was not that of principal and agent, and the mortgagee by leaving it to the mortgagor to obtain insurance did not make the mortgagor his agent, and notice to the mortgagor or consent by him to a cancellation of the policy did not bind the mortgagee.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Roy Lauman, trading as the Imperial Dye Works, and others against the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company of Springfield, Mass. From a judgment against it, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis & Rush, Chandler P. Ward, and Paul H. McPherrin, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover, upon an insurance policy issued by defendant to appellant, for a fire loss which occurred July 14, 1917. The policy was issued June 26, 1917, insuring the premises owned by plaintiff Roy Lauman and mortgaged to plaintiff H. R. Dodd. Attached to the policy is a mortgage clause providing that the loss or damage hereunder should be payable to H. R. Dodd, mortgagee, containing five conditions. The third condition, which is the only one material to this inquiry, is as follows:

> "Condition 3. This company reserves the right to cancel this policy at any time as provided by its terms, but in such case this policy shall continue in force for the benefit only of the mortgagee (or trustee) for ten days after notice to the mortgagee (or trustee) of such cancellation, and shall then cease; and this company shall have the right, on like notice, to cancel this agreement."

On July 3d the agent of the defendant company notified Roy Lauman by telephone that the policy was canceled. The policy apparently provided that it might be canceled by five days' notice in writing. No notice whatever was given to the mortgagee. In the telephonic conversation with reference to the cancellation of the policy Lauman stated that he would get the policy and return it by mail; that it was in the possession of his brother. Two days later defendant's agent again demanded the policy of Mr. Lauman, who said he would get the policy and mail it. Lauman having neglected to return the policy, defendant's agent called upon him on July 10th and demanded the policy, to which Lauman replied, "Why worry. * * * The policy is canceled and your company has no liability." The trial court found that on July 10, 1917, the plaintiff Lauman and the defendant agreed to cancel the policy of insurance, that H. R. Dodd did not agree to cancel the policy of insurance, and that the oral notice theretofore given by defendant to Lauman of the cancellation of the policy was not communicated to H. R. Dodd. In pursuance of these findings the court entered a judgment in favor of H. R. Dodd against the defendant for the full amount of the loss as the mortgage upon the property was $1,800, and denied recovery to Lauman.

The appellant contends that Roy Lauman was the agent for H. R. Dodd, authorized to receive notice of cancellation and to agree to such cancellation. As to such agency, R. G. Stitch, special agent of the defendant company, testified that on July 23, 1917, he interviewed plaintiff Dodd; that at the time of the interview Dodd did not have the insurance policies; that Dodd stated that he was an insurance broker, and that he had formerly placed insurance upon the property for Mr. Lauman, but that the business conducted by Lauman was dyeing and cleaning clothes, and that such establishments were not popular with the majority of companies, particularly those he dealt with; that it took a great deal of his time replacing policies that had been ordered canceled by the companies, and had so much detail attached to it that he finally gave the matter up; that he had not kept any further record of the insurance for another reason, namely, that the value of the lots would just about protect him in the event of a loss at any time, but that he preferred the insurance kept on the property on account of the fact that it would be better to have improved property and insurance to protect it than to have just the bare lots; "that he had instructed Mr. Lauman to take care of the insurance, the placing of the insurance himself, after he had ceased to act as his broker, as I would take it, or agent, to take out insurance on the property and keep it insured, and never paid any attention to it further than that; that he didn't have the Springfield policy nor any policies in force at that time, or any record of them." Mr. Heinsch testified concerning the same interview: That Mr. Dodd stated that he had no record of the insurance for several months; "that he had not had any interest in the insurance; that is, he did not have any knowledge of insurance for several months; * * * that he told Lauman to attend to the insurance himself and keep it insured, and he would depend upon him to keep it fully insured; that he did not care to be bothered with it any more."

[1, 2] It is held in Ferrar v. Western Insurance Co., 30 Cal. App. 489, 159 Pac. 609, 611 (see, also, Edwards v. Home Insurance Co., 100 Mo. App. 695, 73 S. W. 881), that where a broker or agent is employed to keep the property insured, he had the authority to cancel as well as to procure insurance. But the authority to keep the property insured would not be authority to consent to a cancellation of insurance which would leave the property wholly without insurance. In this case the effect of the agreement to cancel the insurance was to leave the mortgagee without any protection, although the contract already in force entitled him to protection for ten days. However, the relationship between Lauman and Dodd was not that of principal and agent. They were mortgagor and mortgagee, and their relation to the property was fixed by the mortgage and by the policy of insurance wherein it was specifically agreed that the notice of cancellation should not be effective against the mortgagee until after ten days' notice in writing to him. The fact that the mortgagee left the matter of securing insurance to the mortgagor did not necessarily constitute the mortgagor his agent. It is usual to provide in mortgages that the mortgagor shall secure insurance which will protect the mortgagee. There is no question of ostensible agency involved in the case. The notice given to the mortgagor was not communicated to the mortgagee and was in no sense notice to the mortgagee. The conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff Dodd was not notified of the cancellation of the policy as required by its terms is justified by the evidence. The policy of insurance was therefore in force at the time of the fire, and the judgment of the superior court to that effect was correct.

Execution ⟹272(1) — Agent's knowledge of assignment of stock held imputable to principal purchasing stock, as assignor's judgment creditor, at execution sale.

Where agent made a loan for principal, assisted principal in securing a judgment against borrower, and informed principal that there was stock in borrower's name on books of certain corporation, but did not inform principal that borrower had in fact assigned such stock, principal, as execution sale purchaser of stock, took it subject to rights of assignee, since he was not a bona fide purchaser; he being chargeable with agent's knowledge of the assignment.

WILBUR, J. In this action the plaintiff seeks to establish her title to 40,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation, evidenced by certificates Nos. 46 and 47. Her claim is based upon the transfer from her husband, Harry Jackins, as security for the repayment to her of a loan of $3,500 which was made March 26, 1918, but was never made on the books of the defendant corporation. On April 19, 1918, appellant Frank P. Bacon levied an attachment on such stock in an action against Harry Jackins. On July 15 a judgment was entered, and on July 25 an execution was levied, in that action, and on September 18, 1918, the stock was sold at sheriff's sale and purchased by appellant Bacon for the sum of $500, which was credited on the aforesaid judgment. It is conceded that neither the levy of the attachment nor the execution is good as against the prior assignment of the stock to the pledgee, but the appellants claim that the transfer to the plaintiff is invalid as to appellant Bacon, who is a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice at the sheriff's sale, as the transfer to respondent was never entered on the corporation books. Civ. Code, § 324. The trial court, however, found that the defendant Bacon had notice of the prior assignment to the plaintiff as security before he purchased at the sale, and the question here is whether this finding is supported by the evidence. It is not claimed by respondent that the appellant Bacon had personal knowledge or notice of the previous assignment in pledge. So far as the question of notice is concerned, the case turns upon the knowledge of W. N. Hamaker, who, it is claimed by respondent, was Bacon's agent. It appears that Hamaker was the secretary of the defendant corporation, and that Harry Jackins had applied to him to have the stock transferred to the name of the pledgee in 1911, when he first secured a loan of $3,000 from her and transferred the stock certificates to her in pledge, and had several times thereafter made a similar request, particularly when the new stock certificates were issued on the 26th day of March, 1918, and were on that day assigned by Harry Jackins to his wife. That Hamaker was fully informed as to the pledge to respondent is not disputed. Appellants' contention, however, is that this knowledge was not secured by Mr. Hamaker in his capacity as agent for Bacon, or in connection with Bacon's purchase of the stock, and that therefore his knowledge was not properly chargeable to defendant Bacon.

Was Hamaker the agent of Bacon? It appears from the testimony of the appellant himself that Mr. Hamaker had been acting for him in the making of loans for several years; that, acting in this capacity, he had made the loan upon which the judgment was secured against Harry Jackins and others, under which the stock was sold; that the original note was taken in the name of Mr. Hamaker and subsequently transferred to the appellant; that Mr. Hamaker had been endeavoring for some years to collect the note; and that such efforts were made on behalf of Bacon. Appellant Bacon further testified that everything Mr. Hamaker did in connection with the note and with its collection was done with his authority; that all information he secured about the Queen Oil stock he received from Mr. Hamaker. He was further asked the following questions and answered as follows:

> "Q. Mr. Hamaker had charge of the transaction of the lawsuit, sale and collection of the judgment, as well as the note, didn't he? A. We worked together you might say. Q. You depended upon him to look after it for you? A. Very largely; yes, sir. Q. And what he did in that regard he did as your agent? A. I presume so. Q. And with your authority? A. Yes."

It thus appears that the court was fully justified in inferring from the evidence that Mr. Hamaker was assisting in the conduct of the litigation against Harry Jackins, and for that reason had informed him of the fact that there was stock standing on the books of the corporation in the name of Harry Jackins, although at the time he knew that the property had been assigned to the respondent as security. It further appears that when the attachment was levied about the 19th or 20th of April Mr. Hamaker called up the defendant, Harry Jackins, and told him that he had been served with the attachment on the Queen stock, and Mr. Jackins told him that his wife held the stock as collateral security for a loan. That the court was justified in holding that appellant Bacon was charged with the notice given Hamaker at the time of the levy of the attachment, when Hamaker was co-operating with Bacon in procuring the attachment, and in the securing of a judgment which was to be enforced against this stock, seems too clear to require either discussion or citation of authorities.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBINS v. BLAKE et al. (L. A. 6393.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 12, 1921.)

1. Mortgages 🔑186(5)—Evidence held not to show agreement to surrender first and second mortgages or give third mortgage priority.

In an action to foreclose a third mortgage, evidence held not to establish an agreement between plaintiff and holders of first and second mortgages that the latter would surrender the notes and mortgages or to indicate intention to give priority to plaintiff's mortgage.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1176(4)—Supreme Court will not direct judgment on matters not passed on by trial court.

Where a judgment foreclosing a third mortgage must be reversed because not supported by evidence of priority or of satisfaction of prior mortgages, a new judgment foreclosing first and second mortgages cannot be directed by the Supreme Court where the evidence is not clear as to what payments have been made thereon and the rights of the various parties were not passed on by the trial court on the basis that such mortgages were unsatisfied.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. D. Robins against Harry J. V. Blake and wife and others, in which the defendant P. W. Ehlen filed cross-complaint, and from judgment therein foreclosing the mortgage the defendants and cross-complainant appeal. Reversed.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, and James W. Glassford, of El Centro, for appellants.

Scarborough & Forgy and S. M. Reinhans, all of Santa Ana, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal by the Ehlen Land Company, a corporation, and P. W. Ehlen from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage executed by defendants Harry Blake and Lenore Blake to Francis A. Blake and by him assigned to the plaintiff. Harry and Lenore Blake executed two mortgages for $4,000 each to P. W. Ehlen. These two mortgages were both dated April 3, 1914, but in one of them it was recited that it was "subject to a mortgage of even date herewith between the same parties to secure $4,000." The trial court decided that these two $4,000 mortgages were satisfied and discharged on the 10th day of September, 1915, and by reason thereof that plaintiff's mortgage, which was originally a third mortgage, had become a first mortgage upon the premises. The cross-complaint of P. W. Ehlen seeking to foreclose the two $4,000 mortgages was denied and the premises ordered sold to satisfy the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage. The only dispute in the case is with reference to the nature and validity of the transaction of September 10, 1915. It appears without conflict that at the time of the latter transaction W. W. Johnson was the owner of the second $4,000 mortgage and that W. H. Davis was the owner of the first $4,000 mortgage. The second mortgage had been assigned to W. W. Johnson in exchange for 19 acres at Escondido. The first mortgage had been assigned to Davis as collateral security for an obligation of P. W. Ehlen. These assignments were shown by the records and were testified to by the witnesses, and there is no conflict in the testimony, notwithstanding which the court found:

> "That while the Ehlen Land Company was the owner of said [second] note and mortgage, the defendants, Harry J. V. Blake and Lenore M. Blake, his wife, executed a deed of all their interest in the said real property described in said mortgage securing said note, to the Ehlen Land Company, a corporation, defendant herein, in full satisfaction thereof; * * * that thereby said note and mortgage was fully paid and satisfied; that there is at this time nothing due and unpaid on said note and mortgage."

With reference to the first mortgage the finding is somewhat different, namely, that the property was so transferred "at the request of said cross-complainant and that said promissory note and mortgage were thereby fully paid and satisfied." These findings and the conclusions arising therefrom are not sustained by the evidence. The transaction of September 10, 1915, was agreed upon between Harry J. V. Blake and Alfred T. Burch. Burch was at that time the general manager of the Ehlen Land Company, and P. W. Ehlen was the president thereof. Harry Blake testified that P. W. Ehlen represented to him that Burch was his agent in the matter. For the purposes of this appeal we must accept this testimony as true, although it is directly contradicted by Burch. It therefore appears that at the time the transaction occurred Burch was representing both the corporation and P. W. Ehlen. Harry Blake testified on that subject as follows:

> "Q. With reference to the satisfaction of these two * * * mortgages, did you ask either Mr. Ehlen or Mr. Burch for satisfaction of these mortgages at that time? A. And mentioned just as you have there, no, I did not. Q. Did you make a demand upon the Ehlen Land Company for satisfaction? A. I was getting satisfaction there, that is what I was there for, and I got it. That is what I supposed I was getting. Q. You did not receive satisfaction on the mortgages though? A. No, I had no writing. * * * Q. You were dealing with Mr. Burch as agent for Mr. Ehlen; why didn't you demand a satisfaction of these mortgages, if that was your arrangement? A. I don't know why. When I went in there at that meeting, it was to get out from under this whole thing, and we did arrange and it was satisfactory to me, and I did go out and turn him over my ranch at that time."

He also testified concerning the negotiation and the transaction of September 10, 1915, so far as relates to the outstanding mortgages:

> "I says, 'I want to get out from under this load, I have had all I want of it, and if there is any way for us to clean it up I would like to do so,' and Mr. Burch says, 'What would you like to do?' and I says, 'If you will clean up everything and give me a certain amount of cash,' I asked them a thousand dollars, and also to extend to Mrs. Blake a 12 months on the interest on her ranch, that is on the south 80, that I would deed over to him, lock, stock, and barrel, all the north 80, which was all I had at that time, because I had deeded the south 80 to my wife, and Mr. Burch says, 'How about these bills?' and I says there are such and such things that I cannot recall now, I think there were water bills, in fact, I was back on a great many things, and finally it got down where Mr. Burch said, 'We will give you,' after figuring, 'between seven and eight hundred dollars,' I disremember, and I says: 'That is perfectly satisfactory. You are going to take care of all these back obligations, and extend Mrs. Blake 12 months on her place.' And they said, 'Yes, that is all right,' and I think there was some document drawn up at that time, and we had to have them signed. * * *"

He also testified on cross-examination, with reference to the third mortgage, that his brother, who was present at the opening of the negotiations, stated:

> "When you are in this thing you want to take care of that personal note of mine, and Mr. Ehlen says, 'When Mr. Burch gets here, we will take care of that.'"

Mr. Blake also testified as follows:

> "Q. Were these notes that were made at the same time the two $4,000 notes? A. Well, I said at the time, 'Why don't we make them in one?' Q. No, I mean at the time you were at Orange there, was anything said? (The negotiations of September 10, 1915, were at Orange.) A. There was nothing said in regard to it. It was understood that when I closed up my transaction that I had finished and was free. * * * Q. Then it was your understanding of the deal made with Mr. Ehlen— A. I made the deal with Mr. Burch. He was the man that acted on the whole thing, and it was on his say-so that Mr. Ehlen acquiesced in everything that was put to him at the time, and he said he was not handling the business, but that this was his agent and doing all the work. Q. And at that time, Mr. Blake, it was your understanding then that you were to be let out clear? A. Certainly. Q. And these three mortgages, one to your brother, and the two $4,000 notes, were to be taken care of by the Ehlen Land Co.? A. Certainly, with the understanding that I turn it over instead of having them go to the expense of foreclosing on it, and I would get out of it."

[1] It is clear from the foregoing that there was no direct negotiations between the parties with reference to the satisfaction of the two $4,000 mortgages, and if we accept the testimony of Harry Blake concerning his "understanding" and his "intentions," as his recollection of the substance of the conversation between the parties on September 10, 1915, such testimony at most only establishes an agreement on the part of the land company to take care of the outstanding mortgages. It is clear, then, that giving this testimony the utmost credit, it did not establish an agreement on the part of the land company to surrender notes and mortgages which at the time were owned by others. Nor was anything said by either party to indicate that it was the intention of the land company and P. W. Ehlen to give priority to plaintiff's mortgage. Mr. Burch, the other party to the negotiations, denied that any agreement whatever was entered into with reference to the two $4,000 mortgages, except that the land company agreed to pay the overdue interest thereon. He testified that it was in consideration of this agreement, and of a credit of $1,250 on an unsecured note and a payment of $700 cash; that the mortgagor transferred to the land company the land and personal property thereon, the latter subject to a chattel mortgage. This testimony, as to what was agreed upon, is in harmony with the purpose of the interview which was sought by Harry Blake, and is in accord with what was actually done in pursuance thereof, and on close analysis is not in conflict with Harry Blake's testimony.

[2] It will be necessary to reverse the judgment because the findings are not supported by the evidence. Appellant asks that the trial court be directed to enter a new judgment foreclosing the first and second mortgages. That cannot be done. It is not clear from the evidence as to what payments have been made upon the first and second mortgages. The rights of these various parties were not passed upon by the trial court on the basis that the $4,000 mortgages were still unsatisfied. Upon a new trial of the action the right of the various parties can be determined, if the evidence thereupon adduced again requires the conclusion that there was no satisfaction of the $4,000 mortgages. Even if Burch was acting as agent for P. W. Ehlen, as well as for the Ehlen Land Company, in the transaction of September 10th, that fact would not justify giving the third mortgage priority over the first and second mortgages.

Judgment reversed.

UNION HOLLYWOOD WATER CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 5202.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑203(6)—Water rates permitting earnings of 6.19 per cent. on investment not confiscatory.

An ordinance fixing water rates so as to permit net earnings of 6.19 per cent. upon the total value of the plant would not be confiscatory.

2. Evidence 🔑113(8)—Cost is evidence of value.

The cost of a thing is evidence of its value, especially where it appears that it is comparatively new, and where it has no established market value, as in the case of secondhand goods, lands not on the market, water in the ground, buildings, pipe lines laid in the ground, and the like.

3. Evidence 🔑568(4)—Court may reject part of testimony of opinion witness.

In water company's action to enjoin enforcement of ordinance fixing rates on ground that rates were confiscatory, the court, in hearing testimony as to the value of the respective parts of plaintiff's plant, was not compelled to take the estimate of any witness as a whole, but could accept such opinion on the item as to which it was lowest, and reject it on others and compute the value on the combined lowest estimates of all or any number of the witnesses.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑203(12)—Evidence held to sustain finding as to valuation of water plant as affecting rates.

In suit to enjoin enforcement of ordinance fixing rates claimed to be confiscatory, evidence held to sustain finding as to total valuation of plaintiff's property.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑203(5)—Public service corporation entitled to rate which will make allowances for depreciation.

A water company is entitled to a rate which will permit rebuilding of plant as it becomes outworn.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑203(6)—Methods of making allowance for depreciation in fixing rates stated.

In ascertaining amount to be allowed for depreciation, the court may either take the value of each component item of property at the time the rate is fixed and divide it by the number of years then remaining of its life and turn over amount of the quotient to the owner each year of such life, or by an addition to the rates sufficient to make up that sum, or it may provide for a sinking fund, the amount of which, if invested each year at current rates of interest on money loaned on safe security, will produce the present value at the end of the life and add such sum to the amount to be raised by the rates each year.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Lower court's finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑203(6)—Pipe bonuses received for laying mains in proposed subdivisions not receipts from operation.

Pipe bonuses received by water supply company from owners of tracts of land in proposed subdivisions in consideration of the company laying mains in such subdivisions held not income, but merely money wherewith the company made improvements to constitute a part of its capital investment.

9. Constitutional law 🔑298(3)—Eminent domain 🔑2(10)—Waters and water courses 🔑203(6)—Ordinance fixing rates held confiscatory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Union Hollywood Water Company against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 178 Cal. 206, 172 Pac. 983.

Haas & Dunnigan, and Sheldon Borden, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert Lee Stephens, Charles S. Burnell, and Wm. P. Mealey, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to enjoin the defendant city of Los Angeles from enforcing an ordinance of said city adopted on June 2, 1911, fixing the water rates to be charged by the plaintiff, a public service water company, during the ensuing year, beginning July 1, 1911, and to have said ordinance declared void on the ground that the rates were so low as to constitute a confiscation of plaintiff's property. Judgment was given for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

The action was begun in June, 1911. The trial began in October, 1911, and the findings were filed and judgment rendered on January 19, 1915.

The basis of the judgment, as set forth in the findings, is shown by the following table of values, receipts and expenses:

Value of plaintiff's plant after deducting depreciation.........		$835,291 40
Receipts from operation, including receipts for service connections and meters and sums paid as a bonus for laying pipe lines in tracts of land....		$141,571 45
Operating expenses for the year in question	$64,263 25
Annual depreciation.............	25,572 96	89,836 21
Total net earnings...........		$ 51,735 24

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[1] The net receipts amount to 6.19 per cent. upon the total value of the plant. If these valuations are correct, the rates could not amount to confiscation, and the judgment must be upheld.

The plaintiff claims that the valuations and estimates of receipts and expenses made by the court were erroneous in many particulars. The errors claimed are as follows:

1. The value of the plant as found is claimed to be less than its value, as shown by any theory, in the sum of	$ 10,554 00
2. Value of rights of way estimated by defendants' witnesses upon the wrong theory, making a difference in favor of defendant of	33,494 72
3. Discrepancy in value of Sherman tract and Hudson & Selma tract owned by plaintiff	67,088 75
Excluding one-half of the Franklin reservoir site	14,325 00
4. Underestimate of amount of water owned by plaintiff, value	37,245 00
5. Error in computing value of pipes belonging to the plaintiff situated in the city	42,770 00
6. Under-estimate of value allowable for "going concern"	18,705 00
Total addition to valuation	$ 224,182 47
Making a correct total valuation of	$1,059,473 87

In computing the net revenue errors are claimed as follows:

1. Error in allowance for depreciation	$ 14,551 29
2. Errors in finding as to operating expenses	8,583 51
3. Errors in finding as to total operating receipts	41,120 43

If these claims are correct, the receipts from operation would be only $100,451.02, and the operating expenses and annual depreciation combined would amount to $112,971.01, showing an annual loss to the plaintiff by the rates fixed of $12,519.99. If that were the result, the rates would be confiscatory and the ordinance would be void.

With respect to the first item the plaintiff claims that the lowest estimate of the value of the whole plant by any witness was that of defendants' engineer, Sonderegger, who placed it at $845,845.55. The finding that it was worth $835,291.40 is $10,554.15 less than the said minimum estimated by Sonderegger. Plaintiff asserts that this deduction is not explainable by the evidence. There was, however, other evidence of value from which the court may properly have concluded that deductions should be made from that estimate. The plaintiff, about the year 1907, purchased a large part of the stock of the West Los Angeles Water Company, which previously had owned and operated the plant, and plaintiff then took over from that company its entire plant. It continued the service and from time to time made additions to the plant as necessity required. The plant was comparatively new at the time of the passing of the ordinance. The secretary of the plaintiff testified that the total cost of the entire plant up to January 1, 1910, as shown on its books, was $746,489.22. This included the cost of a part of the plant situated outside of the city, which amounted to $43,241.55, leaving $703,247.67 as the cost of the part of the plant within the city. Additions thereto were made during the year 1910 at a cost of $87,549.32, making the total cost—that is, the total amount invested in the plant up to January 1, 1911—$790,796.99.

[2] The cost of a thing is evidence of its value, especially where it appears that it is comparatively new and where it has no established market value, as in the case of secondhand goods, lands not on the market, water in the ground, buildings, pipe lines laid in the ground, and the like. Jennings v. Oregon L. Co., 48 Or. 287, 86 Pac. 367; Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 182, 21 Pac. 729; Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 39, 46 Pac. 892; Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 40, 23 Pac. 200; 25 Pac. 1101; Joost v. Sullivan, 111 Cal. 296, 43 Pac. 896; Luse v. Jones, 39 N. J. Law, 708; Jones v. Morgan, 90 N. Y. 10, 43 Am. Rep. 131; Norton v. Willis, 73 Me. 580; Small v. Pool, 30 N. C. 47; Boggan v. Horne, 97 N. C. 268, 2 S. E. 224; Rawson v. Prior, 57 Vt. 609; Ford v. Smith, 27 Wis. 267; Roberts v. Dunn, 71 Ill. 50; 22 Corp. Jur. p. 178, note 19, page 183, notes 12, 21, and page 184, § 140. The things above enumerated constitute the major part of the plaintiff's plant. Furthermore, there were varying opinions as to the value of the respective parts of the plant which entered into the total value above mentioned.

[3] The court was not compelled to take the estimate of any witness as a whole. It could accept such opinion on the item as to which it was lowest and reject it on others and compute the value on the combined lowest estimates of all or any number of the witnesses. For these reasons we cannot say that the court may not have abated the values of some of the items contained in the testimony of the witness Sonderegger sufficiently to account for the finding of $835,291.40, and so we must hold that it is not contrary to the evidence in the respect claimed.

[4] The supposed undervaluation of $35,073 on the plaintiff's rights of way was apparently made by deducting $8,108.12, the value thereof as fixed by two witnesses for the defendants, from the sum of $43,181.70, the value as estimated by the plaintiff's witnesses. This alone, it is admitted, would be insufficient to overturn the finding. Plaintiff's theory is that the defendants' witnesses arrived at the values given by them by first finding the fee-simple value of the lands composing the rights of way and then taking 25 per cent. thereof as the value of the plaintiff's easements to lay and maintain pipes therein. It also claims that damages which the owner of the adjoining land might be entitled to in a condemnation suit should have been added as a part of the value or cost of the easements. The pipes would be laid at a considerable distance below the surface. When the trenches were filled, the ordinary use of the land would not be interfered with, except when repairs became necessary, which would be very infrequently. The apportionment of 25 per cent. of the total value as the value of the easements alone, under these circumstances, does not seem to us so unreasonable as to require the court to hold that the estimate should have been rejected. The witnesses testified that a water pipe line does not injure real property at all. They also testified that their opinion of the value of such easements was based on their general experience in dealing with real property and in obtaining rights of way in that vicinity some years before the adoption of the ordinance. It is obvious, therefore, that the finding has support in the evidence.

We think the plaintiff's claim that the sum of $67,088.75 was excluded from the value of the land at Sherman and at the corner of Hudson and Selma streets is not warranted by the record. Some of the defendants' witnesses gave their opinion as to the value of these lands based on their knowledge of the value of real property in that vicinity. Others valued it by taking into consideration the value of the water derivable therefrom by pumping. The plaintiff's claim is that these values were wholly separate and distinct elements, and that to find the total value the two should have been added together. The court did not so view the testimony, but apparently took each of them as valuations of the land as a whole, including the water. The court's theory does not seem an impossible or unreasonable interpretation of the testimony. We therefore conclude that there is no merit in this claim.

With respect to the item of $14,325 for one-half of the Franklin reservoir site, the value of which was excluded by the court, it is sufficient to say that the entire site included 10 acres, valued at $28,650, and that there was evidence from which the court could reasonably conclude that only one-half thereof was necessary for use in the plaintiff's plant.

The claim that the water rights of the plaintiff were undervalued to the extent of $37,245 is also untenable. The water rights consisted merely of the ownership of certain lands in which it had bored wells from which it pumped water. The value of such water rights is, of course, measured by the quantity of water that could be regularly obtained in that way, and that quantity would depend on the quantity of water from rainfall which would find its way into the underlying strata of the land and on the porous nature of the material therein. These conditions are uncertain and the quantity obtainable is necessarily uncertain. The maximum quantity ever pumped at any time therefrom cannot be safely accepted as the quantity regularly obtainable. Plaintiff's witnesses nevertheless gave their opinion of value based on this maximum. The defendants' witnesses estimated the quantity very much lower. The court would have been fully justified in following the opinions of the latter, and we may assume that it did so. It is the difference between these two theories that constitute the undervaluation contended for.

The asserted error of $42,770 in apportioning the value of the pipe lines of the plaintiff within the city is in reality nothing more than a conflict in the evidence. The total value of all the pipe lines, including those within the city and those in the country, and the length of each separately, was first taken. One set of witnesses testified that the value of the separate parts should be apportioned by reference to the receipts from the city service as compared with that from the country service, and accordingly fixed the value of the city service as 95½ per cent. of the value of both. The other witnesses testified that, since the country served by the plaintiff was much more sparsely settled than the territory served by the city part of its system, the length of pipe to each consumer necessary to the service in the country would be much greater than in the city, and that the receipts from the country service would therefore be much less compared with the cost and value of the pipe lines than the receipts from the service within the city. Accordingly they testified that the value of the city pipe lines should not be estimated at more than 87 per cent. of the total value of all the lines. We think there can be no question but that the theory of the witnesses for the defendants was the more accurate and should have been followed.

The next objection is that the court, in estimating the "going value" of the plant, excluded $18,705 from the computation. The witnesses for the defendants estimated the value of the plant as follows:

Physical property	$653,763 55
Water	84,122 00
Real estate and rights of way	54,675 00
Going concern	53,285 00
Total	$845,845 55

The witnesses testified that in estimating the "going concern" value they considered as one of the factors involved in the calculation the income of the plaintiff for the year 1910, under the rates prevailing for that year. The rate ordinance for that year had been attacked by plaintiff in an action similar to the present action, and on its motion in that action an order was made in that case that the rates therein claimed for that year by plaintiff should be paid, but that the excess of such rates over those fixed by the ordinance for that year should be impounded to await the event of that suit. This had been done, and the impounded money amounted to $18,705. They did not include this sum as part of plaintiff's income for 1910. This is the error complained of. The judgment in that action was that the rates fixed for that year were reasonable, and that the rate ordinance for that year was valid. That judgment has since been affirmed. Union H. W. Co. v. Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 206, 172 Pac. 983. It must therefore be presumed that the money was properly impounded, that it formed no part of plaintiff's income for 1910, and that it does not belong to plaintiff. The witnesses were correct in excluding it in making their compilations. Consequently the court below did not err in accepting their estimate, so far as that sum was involved.

The next objection is that the court should have allowed $14,551.29 more on account of annual depreciation. The plaintiff's witnesses estimated this amount at $40,124.25, and the defendants' witnesses at $25,572.96. The court adopted the last-mentioned estimate. Plaintiff claims that the larger sum was the proper allowance to be made.

[5] Allowances of this character are made because of the fact that a plant constructed for public service wears out, and that, if the service is to be continued, it must be replaced at the end of its life. The owner is entitled to a reasonable return on his invested capital while he continues the service. If it is to be kept up, he must also collect from the consumers enough to rebuild the plant when it becomes outworn. The annual rates are therefore increased to provide such sum.

Several methods of obtaining the fund necessary for this purpose have been in use. All of them begin with an estimate of the probable life of the several items or classes of property composing the plant at the time the rate is fixed and of the then present value thereof. Each of them is designed to return to the owner, during the life of the particular item, the entire present value of that item at the time the rate is fixed, while at the same time giving the owner a reasonable return on the invested capital value of such item. The sum of the annual allowance for depreciation on each item or class of property constitutes the total allowance on this account to be collected from consumers each year in the form of rates.

A recognized method is to take the value of each component item at the time the rate is fixed and divide the same by the number of years then remaining of its life. The quotient is to be returned to the owner each year of such life by an addition to the rates sufficient to make up that sum. Under this plan the allowance for depreciation is the same each year of the succeeding life of the item in question, but as the sums thus returned to the owner are to be deducted each year from the value of the previous year, to ascertain the then present value of the plant, the amount included in the rate on account of interest on capital invested is gradually reduced during the succeeding years. While the sum allowed for depreciation is constant, the annual rate allowance for interest on capital is gradually reduced and the consumer pays a much higher rate at the beginning of the period than at the end. This plan, we understand, was the one adopted by the witnesses for the plaintiff, and which it is insisted must be followed.

Another plan is known as the sinking fund plan. Instead of dividing the present value by the number of years of life remaining, an annual contribution by the consumers to a sinking fund is provided. The amount which, if invested each year at current rates of interest on money loaned on safe security, would produce the present value at the end of the life, is ascertained or estimated. This sum is added to the amount to be raised by rates each year. It is assumed that by investing these sums as they come in the owner may reimburse himself for the present value, so that at the end of the life he will have funds sufficient to replace the property. The sum added to the sinking fund is the same each year. The rates are fixed so as to raise this addition to the sinking fund and also allow a reasonable return to the owner on the original estimated value each year. By this plan the consumer pays the same rate during the entire life of the particular item in question, but the rate in the first years of the life is smaller than under the first-mentioned plan, and is larger in the later years.

There is a modified sinking fund plan sometimes used whereby the addition for sinking fund is increased each year by the amount of the estimated accrued interest on the previous years' contribution to sinking fund, and the amount allowed to the owner for interest on capital investment is reduced by the same amount. The result is the same for both parties. The rate remains constant throughout the term of life, and the owner receives the same amount each year, but it is apportioned differently between the sinking fund account and the interest on capital account.

[6] We understand that the amount estimated by the defendants' witnesses and allowed by the court as for depreciation was determined by one or the other of the last-mentioned methods. The tables used by the witnesses in computing this amount are not given in the record, and it is difficult to understand from their explanations which one of the two was taken. It is not important to determine that point. The method of procedure under either plan would result in justice both to the consumer and owner, and would accomplish the ultimate object of providing the necessary fund for reconstruction. We can see no reason why either one, if allowed by the court, was not just and proper. If a change from the sinking fund plan to the so-called "straight line" plan contended for by plaintiff were made hereafter, some injustice might possibly follow. But this might happen under either plan. We must assume, in theory at least, that the proper public authority will act fairly in the matter. It may be noted that the power to fix rates passed to Railroad Commission on November 3, 1914 (Const. art. 12, § 23), and that the commission usually, if not invariably, follows the sinking fund method of estimating the addition to the rates on account of the necessity of providing a fund for ultimate reconstruction. Los Angeles v. S. C. G. Co. et al., 5 R. R. Com. Dec. 40; 13 R. R. Com. Dec. 728. Furthermore, since the estimate of the value of the plant by the plaintiff's witnesses was much larger than that made by the defendants' witnesses and accepted by the court, the major portion of the difference between the two allowances for depreciation is accounted for by the difference in amount which the same percentage would produce on the respective estimates of value.

In Redlands W. Co. v. Redlands, 121 Cal. 312, 53 Pac. 791, and San Diego W. Co. v. San Diego, 118 Cal. 583, 50 Pac. 633, 38 L. R. A. 460, 62 Am. St. Rep. 261, cases arising when the law provided for annual fixing of rates by city councils prior to 1914, it was held that the rates should not be "so fixed as to enable it [the water company] to set apart a certain amount each year for the depreciation of its plant." In Contra Costa W. Co. v. Oakland, 159 Cal. 334, 113 Pac. 668, these decisions were virtually overruled on this point, and the rulings of the United States Supreme Court on that question were followed. Knoxville v. Knoxville W. Co., 212 U. S. 1, 29 Sup. Ct. 148, 53 L. Ed. 371. The question may now be regarded as settled.

[7] The claim that $8,583.51 was improperly deducted by the court from the operating expenses shown by the evidence proves, upon examination, to be a mere question of a conflict of the evidence upon which the decision of the court below is conclusive.

The remaining point is the contention that the receipts from operation were overestimated to the amount of $41,120.43. The finding of $141,571.45 as the total receipts from operation states that it includes money paid by consumers at the rate fixed by the ordinance, and also "hydrant receipts, irrigation water rentals, charges for putting in meters and services (which meters and services were retained and became the property of plaintiff), land rentals, city pipe line bonuses (being charges required of property owners for putting in pipe lines, which pipe lines were retained as and became the property of plaintiff), delinquent charges, and miscellaneous receipts."

The record shows that this item was made up of the following charges:

Receipts from rate payers at ordinance rates	$100,172 10
Receipts from meters and services	26,243 45
Receipts from pipe bonuses	14,877 03
Miscellaneous receipts and delinquent charges	278 87
Total	$141,571 45

[8] The receipts, amounting to $26,243.45, for meters and services, consisted of money exacted from the consumers along the line of the pipes, ostensibly for the purpose of paying the cost of laying the connecting pipes between the company's mains and the property line and for installing the meters thereon. The receipts, amounting to $14,877.03, for pipe bonuses, were obtained from owners of tracts of land who proposed to subdivide the land into building lots, and who desired the company to extend its pipes into such subdivisions along the streets thereof so as to furnish water to expected residents on the lots, and who paid these sums of money to the company to be used in constructing and laying such mains. The defendants contend that these sums were a part of the legitimate receipts from the operation of the water company in its character as a public service company. We cannot agree with this contention. The mains laid in the proposed subdivisions were clearly a part of the plant of the plaintiff, and the money expended in so doing was a part of its capital investment. The same thing is true of the pipes laid from the mains along the streets to the property line of the consumers and of the meters attached thereto. They were a necessary part of the water system, and the expenses thereof were a part of the capital investment and went to make up the total cost of the plant. The source from which the plaintiff received the money which it expended in making these additions to its system is wholly immaterial. If it had borrowed the money for that purpose, no one would question the fact that the additions constituted part of the plant, and that the borrowed money was not revenue. The fact that the money was paid to the company by the subdivision owners to obtain an extension of the mains and by the consumers to obtain connections with the mains does not in the least change the character of the money so received. After the money had been so paid, whether by donation or otherwise, the plaintiff was the owner thereof and could apply it to that purpose, or to any other purpose it saw fit, provided, of course, it rendered the consideration for which it was given, as otherwise it would have been liable to an action for the return thereof by the payer as money had and received. These sums were not received from the operation of the plant and should not have been added to the receipts from operation.

The question whether or not the value of the parts of the plant constructed with this money should be included in the valuation upon which it was entitled to a return has not been argued, and we express no opinion upon it. It does not affect our decision.

It appears that the company's engineers ascertained that the amounts expended by the company for these additions to its system did not equal the contributions for that purpose, and that the company made a profit on that branch of its work amounting to $6,968.67, which those engineers, for the purposes of the case, conceded to be a part of its operating receipts. We do not think this concession can be allowed. The profit must either be considered as a donation to the plaintiff, or as money held by it subject to the demand of the payors. In either case it has no place in the computation necessary to ascertain whether or not the rates fixed by the ordinance are sufficient to give the company a reasonable return on the capital invested in its plant.

[9] We are satisfied that the court erred in including these two items in the operating receipts of the company. Deducting them from the total operating receipts, it would leave a balance of only $100,451.42. Taking from this amount the expenses of operation and amount allowed for depreciation, $89,836.21, the amount left as the net receipts from operation would be only $10,615.21. This would make a return to the plaintiff, as interest on its capital investment, of only 1.27 per cent. There was testimony with respect to the amount that should be allowed as a reasonable rate of interest upon investments of this character, which ranged from 6 to 8 per cent. It is obvious, therefore, that the ordinance rates did not allow the plaintiff a reasonable return on its investment, and that it amounted to a confiscation of property. Consequently it must be held to be void because it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of this state, being a taking of private property for public use without due compensation, and a deprivation of property without due process of law.

50 Cal. App. 264

PARKER v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. et al. (Civ. 2190.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1920.)

1. Injunction 🔑137 (1) — Where plaintiff would suffer no injury, temporary injunction denied.

Where plaintiff will not suffer any actual injury pending the trial, but a temporary injunction against defendant would tie up the source of water supply for large areas of the country and work irreparable injury, a temporary injunction should not be granted.

2. Injunction 🔑158—Denial of temporary injunction would not affect final injunction sought.

Plaintiff's application for a permanent injunction would not be affected by a ruling denying a restraining order pendente lite, as plaintiff's rights, if any, would be ascertained as of that date.

3. Injunction 🔑137(1)—Temporary injunction not granted where plaintiff's loss would be negligible.

The purpose of a restraining order pendente lite is ordinarily to prevent monetary loss, and, where such would be negligible and the defendants are able to respond in damages, it should not be granted.

4. Injunction 🔑135 — Refusing injunction pendente lite not an abuse of discretion.

Where defendants are not shown insolvent, and the record does not show abuse of trial court's discretion in denying injunction pendente lite and it did not err in concluding that the damages, if any, which plaintiff might incur pending trial would be negligible and monetary only, and capable of ascertainment, the order must be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Ivan H. Parker against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and another. From an order denying plaintiff's application for a temporary injunction, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Lowell, of Auburn, for appellant.

Thos. J. Straub and Wm. B. Bosley, both of San Francisco, and J. M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action for an injunction and restraining order pendente lite.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiff is the owner of 120 acres of land situate in Placer county; that Bear river, a natural water course, flows through said land; that at the time of the commencement of this action the defendant was constructing a concrete settling reservoir in and near the channel of said river, at the head of a certain canal theretofore constructed by the defendants; that the dam and settling reservoir maintained and being constructed by the defendants are situate some six miles upstream from the lands belonging to the plaintiff; that for a considerable period of time the defendants have caused to flow down the channel of Bear river to the head of said canal, and there divert into its said canal, about 14,000 inches of water; that the waters flowing down said Bear river carry quantities of sand, gravel, and other débris; that in order to prevent such sand, gravel, and débris from entering said canal, defendants intend to operate said settling reservoir by collecting therein and filling the same with water, soil, sand, gravel, and débris, and then opening the gates in said settling reservoir and discharging the contents thereof in the largest possible volume, to wit, in a stream of more than 50,000 inches, into the channel of said Bear river, and thence down upon and over the property belonging to the plaintiff.

The application for an injunction pendente lite was heard upon the verified complaint filed by the plaintiff, and three affidavits filed by the defendants. After the hearing of such application, the trial court made and entered its order denying the plaintiff's application for a temporary injunction. From this order plaintiff appeals.

[1] It appears from the pleadings and affidavits that the defendant Pacific Gas & Electric Company is a public service corporation, furnishing light and power to various cities and towns, and also supplying a large area of farming lands with water for irrigation purposes. It likewise appears that the plaintiff's land is valuable chiefly for the mineral deposits contained therein; that it lies, in large part, along the beds and banks of said river, and is covered with sand, boulders, and other material usually found in such sections of the country. No reasons are assigned in the order denying the application for a temporary injunction, which has necessitated a careful reading of the pleadings and affidavits upon which the hearing was had. The learned trial court, however, filed an opinion which has been set out in the briefs, and sets forth in very concise language the conclusion at which we have arrived, and we therefore adopt the opinion of the trial court as herein, to wit:

> "In truth, the affidavits tend to show that the lands crossed by the flowing water constitute the bed and banks of Bear river. It further appears that this bed and these banks consist largely of sand, gravel, and boulders, having little or no value, save for the minerals contained in them; hence the actual injury to the premises, pending the trial of the suit, may be eliminated as negligible. The real and only persuasive ground for a preliminary injunction is the claim that, if the defendant once commenced the public use, then it could no longer be enjoined. But it has been discharging this water into Bear river for several years, and the court is compelled to recognize this fact. There is, however, another view to this matter. The plaintiff will not suffer any actual injury pending the trial of this action (by this is meant actual money damage to property). While, on the other hand, an injunction that would tie up the source of water supply for large areas of the country would work irreparable injury."

It is true that the complaint alleges that the plaintiff's damages would be irreparable, but there is no showing that the defendants are insolvent, or unable to respond in damages. The burden of the argument appears to be, as stated by the trial court, that if once the use of the reservoir were begun, an injunction would not lie.

[2, 3] We do not well see how plaintiff's application for a permanent injunction would be affected by the ruling of the trial court upon his application for a restraining order pendente lite, as his rights, if any, would be ascertained as of that date. The purpose of a restraining order pendente lite is ordinarily to prevent monetary loss or damage to the injured party. In this case the opinion of the trial court, with which we agree, shows that the monetary loss, if any, would be negligible, and that if any such should occur the defendants are able to respond in damages, and there is no showing that such damages could not be readily ascertained.

The argument of counsel has been directed almost entirely to the right of the plaintiff to a permanent injunction upon the final hearing of the action. As we view the matter, it is not necessary, and would be improper, to express any opinion at this time upon the merits of the case. Unless an abuse of discretion has been shown, the action of the trial court must be upheld.

[4] In Williams v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 150 Cal. 592, 89 Pac. 330, Justice Shaw states the law in the following concise language:

> "The question of granting or refusing an application for a temporary injunction is addressed to the sound discretion of the lower court, and its action will not be reversed upon appeal unless there appears to be an abuse of the discretion. If the damage or injury threatened is of a character which may be easily remedied if the injunction is refused, as where it is chiefly monetary damage and the defendant is solvent, the court, in its discretion, may refuse to issue an injunction, leaving the question to be decided upon the final hearing. [Citing a number of cases.] Where one or the other of the parties is to suffer by the granting or refusing of an injunction pending the action, the inconvenience likely to be incurred by each from the action of the court in granting or refusing a temporary injunction should be balanced, and the court should grant or withhold the injunction accordingly."

In Piper v. Hawley, 179 Cal. 10, 175 Pac. 417, the Supreme Court of this state again disposes of this question, as follows:

> "It would be superfluous to cite authorities to show that the granting or refusing of a preliminary injunction is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence regarding an issue which may affect the discretion of the court in passing upon the application for such injunction, the order made will not, on appeal, be overthrown merely because there may be considerable, or even preponderating evidence which, if believed, would have led to a contrary conclusion. The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate right in controversy. It merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending the trial on the merits, the defendant should or that he should not be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him."

All the authorities having to do with the granting or refusal of an injunction pendente lite are to the same effect, and do not require citation.

From the fact that the defendants in this case are not shown to be insolvent, and from the further fact that there is nothing in the record from which this court could come to a conclusion that the trial court abused its discretion and was erroneous in its conclusion that the damages, if any, which the plaintiff might incur pending the trial of this action would be negligible, would be only monetary and capable of ascertainment, it is apparent that the order of the trial court herein should be, and the same is, hereby affirmed.

YOCUM v. TAYLOR. (Civ. 3444.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑330—Vendor can recover loss of crop caused by purchaser's delayed notice.

Where the purchaser unreasonably delayed giving notice of her intention not to perform during the time when the vendor could have planted a crop, the vendor is entitled to recover as special damages the profit he would have realized from the crop.

2. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Evidence not brought up presumed to support findings.

Where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, so that the evidence is not brought up, it is presumed that it was sufficient to support the decision.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑330—Special damages caused by purchaser's breach may be recovered.

Civ. Code, § 3307, allowing recovery of specified items of damage by way of general damages for breach of contract for the sale of land, does not prevent recovery of other items of damage properly pleaded and proved as special damages.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑330—Vendor held not entitled to recover ditch assessment paid.

In an action for the purchaser's breach of contract for the sale of land, the vendor cannot recover as special damages the amount of an irrigation ditch tax paid by him, though he did not get the benefit of the water for which the tax was paid, where he was liable for the tax whether he used the water or not, and there was no evidence he could have made a profit by using the water.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by J. W. Yocum against Helen F. Taylor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Luther G. Brown, E. H. Heizman, and Wilbur D. Finch, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles (Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for recovery of money as damages. It is presented on the judgment roll alone.

The action grew out of a transaction had between plaintiff and defendant whereby the defendant contracted to purchase certain real property belonging to the plaintiff. An agreement to effect such sale was duly made, but defendant defaulted in the performance of the conditions required of her as to the payment of the purchase price, and plaintiff then brought this action for damages. In the complaint facts were first alleged showing that damage had been suffered which would fall within the measure established by section 3307 of the Civil Code. It was particularly alleged, further, that certain special damages have been sustained. At the trial, as the findings disclose, all claim to the general damages was waived, and the court found that special damages had been sustained as to two matters: First, that plaintiff had been compelled to pay a ditch tax incident to the ownership of the land "without using said irrigation ditch," and that, because plaintiff had been unable to plant a crop of barley until the growing season had advanced too far, further damage had been suffered in the amount of $1,782.

[1] These special damages were alleged and found to have occurred because of the fact that under the contract the defendant was given a reasonable time after October 18, 1918, within which to perform her part of the contract, and that she did not notify plaintiff until after the 1st of December, 1918, of her determination not to so perform. It was the running of this time, as alleged, which prevented plaintiff from planting the crops on the land during the month of October, which, if they had been so planted, would have produced to plaintiff a net income in the amount last above stated.

[2] We have no doubt that the law permits the recovery of the latter item of damages, and, under the familiar rule, where the evidence is not brought up, we must assume that there was ample evidence to sustain the decision as made by the court.

[3] We cannot agree with appellant's counsel in the argument that no damages other than those which fall within the measure provided by section 3307, Civil Code, may be recovered. The damages therein specified are general damages which are recoverable under general allegations of damage. There may be special damages also, such as are the natural consequence of the detrimental acts complained of, and these may always be recovered under proper pleadings and evidence. Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 103, 87 Am. Dec. 107; Morris v. Allen, 17 Cal. App. 684, 121 Pac. 690; Moore v. Fredericks, 24 Cal. App. 536, 141 Pac. 1049. These cases announce the general rule as we have stated it. That such special damages are not speculative and too remote to be susceptible of legal proof is now well settled.

[4] As to the first item of damages, to wit, that referring to the tax paid on the irrigation ditch, we fail to find sufficient in the findings to sustain the judgment for the recovery of that amount. By the findings it appears that the ditch charge was collectable whether the water was used or not, and there are no facts found which show how or in what manner plaintiff would have derived a profit had he been able to use the ditch.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $118. As so modified the judgment is affirmed; the respective parties to bear their own costs.

ROSEN v. DAWSON et al. (Civ. 3302.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 31, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹931(8)—Presumption in view of findings that variation in size of windows manufactured was negligible.

In an action for the value of materials used in manufacturing and installing windows and sashes, despite findings that the windows were in part larger than provided in the written contract, in view of a further finding that they were and are workmanlike and pursuant to and in conformity with the specifications and contract between the parties, it will be presumed that the variation in size was negligible, and that the articles as manufactured were in substantial compliance with the contract.

2. Contracts ⟹332(4)—Plaintiff held not required to allege work was done to satisfaction of defendant.

Where plaintiff, suing for manufacturing and installing windows and sashes, alleged performance of all conditions demanded by the specifications affecting the work up to the point where he was stopped, it was not necessary that he further allege that the work was done to the satisfaction of the architect and owner of the building, as one term of his contract provided.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by J. Rosen, doing business as the J. Rosen Cornice Works, against John B. Dawson and Lyman Farwell. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. Allen, of Los Angeles, for appellants.
E. V. Rosenkranz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendants have appealed from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff. The action was to recover the value of materials used and a profit which would have accrued to plaintiff had he been permitted to complete performance under a contract made with defendants whereunder plaintiff was to construct and install certain windows and metal sash. The findings were in favor of plaintiff upon all issues tendered by his complaint. Defendants in their answer, among other matters of denial, asserted that the windows and sash were not as contracted for. It is their claim that the findings of the court sustain their contention as to this issue, and that the judgment, therefore, is not supported by the facts found. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll alone, under which we must assume that there was ample evidence to warrant the findings as made. The finding involved in the particular contention of appellants is as follows:

> "(5) That said windows in part were larger in size than provided in said contract; that said change was made at the request of defendants; that said labor and material furnished and said windows and casements were and are workmanlike and pursuant to, and in conformity with, the details, specifications, agreements, and contract between plaintiff and defendants."

[1] When counsel for appellants argues that the findings show such a change of the contractual terms as to make a new contract which would be void unless expressed in writing, he leaves out of account the settled rule as to the presumptions which attend a trial court's findings where the evidence is not brought up. Notwithstanding that the findings are that the windows were in part larger than provided in the contract, in view of the further finding that they "were and are workmanlike and pursuant to, and in conformity with, the details, specifications, agreements, and contract between plaintiff and defendants," it will be presumed that the variation in the size was negligible, and that the articles as manufactured were in substantial compliance with the contract.

[2] Plaintiff alleged in his complaint, and the court found, that he was prevented from fully performing his contract by reason of notification being given him by defendants to cease work thereunder, and that he did so cease work after communicating his protest to defendants. He alleged performance of all conditions demanded by the specifications affecting the work, up to the point where he was stopped. Under such a state of facts it was not necessary that he further allege that the work was done to the satisfaction of the architect and owner, as one term of the contract provided.

The judgment is affirmed.

GUGLIEMETTI et ux. v. GRAHAM et al. (Civ. 3321.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 3, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 31, 1921.)

1. Insurance 🔑156(1)—Under contract of insurance of automobile stage line, insurer was proper party to damage action.

A contract, insuring a company operating an automobile stage line, construed as creating a primary liability against the insurer in favor of persons whose property was injured or damaged, and not a mere contract indemnifying owner from loss paid, so that insurer was a proper party to damage action against driver.

2. Compromise and settlement 🔑23(3)—Evidence held not to show damages for killing cattle had been settled prior to action.

In an action for loss of cows killed by an automobile stage, evidence, including that of plaintiff's payment for injuries to the automobile made in ignorance of his rights, held not to show that plaintiff's claim had been fully adjusted and settled prior to action.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by T. Gugliemetti and wife against Charles H. Graham and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. K. Stickney and H. W. Scheld, both of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment entered against them. The action was for damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiffs by reason of the killing of two cows. The cows were struck by an automobile stage driven by defendant Graham and owned by the United Stages. The defendant Western Indemnity Company is sued because of its alleged liability on an undertaking given. The undertaking mentioned was one general in form and that commonly in use, and made for the purpose of insuring automobile carriers against loss by reason of damage caused by the operation of their vehicles.

[1] The principal point argued by the appellant is that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant, particularly that the surety company by its undertaking only agreed to respond after judgment against the insured; in other words, that the contract was one of insurance against loss, and not one to indemnify against liability. It is true that the contract of insurance, in so far as its terms directly fix the liability of the insurer toward the insured, does bear the general character of a contract of insurance against loss, rather than one to indemnify against liability. However, there are two clauses in the contract which further extend the obligations of the insurer. It provided, in part, that—

> "* * * This policy otherwise to all its warranties, terms, conditions and provisions not conflicting herewith, is hereby extended to indemnify the assured against loss arising from the liability imposed by law for damage on account of injury to or destruction of property of any or every description (property of the assured or property of others while in charge of the assured or the assured's employees excepted) resulting from any accident due to the ownership, maintenance or use of any automobile enumerated and described herein. * * * This policy will inure to and be the benefit and protection of any one who shall sustain any damage or injury, or to the heirs, personal representatives, administrators, executors or assigns of any such person who may be so damaged or injured or suffer death by reason of negligence or misconduct on the part of the driver or operator of the automobile. * * *"

The latter clause, we think, is plainly intended to create a primary liability against the insurer in favor of persons injured or damaged. While the general terms of the contract are as we have characterized them, to wit, a contract to indemnify the insured against loss, the term last quoted imports a condition and agreement that, so far as other persons are concerned, the obligations of the policy are available where such persons have sustained "damage or injury." Necessarily, then, a cause of action would arise whenever the damage accrued, regardless of whether action had been brought against the insured to enforce collection of the same. That the surety company may be joined as defendant in an action to recover damages where the policy is conditioned similarly to that involved here is held in Milliron v. Dittman et al., 180 Cal. 443, 181 Pac. 779. For the reasons stated, no error was committed by the court in overruling the demurrer of defendants and denying their motion for judgment of nonsuit.

[2] Further contention is made that the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court, in that the evidence shows that the claim of plaintiffs was fully adjusted and settled with the defendant United Stages prior to the commencement of this action. We think the evidence does support the findings of the court. It appears that immediately after the cows of the plaintiffs were killed, plaintiffs were called to the office of the stage company, and there defendant Graham insisted that they should pay him for the damage done to the automobile when it collided with the cows. By the testimony of plaintiff T. Gugliemetti it appears that he protested against making any payment, and insisted that he was damaged through the act of Graham, and that his cows were worth $300 each. He testified that Graham threatened to have him arrested unless he paid for the damage done to the machine; that Graham said, "I will sue you; I will have you arrested;" and that plaintiff replied:

> "All right. You will have me arrested, and I will pay you for the fixing of the machine, and you will pay for the cows. 'Well,' he says, 'I got nothing, I got $10,000 insurance on that machine,' he says, 'and the indemnity company,' he says, 'is good for it.'"

The upshot of the matter was that the plaintiffs paid to Graham $162.50 in settlement of the bill for damage to the machine and immediately brought this action to recover the value of the cows. It is easily inferable from the testimony of this plaintiff that he was ignorant as to whether there was any reciprocal liability, and that when he paid to Graham the money he did so without any intention or understanding that he was waiving his right to claim damages for the loss of the cows. The cows were killed through the negligence of the defendant stage company and its driver. Of course, Graham possessed no claim against the plaintiffs capable of enforcement, and collection of the money from the plaintiffs by Graham was without legal right. The evidence as to the payment of this money by the plaintiffs to Graham could have no effect except as a circumstance tending to show an admission of neglect on the part of the plaintiffs in permitting the cows to get in the way of the automobile. However, the court has determined that there was no negligence in that regard imputable to the plaintiffs, and that finding, in view of the evidence presented must be taken as conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Judgment 🔑94—Clerk could not enter judgment on default in action to set aside judgment of justice court.

In an action in the superior court to set aside a judgment of a justice court and to restrain its enforcement, not being one arising on contract for the recovery of money or damages only, clerk was without power to enter any judgment on defendant's default, but plaintiff should have applied to the court for the relief demanded.

2. Army and navy 🔑34—Moratorium Act did not divest justice court of jurisdiction in unlawful detainer.

Justices' courts are courts of the state and find life and power in the acts of the Legislature, and the Moratorium Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss) did not divest such courts of jurisdiction of actions in unlawful detainer where the premises were occupied by dependents of soldiers or sailors in military service.

3. Army and navy 🔑34—Moratorium Act does not change jurisdiction of any court.

The Moratorium Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss) relating to unlawful detainer where premises were occupied by dependents of soldiers or sailors, does not change the jurisdiction of any court which is created under state authority; the provisions of the act being made applicable to all courts of competent jurisdiction, whether created by Congress or the various states.

4. Army and navy 🔑34—Soldier or sailor not entitled in equitable action to have judgment in justice court set aside.

Defendant in unlawful detainer against dependents of soldiers or sailors in military service had no right to an equitable action to set aside a justice's judgment in favor of plaintiff which was valid on its face, where no appeal was taken, notwithstanding the Moratorium Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss).

An appeal will lie from a void judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Daniel Riordan against E. R. Zube and Benjamin C. Strang, Justice of the Peace. From orders setting aside a default of the defendants and sustaining defendants' demurrers without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Daniel Riordan, of Pasadena, in pro. per.
Wilton W. Webster and Leonard L. Riccardi, both of Pasadena, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff and appellant commenced an action in the superior court to set aside a judgment of the justice's court and to restrain its enforcement. He named as defendants the justice of the peace who had tried the case in the justice's court and the plaintiff in that action. Their demurrers to plaintiff's complaint were sustained. Plaintiff was given ten days to amend and the defendants were given five days thereafter to plead to the amended complaint. Within due time plaintiff filed his amended complaint. The defendants failed to plead within the five days allowed, and upon application of the plaintiff the clerk of the court entered their default. Within three days thereafter the defendants moved to set aside the default upon a showing of inadvertence and misconception of the order, and after a full hearing the court granted the motion. Thereafter defendants' demurrers to the amended complaint were sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiff appeals from these two orders, the one setting aside the default of the defendants and the other sustaining defendants' demurrers without leave to amend.

[1] Neither order is appealable. The record does not disclose that any judgment was entered either for the plaintiff following the default or for the defendants following the order sustaining their demurrers. It is argued by appellant in his brief that, following the entry of the default, the clerk entered judgment in his favor. But, even if this were so, the judgment would have been a nullity, because, the action not being one arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, the clerk was without power to enter any judgment, but plaintiff should have applied to the court for the relief demanded.

[2, 3] However, on the merits of the appeal, the order of the trial court sustaining the demurrers without leave to amend was clearly proper, because the complaint failed to state a cause of action and could not have been amended to present one. The relief was sought from the judgment of the justice's court upon the grounds that it was void on its face because the act of Congress of March 8, 1918, commonly known as the "Moratorium Act" (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss), had divested the justice's court of jurisdiction of actions in unlawful detainer where the premises were occupied by dependents of soldiers or sailors in military service. The plain answer to this proposition is that the jurisdiction of the justice's court of this state is found in the laws of the state, and not in the acts of the Congress. Though not mentioned in the Constitution as such, the justices' courts are courts of the state of uniform, though limited, jurisdiction. They find their life and power in the acts of the Legislature, which the Constitution expressly authorizes the Legislature to enact. The argument of appellant seems to be that, as the Moratorium Act prohibited the eviction of such dependents except upon leave of court, and that as the term "court" as used in that act was therein defined to include "any court of competent jurisdiction of the United States, or of any state, whether or not a court of record," the application should have been made to a superior court, because justices' courts are not included in the enumeration of state courts in the state Constitution. But the Moratorium Act does not pretend to change the jurisdiction of any court which is created under state authority. The provisions of that act are made applicable to all courts of competent jurisdiction, whether created by the Congress or the various states.

[4] The justice's court, therefore, had jurisdiction to render the judgment, and it was not void upon its face. The execution was stayed for three months, which was the maximum period of leniency authorized by the Moratorium Act. Section 300, subd. 2. Appellant was thus given the full protection of the law. The justice's court having had jurisdiction of both the person and subject-matter of the action, its judgment was valid upon its face. Defendant in that case having been given all the protection provided by the Moratorium Act, he had no cause in equity to prevent the execution of that judgment. On the other hand, if aggrieved by the judgment in the justice's court, the statute gave him an adequate remedy by appeal to the superior court. His failure to pursue that remedy does not warrant an equitable action to set aside the judgment, which is valid on its face.

For the reasons first given, the appeal from both orders is dismissed.

It should be added that the record does not show that any judgment was ever entered in the action, and further that an appeal will lie from a void judgment. See Ewing v. Work and labor ⚷24(1)—Proof of work done under express contract precludes recovery on quantum meruit.

In an action for the reasonable value of work done, proof that a part of the work was done under an express contract for an agreed sum precludes recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by David M. Ward, doing business as the Ward Iron Works, against Willard H. Stimson and Charles Willard Stimson, copartners, doing business as Willard H. Stimson & Son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry C. Levey and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover the reasonable value of materials furnished and labor performed by plaintiff at the special instance and request of defendants in repairing a steam boiler.

Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendants have appealed.

It appears without contradiction that, the boiler being in bad condition, defendants, upon an express contract, employed plaintiff to repair the same, at an agreed price of $124.50. The repairs called for the welding upon the boiler of what is termed a lip, some 4½ or 5 feet in length. Plaintiff himself testified that, while he did not recommend or guarantee that such repairs would prove successful, nevertheless, as done, it would have answered the purpose for which the welding was intended, if the state had allowed it. He says, "I did the work all right, but the authorities would not let it go;" that is, after the work was completed as ordered by defendants, the boiler inspector would not accept it. Thereupon plaintiff, in the absence of an express contract, and as ordered by defendants, furnished materials and did other work in repairing the boiler, for all of which, including the welding of the lip covered by the express contract, he sued herein to recover upon a quantum meruit.

In defense of the action, the answer alleged: First, the making of the express contract and that the work was done thereunder; and, second, that not only the work so called for, but all work done by plaintiff, was faulty, imperfect, and improperly done and performed.

As we view the case, it is unnecessary to consider the second defense pleaded, since the judgment must be reversed on account of insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that, while the work done under the express contract, "was in progress and before the completion thereof by plaintiff, said defendants ordered plaintiff not to complete said work in accordance with said agreement, but ordered plaintiff to do different and other work in welding a patch in said boiler in place of extending and reinforcing the lip thereof, and that said work was done in said manner upon the order of said defendants through their said agent and engineer, and not upon the advice or recommendation of said plaintiff, and that plaintiff did not warrant or guarantee said work in any manner." That part of the finding to the effect that the contract was rescinded before its completion has no support in the evidence; on the contrary, as stated, the testimony of plaintiff himself shows that he performed all of the repair work called for by the express contract, for which he was to receive the sum of $124.50, which was the measure of his right to recover therefor. Except as to work performed other than that designated in the contract and for which there was no special arrangement, he was not, under the evidence, entitled to recover the reasonable value thereof. Since the proofs made show that a part of the work was done under a special contract, which fixed the price to be paid therefor, it necessarily fails to support the allegations on the complaint upon quantum meruit for the work done as a whole. In other words, as so often said, the probata and allegata do not correspond. O'Connor v. Dingley, 26 Cal. 11; Roche v. Baldwin, 135 Cal. 522, 65 Pac. 459, 67 Pac. 903, and cases therein cited.

Clearly, under the evidence offered, plaintiff's right to recover for the work which he fully performed under the special contract, should be limited to the amount specified therein. The judgment in effect grants him a recovery for the reasonable value thereof, which may be greatly in excess of the price at which he agreed to do the work.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss other alleged errors pertaining to the character of the work and rulings of the court in admitting testimony.

The judgment is reversed.

Insurance 🔑159—Vessel held lost outside of territory covered by policy.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1638, 1639, requiring interpretation of contracts to be governed by their plain language, a policy insuring a vessel against fire loss "while operated * * * north of" a certain island held not to cover the vessel's loss by fire while at a cove in the island near the southerly end of its east shore; for evidence of custom of fishermen in the neighborhood to pack their fish at such cove did not show that defendant insurer ever construed the phrase "north of" the island as inclusive of the cove, or that settlements of loss had been made on that basis.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover on a policy insuring property against loss by fire. Judgment in favor of the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The policy insured plaintiff's boat against loss by fire "while operated in the Pacific Ocean south of Monterey Bay on the north, east of 123 degrees west, and north of San Martin Island on the south." The fire and loss occurred at Hassler's cove, which is located on the east shore of San Martin Island and near the southerly end of that shore. Evidence was introduced to show that Hassler's cove is the only anchorage west of the coast available for the use of fishermen in packing their catch, and that it was the custom of fishermen in the vicinity of San Martin Island to anchor in that cove for that purpose; that about 15 of the boats belonging to members of defendant association (of whom the plaintiff was one) made a practice of fishing in the vicinity of that island, and all of them used Hassler's cove for the purpose of packing their fish.

Basing their argument upon these facts, counsel for appellant seek to establish respondent's liability by the application of two principles: First, that policies of insurance are to be liberally construed in favor of the assured; second, that a policy of insurance must be construed with relation to those established usages and customs with reference to which the insurance has been issued and which are known to the insurer. Giving full recognition to these principles, and without discussion of the interesting decisions referred to in the briefs, nevertheless we think that they furnish no ground for reversal of the judgment in this case.

"The language of a contract is to govern its interpretation, if the language is clear and explicit, and does not involve an absurdity." Civ. Code, § 1638.

"When a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible; subject, however, to the other provisions of this title." Civ. Code, § 1639.

The "other provisions," however, are not applicable to clear and explicit terms of a contract freely entered into without any attendant circumstances of fraud, mistake, or accident. The evidence to the effect that fishermen in the described neighborhood were accustomed to pack their fish at Hassler's cove is not evidence connected in any way with this contract of insurance. No attempt was made to show a custom that for the purposes of insurance, or for any purpose, defendant association or any of its members have ever construed the phrase "north of San Martin Island" as inclusive of Hassler's cove, or that settlements of loss have been made on that basis. The plain fact is that the destruction of the vessel did not occur north of that island, and the conclusion necessarily follows that the loss was not covered by the policy.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCLENAHAN v. HOWARD. (Civ. 3101.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1920.)

1. Insane persons 🔑98—Evidence held to sustain finding alienist's services were not requested by incompetent.

Evidence that the only services rendered by an alienist consisted in examining the alleged insane person at the request of the one who had instituted the insanity proceedings held to sustain the trial court's findings that plaintiff's services were not rendered at the request of the incompetent.

2. Insane persons 🔑7—Insanity proceedings are adversary in nature.

Proceedings to have a person adjudged insane and incompetent are adversary in their nature.

3. Insane persons 🔑98 — Person rendering services to incompetent without request must prove benefit.

An alienist who examined an incompetent person and testified to her incompetency without her request, but at the request of the person instituting the proceedings against her, must prove that his services were necessary and beneficial to her, to recover the reasonable value thereof from her estate; there being no presumption that such services were either necessary or beneficial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by H. C. McClenahan against Frances S. Howard, an incompetent person. Judgment for plaintiff for only a small portion of the amount claimed, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel M. Shortridge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. Plaintiff sought by this action to recover a sum slightly in excess of $1,800 for professional services rendered by him as an alienist, to and for the defendant, and at her request. The trial judge found that on January 8, 1915, the plaintiff rendered medical services to the defendant of the reasonable value of $45 at a time when she was unconscious and in need of medical attention. The court found also that at other times between January 8 and April 21, 1915, plaintiff rendered professional services as an expert alienist in examining and diagnosing her mental condition, for the purpose of advising her relatives of such condition, and for the further purpose of testifying as an expert witness in certain proceedings which were pending and which involved the question of her sanity and her mental competence.

The court further found that such services were not rendered at her instance or request or for her use and benefit, and were not necessary for her health, but that they were rendered at the instance and request of her relatives, and for their use and benefit. A judgment was awarded to the plaintiff for the sum of $45 only, and the plaintiff here assails the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, in denying him any further relief.

It appears from the record in the case that on January 6, 1915, the defendant's brother met with a fatal injury; and on the following day she created some kind of disturbance at his bedside at a private sanatorium in San Francisco which resulted in her arrest upon a charge of insanity made by Mr. Morris, who was the attorney for her brother and certain members of the family. After being taken to the detention hospital, with the approval of the judge and her friends she was removed to a sanatorium devoted chiefly to the treatment of alcoholic cases. In some manner she there obtained and imbibed a large quantity of whisky, and early on the morning of January 8th the doctor in charge informed appellant over the telephone that one of the patients had drunk a large quantity of whisky and was in a precarious condition. Plaintiff went to the sanatorium immediately and there remained, rendering assistance until nearly noon, and until the defendant was out of danger. It is for these services that the trial court awarded plaintiff the sum of $45, and no objection is here made to such allowance.

[1] Upon his return to the office of the sanatorium, plaintiff met a Mr. Rixford, who said that he was the personal attorney of Miss Howard (the defendant), and who informed plaintiff that her mother was ill; that he had inquired around for some one to look into the case; that he did not know what to do or what his rights were in the matter; that he had to make some investigations; and that his cousin or some relative told him that plaintiff could look into the case and should do so. In the afternoon, at the suggestion of plaintiff, there was a family gathering held at his office in order to get information and history of defendant's case to make the investigation as to her mental status. The attorney who made the insanity charge was present also. For the time consumed in this consultation plaintiff makes a charge of $40. From thence on for a period covering 68 different days, the plaintiff rendered services either by observation of the patient, consultation with her relatives and friends, or in attendance upon the court, which attendance and detention occupied his time for parts of 3 days.

Some 10 days or 2 weeks after defendant's arrest upon the insanity charge, her mother arrived from the East and commenced proceedings to have defendant adjudged an incompetent. The petition was dismissed by the superior court without prejudice on October 13, 1915, after a contested hearing. During all this time defendant was practically in custody under the charge of insanity, but shortly afterward, at a time not disclosed, that charge was dismissed. In the following year, on January 28, 1916, a new proceeding was brought, which resulted in the appointment of a guardian for both the person and estate of Miss Howard. This proceeding was not contested, and the plaintiff was not a witness upon the hearing.

While at the sanatorium defendant was under the care of two physicians. Within a few days she was removed to the sanatorium of her own physician, Dr. Ward. Afterward she was taken to San Mateo, where she was attended by two other physicians. Plaintiff never acted as her physician at any time. He never prescribed for her. He did not treat her. The only examinations he made were by way of observation. He refused to consult with the attorneys for Miss Howard. He declined to report the result of his opinion or tell them anything, unless Mr. Morris, who made the insanity charge, instructed him so to do. He was a witness and gave testimony against Miss Howard in the insanity charge and the contested guardianship proceedings, and was called by the attorneys acting against her.

The only circumstances referred to as indicating that plaintiff was acting at the request of defendant are: That it does not appear that she objected to the rendering of his services, and that once just after she went to San Mateo, at her request over the telephone, he took lunch with her, her sister, brother-in-law and two uncles. There is nothing, however, to indicate that she had knowledge while thus in custody under a warrant of insanity that any services were being rendered for her benefit.

Under all the circumstances mentioned, the finding that the services were not rendered at the request of defendant, but were rendered at the request of her relatives, is not without support in the evidence.

[2] It is urged that the proceedings taken against defendant were not adversary in their nature, and also were in fact beneficial to her. As to the first proposition the authorities are to the contrary. Evans v. Johnson, 39 W. Va. 299, 19 S. E. 623, 23 L. R. A. 737, 45 Am. St. Rep. 912; Berry v. Berry, 147 Ind. 176, 46 N. E. 470; Karnes v. Johnston, 58 W. Va. 595, 52 S. E. 658; Jones v. Learned, 17 Colo. App. 76, 66 Pac. 1071; In re Welch, 108 Wis. 387, 84 N. W. 550.

[3] As to the second proposition, in the absence of evidence that the services were rendered at defendant's request, it devolved upon plaintiff to prove that they were beneficial to her. Cases cited by respondent in which the estates of minors, idiots, insane, and persons bereft of reason by the sudden stroke of accident or sickness are held liable for necessaries furnished in good faith while in that condition have no application here, for in those cases a recovery is permitted upon the theory that the services were necessary or beneficial. It was upon such theory that the trial judge awarded respondent the reasonable value for such services as he performed while Miss Howard was unconscious. We know of no presumption that services rendered in observation and consultation by an expert alienist to determine the mental condition of a person are either necessary or beneficial to such person.

An examination of the entire record fails to indicate that, other than the time when Miss Howard was unconscious, she ever received any medication or any advice for her physical or mental welfare or improvement, or for the palliation of any of her infirmities; likewise is the record silent as to any benefit to her property because of any act or suggestion of plaintiff, either in his investigation to ascertain her mental condition, or after his acquirement of the knowledge that she was suffering from precocious dementia and a deteriorated mental state.

If the services were not rendered at the request of Miss Howard and were of no benefit to her, the challenged finding "that they were for the use and benefit of her relatives" was immaterial, and not prejudicial to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEARDON v. MARKLEY. (Civ. 2154.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44—In action for rescission, defendant's representations will be presumed made in good faith.

In an action to rescind sale of land for mistake and failure of consideration, under Civ. Code, § 1689, in the absence of an express averment that defendant's representation that a certain spring was on the land was made in good faith, it will be presumed so made, as dishonesty would not be imputed.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑123—Facts held to show a cause of action for rescission for mistake and failure of consideration.

A complaint showing that plaintiff purchased from defendant a stock ranch, that defendant represented that a valuable spring shown plaintiff was on the ranch and that plaintiff relied on the representation and would not otherwise have purchased, that shortly after the sale plaintiff ascertained that the spring was not on the ranch, and that, the place not being adapted to plaintiff's use, he proceeded to rescind, held to state sufficient facts to justify the court granting a rescission.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(2)—Purchaser could rely upon vendor's representations as to spring being on his land.

A vendor is presumed to know the extent of his property, and purchaser could rely on his representations as to the lands including a spring pointed out on the ground, where purchaser's attention was not directed to any fact or circumstance inconsistent with the representation, and it is no excuse in rescission action that purchaser by independent investigation might have ascertained the facts before purchase.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44—Evidence held to show that alleged untrue representations were made by vendor.

In purchaser's action for rescission on the ground of mistake and failure of consideration, in that vendor's representation that a certain spring was on the land was not true, evidence held to show that such representations were in fact made by the defendant to plaintiff.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑116—Vendor held to have waived formal tender by purchaser seeking to rescind.

Where purchaser sought to rescind an objection that the purchaser's tender in offering to give the deed back was not formal enough was waived by appellant vendor's failure to specify it at the time, in view of Civ. Code, § 1501, relating to offers of performance.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑116—Failure to make formal tender on rescission immaterial, where it would not have been accepted.

Where the record shows that appellant would not have accepted any tender from respondent on rescission, however complete, appellant was not prejudiced if respondent plaintiff should have proffered a deed to the property.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—Finding held not reversible error, where not needed to support judgment.

A finding of fact, objected to as outside of any issue tendered, may be ignored on appeal, where the judgment was sufficiently supported without it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by James Peardon against Henry C. Markley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for rescission on the ground of mistake and failure of consideration, and plaintiff prevailed in the court below.

After alleging that plaintiff desired to purchase a tract of land for grazing purposes, and entered into negotiations with defendant to buy 160 acres—describing it—the complaint proceeds:

> "And thereupon at defendant's request plaintiff went to the vicinity of said land, and defendant pointed out to plaintiff a tract of land adjoining said land above described, upon which there was and is a spring of living water flowing each and every year not less than five inches measured under a four-inch pressure during the dry season of each and every year, and defendant then and there positively stated to plaintiff that said land so pointed out, containing said spring aforesaid, was the land above described and was the land then owned by defendant. Plaintiff had no means of knowing the location of defendant's said lands, other than said information imparted to him by defendant as aforesaid. And thereafter, on the 9th day of July, 1917, and relying entirely upon said statement made by defendant as aforesaid, and solely because thereof, plaintiff did purchase said lands and premises above described from defendant, and did receive the deed therefor, and did then and there on said date last named pay to defendant for said lands and premises the sum of $1,600, fully believing that the said lands and premises pointed out to plaintiff as aforesaid contained said spring of living water.
> "Said lands were purchased by plaintiff solely for grazing purposes and without living water thereon plaintiff would not have purchased said lands. After the purchase of said lands plaintiff continued to believe they were the identical lands pointed out to him as aforesaid, and continued in such belief until on or about the 12th of January, 1918, when * * * for the first time he learned that the lands and premises pointed out to him by defendant as aforesaid were not the lands above described, and were not the lands which he believed he purchased at the time of the execution of said deed aforesaid, but were lands adjoining the same; and he then and there learned that the lands hereinbefore mentioned and which were described in and granted by said deed aforesaid, did not and do not contain any spring or any living water at all, and as a matter of fact during the dry season of each and every year said lands above described are entirely dry, devoid of living water, and entirely unfit for grazing or any other useful purposes and of no value to plaintiff, and of very little, if any value at all."

Then follows an allegation that after said discovery plaintiff offered to retransfer the property to defendant and demanded a return of the $1,600 paid as aforesaid.

[1, 2] A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed and overruled. It was submitted without argument. Probably appellant had little faith in his position, or he would have tried to convince the court that there was merit in the demurrer. He has apparently acquired more confidence, as he makes in this court elaborate contention that the complaint does not state a cause of action. His attack, however, is based upon the hypothesis that plaintiff sought relief on the ground of fraud, and the burden of appellant's criticism is that the complaint is fatally defective, because there is no allegation that the representation was made with knowledge that it was false or that there was an intent to deceive. No doubt, appellant is right in his theory of the material averments of a complaint to set aside a transaction for the reason that it has been induced by fraud. But respondent bases his action upon the ground of mistake and failure of consideration. It is really an action under section 1689 of the Civil Code for rescission, providing that—

> "A party to a contract may rescind the same. * * * 1. If the consent of the party rescinding * * * was given by mistake. * * * 2. If, through the fault of the party as to whom he rescinds, the consideration for his obligation fails, in whole or in part."

The allegations of the complaint are sufficient to show the existence of these two conditions. The pleading might have been more explicit as to the material mistake that was made. But, in the absence of an express averment that the representation as to the spring was made in good faith, such would be the presumption, as dishonesty would not be imputed to the defendant. That plaintiff was materially misled by the statement of defendant does very clearly appear, and that an important part of the consideration for the purchase was the transfer of the spring does not admit of doubt. The case made by the complaint is substantially this: Plaintiff negotiated with defendant for the purchase of a stock ranch; defendant represented that a certain valuable spring was a part of said ranch; plaintiff relied upon said representation, and would not have purchased the property without said spring; shortly after the sale plaintiff ascertained that defendant did not own the spring, and, the place not being adapted to his use without said water, he immediately proceeded to rescind the contract. Such facts ought to be sufficient to justify a court in granting relief and we have no doubt they are. Similar cases have been passed upon by the courts, and we may refer to two of these.

In Johnson v. Withers, 9 Cal. App. 52, 98 Pac. 42, it was held that a contract to sell and purchase mineral land may be rescinded by the purchaser and a deposit recovered back promptly upon the discovery of a material mistake of fact as to the quantity of mineral in place; the mistake having arisen from a wrong calculation of an expert. The court said:

> "Plaintiffs dealt with defendants upon the truth of this statement and it was incorrect. It was the one estimate of quantity, the one concrete fact, upon which they relied in making the purchase. It was such a mutual mistake as courts of equity will relieve from."

In Taber v. Piedmont Heights Bldg. Co., 25 Cal. App. 222, 143 Pac. 319, the intending purchasers visited certain premises with the vendor's agent and indicated to the latter the particular parcel they would buy and also the land they did not desire to purchase, and upon his mistaken statement that the property they desired was lot No. 35, they purchased the lot bearing that number, when as a matter of fact it included a portion of the land which they had rejected. It was held that the purchasers were entitled to rescind upon the ground of mistake.

[3] It is also true that the vendee had a right to rely upon the representations of the vendor. The latter was presumed to know the extent of his property, and the former was not required to make further inquiry at his peril. Of course, if it had been apparent that the spring was not included within the boundaries of the proposed purchase, the folly of the vendee in rejecting the testimony of his own senses would prevent relief; but such is not this case. His intention was not directed to any fact or circumstance inconsistent with the representations of the vendor. It is no excuse that the vendee by an independent investigation might have ascertained that the spring did not belong to the vendor and that it was not included in the deed of conveyance.

In Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 Pac. 96, the land was described by metes and bounds in the contract of purchase and it was stated that it contained "about 40 acres more or less." It was afterward discovered that there were but twenty-three and a half acres. This discrepancy led to a suit, and, on considering a similar question to the one before us, the Supreme Court said:

> "It is next insisted that the defendant saw the land and inspected it before making the contract, and having every opportunity to learn of the quantity of the land, he had no right to take the word of plaintiffs on the question of quantity; in other words, that the rule of caveat emptor applies to the case. This contention is not well founded; the defendant had a right to rely on plaintiffs' representation as to the quantity of land. The acreage of land is a thing that cannot be seen with the eye at a glance, but can only be ascertained with accuracy by scientific measurement, and when a vendor states to the vendee the amount of land in the tract which is the subject of the sale, such vendor will not thereafter be heard to say in a court of equity, the vendee had no right to believe him."

The same principle is indorsed in the Taber opinion, supra, and by the authorities generally.

[4] Nor do we perceive any merit in the claim that the evidence is insufficient to show that said representations were made by defendant. Herein it is admitted that one J. W. Walker, a real estate agent, was authorized to represent the vendor in the sale, and it is sufficient, for the purpose in view, to quote the following testimony of plaintiff:

> "Q. Did Mr. Walker show you the land? A. Yes, sir; showed me the land. * * * Q. Did he show you anything on the land, any spring, anything of that kind? A. Yes; he showed me the spring. Q. What did he show you—what kind of spring? A. Spring flowed about three inches of water, stone wall around it, about a quarter of an acre right on top of the hill; they call it the high springs. Q. What did he say about that spring? A. After we got up there, * * * I took a drink out of it. I said, 'Are you sure of this land?' 'Oh, hell! yes; I know all about it, I sold this land for Boyer to Mr. Markley.' So he pointed out the fence, showed me all around the land. * * * Q. Never mind that now; at the time you were there, did he point out the spring; if you bought the land you would buy this spring? A. I says, 'Is this known as the Blair Ranch?' He says, 'This is the land you are buying right here where this spring is.' * * * Did you specially ask him if you were buying that spring? A. Where that spring was the land was the land I was buying. Q. That is what he told you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you believe it? A. I didn't doubt his word; he said he sold it before."

It may be added that it is not an unfair inference from Walker's testimony that such representation was made, although he manifestly was a witness rather hostile to plaintiff. Of course, he was naturally anxious to shield himself, and he appears to have been somewhat disingenuous; but a careful consideration of his whole testimony strengthens the conviction that he represented to plaintiff that the spring was a part of the property to be conveyed.

Another point is made as to the insufficiency of the evidence of rescission. In reference to this plaintiff testified:

"I told Mr. Markley I didn't get the land that Mr. Walker sold to me; I demanded my money back, and I would give the deed back; he said we would have to make a survey of it, and he kind of hunched away, didn't seem to want to talk on the proposition. I waited a little longer, a few days; thought maybe he would have a survey made; but I didn't see nothing of him coming around, so I started the suit."

[5] To the contention that the tender was not formal enough it is sufficient to say that such objection was waived by the failure of appellant to specify it at the time. Civ. Code, § 1501; Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 129 Pac. 804.

[6] Besides, it is entirely apparent from the record that appellant would have refused any tender, however complete. Appellant was not prejudiced, therefore, if we concede that respondent should have proffered a deed of the property. 38 Cyc. 134.

[7] Appellant contends that a certain finding numbered 5 is outside of any issue tendered by the complaint. It is, however, in response to an allegation made in a separate defense of the answer. Moreover, it is apparent that it is substantially in accord with the finding, based upon the allegation of the complaint as to the representation made by defendant in reference to said spring. Said finding is as follows:

"And on or about the 6th of July, 1917, said J. W. Walker, acting for defendant and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to purchase the lands in said deed hereinabove described, took plaintiff upon the lands hereinbefore described and also upon adjoining lands. Both defendant and his said agent, Walker, during all of said times were well acquainted with and knew the lands actually owned by defendant, being the lands hereinbefore described; but said Walker did not point out to plaintiff the boundaries of the same.

"Said agent, Walker, however, did take plaintiff over a portion of said lands, and did take plaintiff to the living spring hereinbefore referred to, and said agent, Walker, did then and there, while the plaintiff was at said spring, expressly state to plaintiff that said spring was on the land owned by defendant, namely, the lands in said deed and hereinbefore described, and which said lands defendant through his said agent was then and there endeavoring to sell to plaintiff; and said agent, Walker, then and there acting for defendant in making said sale, at the said time he stood with plaintiff beside said spring of living water, expressly stated to plaintiff that if he (plaintiff) would purchase the lands then being offered to him for sale, to wit, the lands hereinbefore and in said deed described, he (plaintiff) would also purchase and own said spring of living water, as the same was upon said lands."

Indeed, the criticized finding may be entirely ignored as immaterial; the judgment being sufficiently supported without it.

We have examined all the points and authorities of appellant, but we deem it unnecessary to notice them more specifically.

The judgment is affirmed.

GLASS v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⚷2—Statute concerning advertising as ground for revoking license held constitutional.

St. 1917, p. 111, § 14, subd. 3, providing that the board of medical examiners may revoke the license of a physician or surgeon advertising so as to deceive the public or impose upon credulous or ignorant persons, and be harmful or injurious to public morals or safety, is not unconstitutional in that it denies to citizens the equal protection of the law and is class legislation.

2. Statutes ⚷47—Statute permitting revocation of license held not void as uncertain.

State Medical Practice Act, § 14, subd. 3, defining as unprofessional conduct for which a license might be revoked, all advertising of medical business which is intended or has a tendency to deceive the public or impose on credulous or ignorant persons, and so be harmful and injurious to public morals or safety, is not so uncertain and indefinite that it is void and fails to confer any jurisdiction on the Board of Examiners to revoke a license on facts claimed to be in violation "of those indefinite, ambiguous and uncertain provisions" (St. 1917, p. 111).

California and P. T. Phillips and others, as members of said Board, to review an order revoking a certificate licensing the former to practice medicine. From a judgment affirming the order of the Board, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams, Paul Schenck, Richard Kittrelle, and Seymour S. Silverton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry A. Encell, Frank M. Smith, and Chas. D. Ballard, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Upon complaint before the Board of Medical Examiners against Thomas F. Glass, and after answer filed by him and a hearing before the Board, an order was made revoking the certificate of said Glass licensing him to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California. On petition by him, the superior court of the county of Los Angeles issued a writ of review of said proceedings and order. A full return having been made and the matter having been duly considered by that court, the order of the Board of Medical Examiners was affirmed. From the judgment so entered petitioner prosecutes this appeal.

The State Medical Practice Act provides for the revocation of a certificate to practice medicine and surgery whenever the holder of such certificate is guilty of unprofessional conduct as defined in said act. Section 14 of the act provides that—

> "The words 'unprofessional conduct' as used in this act, are hereby declared to mean: * * * Third. All advertising of medical business which is intended or has a tendency to deceive the public or impose upon credulous or ignorant persons, and so be harmful or injurious to public morals or safety." Stats. 1917, p. 111.

It appears that appellant's license was revoked by reason of acts constituting a violation of said subdivision 3.

[1, 2] The argument in support of this appeal is based upon two propositions only: (1) That subdivision 3 is unconstitutional for the reason that it denies to citizens the equal protection of the law and is class legislation; (2) that the language of the subdivision is so uncertain and indefinite that it is void and fails to confer any jurisdiction upon the Board of Examiners to revoke a license upon facts claimed to be in violation "of these indefinite, ambiguous and uncertain provisions." The first proposition is without merit. The law does not recognize the right of any person to do acts which are harmful or injurious to public morals or safety. So far as the penalty is concerned, it is made as broadly applicable as the subject-matter will permit; in fact, it includes the entire public to which it could possibly apply, since a certificate to practice medicine could not be taken away from a person who did not hold any such certificate.

The principal authority relied upon by appellant to sustain his contention that subdivision 3 is void because of uncertainty and indefiniteness is found in the case of Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750. The court there reviewed an order of the Board of Medical Examiners under the act relating to this subject which was in force at that time. It was provided in that act that "all advertising of medical business in which grossly improbable statements are made" should constitute unprofessional conduct. It was held that the provision was too indefinite to state an offense, and the order was annulled. The court said:

> "While, as we have said, the right of the Legislature to confer power upon a medical board to revoke the license of a physician is granted upon the authority of the Legislature to legislate in the interest of public health, safety, and morals, there is nothing in the terms of this provision authorizing the board to revoke a certificate to practice medicine on account of the publication of 'grossly improbable statements,' from which it can be even inferred that any of these considerations prompted the legislative mind in conferring the power of revocation upon the board, or that any of them are to be taken into consideration by that body in determining whether a given statement is 'grossly improbable' or not. Under this provision the penalty of forfeiture of a physician's license is not made to depend upon falsity in fact of any matter contained in a statement or knowledge on the part of the physician that it is false, or for the reason that it was intended or had a tendency to deceive the public or to impose upon credulous or ignorant persons, and so be harmful and injurious to public morals, health, and safety. It is a matter of no moment under the provision of the act, and is entirely immaterial whether the statement is true or false, beneficial or injurious."

A comparison of the foregoing language used by the Supreme Court with the words used in subdivision 3 of section 14 of the act now under consideration is sufficient to fairly test the whole matter. The legislation was evidently framed with the direct purpose and intention of stating a rule in conformity with the principles declared in the Hewitt Case. Under these provisions a certificate could not be revoked unless it was first determined by the Board that the advertising complained of was in fact false and was intended or had a tendency to deceive the public or impose upon credulous or ignorant persons, and so be harmful to public morals or safety. It would not be possible to frame a definition of unprofessional advertising which would anticipate in terms every form of advertisement which unscrupulous practitioners might thereafter devise. This being so, it cannot reasonably be held necessary to the validity of the statute that it go further than to state a reasonably definite rule under which all such specific acts might be included. This we think has been done in the terms of the statute so far as the same are now presented for consideration. Precisely the same words are found in the Medical Practice Act of the state of Washington. In State Board of Medical Examiners v. Macy, 92 Wash. 614, 159 Pac. 801, this provision was attacked upon the same grounds urged by appellant here. After an extensive review of decisions from various states, including Hewitt v. State Board of Medical Examiners, supra, the court held that this definition of unprofessional conduct in advertising is not void or unconstitutional for vagueness or uncertainty.

The judgment is affirmed.

VATCHER v. GRIER. (Civ. 3238.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 18, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑51(2) — Statute commences to run on installments when due.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, limitations started to run on each installment when it fell due under a contract whereby defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a specified percentage of installments for brokerage services rendered.

2. Brokers 🔑40—Contract held to create fund from which payment was to be made.

A contract providing that broker should be paid "eleven and one-ninth $(11^{1}/_{9})$ per cent. of each payment as payments are made" had the effect of creating a particular fund from which the broker should be satisfied, and broker had no cause of action for recovery of the agreed compensation in the absence of a showing that such payments were made, and that the fund thus became available.

3. Appeal and error 🔑917(1)—Assumed on appeal from judgment following demurrer that plaintiff had no further facts to allege.

Where, on sustaining demurrer to complaint, plaintiff made no request for leave to amend but chose to stand on his complaint as framed, it must be assumed on appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant that no further facts could have been alleged in aid of plaintiff's claim.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑46(2)—Statute held not to run against action for commission until purchaser made payments from which commission was payable.

Where, after plaintiff broker rendered services, defendant agreed to pay him a specific amount, to be paid out of payments made by the purchaser, a certain percentage thereof, limitations did not start to run against plaintiff until the respective payments on the purchase price were actually made.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by H. J. Vatcher, Junior, against S. W. Grier. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henning & McGee, of San Diego, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment entered after a demurrer to his complaint had been sustained without leave to amend.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff's assignors were employed by defendant to negotiate the sale of certain lands in San Diego county, and that as the result of their efforts the defendant executed certain escrow instructions to the Union Title & Trust Company of San Diego, which provided for the payment of $5,000 cash and $85,000 in installments, secured by a trust deed on the property. On the 19th day of October, 1912, the same day that the escrow was deposited, defendant agreed in writing to pay plaintiff's assignors for their services in effecting the sale the sum of $10,000, they in return to pay defendant the sum of $2,500 for the work done by him in negotiating the deal. By the terms of the written agreement such payments were to be made, "eleven and one-ninth $(11^{1}/_{9})$ per cent. of each payment as payments are made; one-fourth (¼) to be applied on the commission to be paid to the party of the first part [defendants], and three-fourths (¾) to be applied on the commission to be paid by the parties of the second part [plaintiff's assignors]." It further is alleged that, by the terms of the agreement, defendant promised to pay plaintiff's assignors $7,500, in seven installments, as the payments fell due under the trust deed mentioned in the escrow instructions, the last three payments so specified maturing April 19, 1914, October 19, 1914, and April 19, 1915, respectively. So far as the record shows, this action was commenced on May 1, 1918.

The demurrer was general and also on the ground that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure.

This is not the ordinary case of a broker's contract, where the right of recovery is dependent upon the performance of precedent conditions by the broker. The agreement here in question was made after the services had been completed, and is to be construed according to its terms.

[1, 2] We shall first consider the plea of the statute of limitations. The complaint attempts to allege an unqualified promise to pay $7,500 in seven installments, falling due at specified dates, five of which matured more than four years prior to the filing of the complaint. As to these five installments, aggregating $4,166.64, accepting plaintiff's construction of the contract, there can be no question that they would have been barred at the time of the commencement of the action, as the statute commences to run on each installment when it falls due. Bissell v. Forbes, 1 Cal. App. 606, 82 Pac. 698. As to the remaining two items, aggregating $3,333.36, the situation presents a different aspect. If the agreement to pay at the times alleged were absolute, as claimed by plaintiff, they would not be barred, as they matured within four years before the complaint was filed. This brings us to a consideration of the provisions in the contract regarding the times and conditions of payment. It will be observed that the clause reads that "eleven and one-ninth ($11^1/_9$) per cent. of each payment as payments are made" is to be paid to the brokers. This provision has the effect of creating a particular fund from which the obligations shall be satisfied, and, unless it is alleged and proven that such payments were made and the fund thus became available, no cause of action for the recovery of the amount arises. Lindley v. Fay, 119 Cal. 239, 51 Pac. 333.

The allegations in the complaint regarding the maturity of the installments are based upon an erroneous construction of the contract. Without taking into consideration the conditional promise to pay from the source indicated, the pleader concludes that the maturity of the installments on the trust deed note definitely fixed the time for the payments on his contract. If the promise to pay the $7,500 had been unconditional, as contended by plaintiff, and the sum had fallen due on the date of the contract, namely, October 19, 1912, then the plea of the statute would be a good defense. But, as we have seen, payment was postponed by the terms of the agreement until the happening of some future event, i. e., the payment of installments of the purchase price, and therefore it must be made to appear affirmatively that such event has occurred as a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to recover. Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 Pac. 587, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932.

There is here no averment that any of the installments of the trust deed note were ever paid, and it is not shown by the pleading that the fund from which plaintiff's claim should be satisfied at any time materialized; hence no sufficient cause of action is alleged in the complaint.

[3] Plaintiff made no request for leave to amend, but chose to stand upon his complaint as framed, and we must assume, therefore, that no further facts could have been alleged in aid of his claim.

Judgment affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court, In Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal is, perhaps, inaccurate in stating that a provision of the agreement has "the effect of creating a particular fund from which the obligation shall be satisfied." It does, however, fix the time at which the respective payments on commissions shall fall due as the time when the payments of the purchase price are actually made, with the result that the reasoning and conclusion of the district court are correct.

Ex parte HUNTER. (Cr. 544.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 7, 1920.)

Habeas corpus 🔑117(2) — Discharge from Sonoma State Home of ward of juvenile court did not affect her previous commitment to Industrial Home.

Where petitioner for habeas corpus was adjudged a ward of the juvenile court until she should attain the age of 21 or be sooner discharged, and was committed to the Boys' and Girls' Industrial Home conducted by the Salvation Army until she should attain 21 or until further order, and subsequently, on petition of the superintendent of the Industrial Home alleging the ward had become feeble-minded, a superior court judge committed her to the Sonoma State Home, but on habeas corpus ordered her discharge from such State Home because the order committing her thereto was based on a petition not signed by the proper person, the discharge did not involve the validity of the first commitment to the Industrial Home, and did not amount in law to a discharge from the Industrial Home under Juvenile Court Law, § 9.

In the matter of the application of Ruby Hunter for writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from the Juvenile Detention Home. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

ANDERSON, Presiding Justice pro tem. Ruby Hunter, the petitioner herein, was adjudged a ward of the juvenile court in and for the county of Butte in the month of December, 1919, and by such order her status as such ward was fixed until she should attain the age of 21 years, or until sooner discharged by the court.

Thereafter, on February 7, 1920, the said court, exercising its jurisdiction over said ward, committed her to the Boys' and Girls' Industrial Home at Lytton Springs, in the county of Sonoma, state of California, said home being conducted by and under the management of the Salvation Army. A limit was likewise placed in said commitment, stating that said ward should remain in said Industrial Home until she should attain the age of 21 years, or until the further order of said juvenile court.

An attack was made against these proceedings on habeas corpus, but the proceedings were duly upheld by the appellate court for the Third district on January 19, 1920. Application of Hunter for Writ of Habeas Corpus (Crim. No. 498–199) 188 Pac. 63.

While said ward was in the custody of the authorities of said Industrial Home, a petition was signed and filed by the superintendent of said Industrial Home in the superior court in and for the county of Sonoma, alleging that the said ward had become and was weak and feeble-minded, and was a proper person to be committed to the Sonoma State Home, an institution conducted for the care and treatment of feeble-minded persons, and thereupon the Honorable Emmet Seawell, judge of the said superior court in and for the county of Sonoma, made an order committing the said ward to the custody of the authorities of the said Sonoma State Home.

Thereafter, a petition for a writ of habeas corpus being filed in the said superior court in and for the county of Sonoma by the said ward, Ruby Hunter, the said the Honorable Emmet Seawell, on the 14th day of September, 1920, granted the prayer of the petitioner and ordered her discharged from said Sonoma State Home, on the ground that the order committing the said Ruby Hunter to said Sonoma State Home was based upon a petition signed by a person not entitled to sign the same, which signing was in violation of the provisions of section 2192 of the Political Code of the state of California.

After the discharge was so granted, the said Ruby Hunter did not return and was not sent back to the said Industrial Home, and thereafter, to wit, on the 16th day of September, 1920, said juvenile court in and for the county of Butte made its order modifying the former order of commitment wherein the said ward was committed to said Industrial Home and ordered that the said ward be committed to the Butte County Detention Home, and directed that a warrant be issued for her arrest for the purpose of carrying out said order, under which last-mentioned order and commitment the said ward and petitioner herein is now being detained in the Butte County Detention Home.

It is contended by petitioner that her discharge in the habeas corpus proceedings, involving the defective petition in the matter of the commitment to the Sonoma State Home, also involved the validity of the first commitment by the Juvenile court in and for the county of Butte to the said Industrial Home, for the reason, it is claimed, that the said Industrial Home comes within the scope and powers of institutions designated by the statute as "similar state institutions."

A further contention is made that, inasmuch as the said judge of the juvenile court in and for the county of Butte had "knowledge" of, and "consented" to the petitioning by the "management" of said Industrial Home to the said superior court in and for the county of Sonoma for the commitment of the said Ruby Hunter to the Sonoma State Home, this amounted in law to a discharge from said Industrial Home, and that such discharge, "so sanctioned by said juvenile court is a bar in this proceeding."

The principal authority cited by petitioner in support of her contention is In re Johnson, 36 Cal. App. 319, 171 Pac. 1074. The decision in this case is based upon the construction to be given to section 9 of the Juvenile Court Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1225), which is as follows:

> "Any order made by the court in case of any person subject to the jurisdiction of the court under the provisions of any of subdivisions one to thirteen inclusive of section one of this act may at any time be changed, modified or set aside as to the judge may seem meet and proper; provided, however, that nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to interfere with the system of parole and discharge that is now or may hereafter be provided by law, or by rule of the board of trustees of the Whittier State School, the Preston School of Industry or the California School for Girls, or any similar state institution or institutions, respectively, for the parole and discharge of wards of the juvenile court committed to the said schools or to any similar state institutions hereafter created, or with the management of the said schools, save that the court committing a ward to any of said schools may thereafter change, modify or set aside said order of commitment upon ten days' notice of the hearing of the application therefor being served by United States mail upon the superintendent of the said school to which said person has previously been committed, and providing that the court shall not then change, modify or set aside said order without due consideration of the effect thereof upon the discipline and parole system of said school or institution."

An examination of this case will reveal the fact that the court was dealing with one of the exceptions enumerated in the statute, and it did nothing more than to say, in effect, that the plain language of the statute should be followed by the courts. The case was one wherein the juvenile court tried to control the ward after the authorities at the Preston School of Industry had discharged him in accordance with their rules and regulations; but there is nothing in this decision, nor has any decision been called to our attention, wherein the appellate courts have intimated that the powers of the juvenile court should be curtailed in dealing with wards of the court, further than that they are limited by the express letter of the statute.

Learned counsel for petitioner earnestly labor to show that the said Industrial Home conducted by the Salvation Army is an institution such as is named in section 9 of the Juvenile Court Law under the designation, "similar state institution," and upon this they contend that, when the superintendent of said Industrial Home obtained the order committing said ward to said Sonoma State Home, said act thereby operated to discharge said ward from said Industrial Home, and likewise from the order of the juvenile court. With this contention we cannot agree, for to so hold would require a violent construction, as it clearly appears to us that an institution conducted as is the said Industrial Home bears no resemblance to a state institution. Even if it could be shown—which it has not been—that the said Industrial Home had a system of rules and credits entitling an inmate to a discharge under certain conditions, certainly an order of discharge granted by such an institution would not be binding upon the juvenile court.

Petitioner cites the case of Board of Directors of Woman's Relief Corps Home Association of California v. A. B. Nye, 8 Cal. App. 527, 97 Pac. 208, as giving support to her contention that the said Industrial Home may be properly designated as "a similar state institution," but an examination of this case will clearly show that the state did have the management and control of the institution considered in said decision. The trustees were appointed by the Governor, accounts were compelled to be kept; in fact, all expenses for conducting said institution were subject to consideration and ratification by the state authorities.

The fact that the judge of the juvenile court had knowledge or even was agreeable to the proceedings instituted by the superintendent of said Industrial Home in the effort to confine the said ward in the Sonoma State Home could not oust the juvenile court of Butte county of jurisdiction of the ward, for it is nowhere contended that the said juvenile court, as such court, took any action in regard to the proceedings before the superior court in and for Sonoma county, and any consent to the proceedings manifested by the judge in sending telegrams, letters, etc., would amount to nothing more than the act of a private individual. It is not contended that the judge acted in his official capacity, but, even if he had so acted, there seems to be nothing in the Juvenile Court Law inconsistent with such action, and, indeed, it would seem a duty incumbent upon the judge of the juvenile court, constituted as he is, the virtual guardian of the ward, to jealously guard, guide, and protect the ward under all changing conditions, for practically all the duties of a father devolve upon the court then; nor do we believe that after the order is made declaring a child to be a ward of the court, and after the child is committed to an institution or to a private individual for its care, education, support, maintenance, etc., the child should unfortunately become mentally weak, and that it would be inconsistent with the court's duty to commit the child to the care of an individual who might restore it to mental health and vigor, or to a private institution for a like purpose, or be instrumental in starting the machinery of the law for the purpose of having a ward committed to a state institution. Could it be contended, then, that because the court was looking out for the child's mental welfare it would lose its jurisdiction any more than it would if it were looking after the welfare of the child in any other way?

If after the law is invoked, through the instrumentality of the court or otherwise, and the ward is thus placed in a state institution for the benefit of its mental trouble, and after it is freed from such institution by reason of being cured, or for any other reason, may it be contended that by virtue of its incarceration and subsequent grant of freedom it has become absolved from the necessities of ordinary mortals for care, education, support, etc.? If so, upon a parity of reasoning, it may be contended that the natural father loses all control over his child after he has been instrumental, or some other person has been instrumental in having it committed to an institution for the feeble-minded, and the child upon a writ of habeas corpus obtains its freedom by reason of some defect in the commitment, or by reason of being cured. It is idle to so contend, for the necessity for caring for, controlling, and supporting the child still remains, and this subject-matter must still be dealt with by the father or by the juvenile court.

When the superior court of Sonoma county acted, its action each time was in relation to a subject-matter separate and apart from that upon which the juvenile court acted, and the restoration of liberty from an institution dealing with the subject-matter of the child's mental welfare was not a restoration of liberty from every other tie or obligation resting on the child.

The most that can be said of the discharge by the superior court of Sonoma county is that the ward is left where the court found her. It did nothing more than to undo what it had previously done: It made an order committing the child to the Sonoma State Home, and in another proceeding it found that in so doing it had made a mistake. It then proceeded to undo this action, and, after this was done, the ward then stood where she did before—clothed with all former rights and subject to all former claims and obligations.

Counsel for petitioner seem to take the view that a restoration of liberty under a writ of habeas corpus is a granting of freedom for every purpose and against every claim. In the very nature of things, this could not be so. Taking the petitioner's case, for instance, let us assume that the petitioner after having been committed to the said Industrial Home had committed a felony in Sonoma county, and the authorities there had decided to prosecute her in that county; that she applied for and was granted her discharge on habeas corpus by reason of some deficiency in the proceedings; could it then properly be contended that she was discharged from the order of the juvenile court of Butte county? Or, to further illustrate, assuming that after the commission of a felony, as aforesaid, it was found that she was insane and that she was committed to the state hospital for the insane; that she was afterwards discharged as cured, or discharged upon a writ or habeas corpus by reason of some defect in the proceedings committing her to said state hospital; could it then properly be contended that she was discharged from the order of the juvenile court of Butte county? The result simply would be that the juvenile order would remain dormant and inactive during these periods, as it came in conflict with superior authority, and as soon as the superior authority was removed the juvenile order would begin to function. And so it is in the case at bar; the order of the juvenile court is now in full force and effect, and must be respected.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

FRANK v. CRESCENT WHARF & WAREHOUSE CO. et al. (Civ. 3595.)

1. Shipping 🔑50—Contract construed as making charter party liable for liens while operating.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1643, where a contract must be construed as providing that the charterer should pay all costs of operating and maintaining steamer and upon expiration of the charter deliver it to the owner free from liens and incumbrances, the owner must be protected against a lien imposed while the steamer was being operated under the charter party unless imposed for work excepted therefrom.

2. Shipping 🔑58(2)—Presumed that charter parties knew that owner's engineer might impress liens on vessel.

In construing a contract chartering a vessel, existing laws enter into and become a part thereof, where applicable and it must be presumed that the charterer knew that, in operating and maintaining a steamer, liens and incumbrances might be impressed under Code Civ. Proc. § 813, through the acts of the chief engineer, retained and reserved by the owner, without their knowledge.

3. Estoppel 🔑112—Answer held not to plead estoppel, no prejudice being alleged.

In an action by the owner of a vessel against a charter party to recover for a lien placed on the steamer while operated by defendant, answer held not sufficient to plead an estoppel because of plaintiff's position taken in the libel action establishing the lien, where no injustice or injury to defendants appellants is shown resulting therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; G. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Marshal A. Frank against the Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nathan H. Frank and Irving H. Frank, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gavin McNab and Luther Elkins, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. This action was brought upon a bond given for the faithful performance of the covenants of a charter party of the steamer F. A. Kilburn; at the time the steamer was owned by plaintiff. He had judgment against both defendants, and they appeal.

The covenants, in particular, to which our attention is directed by appellants, are:

> "(7) The party of the second part shall pay all costs of operating and maintaining the said steamer (except as hereinafter provided), and upon the expiration of this charter the said steamer shall be delivered back to the party of the first part free of all liens and incumbrances.
> "(8) If, owing to the acts of God, fire, perils of the sea, negligence of the master or for any other causes beyond the control of the party of the second part, the said steamer should, during the term of this charter, be damaged or become unserviceable or unseaworthy, the party of the second part shall not be held liable for the same."
> "(4) The party of the first part shall have the privilege of appointing the chief engineer of the steamer during the term of this charter, but the master shall be mutually satisfactory to both the first and second parties."

It is not disputed that, in the operation and maintenance of the steamer by the second party (the appellant Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company), work and labor was done and furnished to the steamer by the Moore & Scott Iron Works, upon the credit of the vessel; that a libel was filed for the same in the District Court of the United States; that a lien was adjudged therefor by virtue of section 813 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the steamer was delivered back to plaintiff incumbered with this lien; and that plaintiff sustained the amount of damages awarded by the trial court in this action.

The judgment of the District Court in the libel case brought against the steamer by the Moore & Scott Iron Works was appealed from and thereafter was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals and is reported in 179 Fed. 107, 103 C. C. A. 252.

In the libel case it appeared that the owner of the steamer did not know of the repairs and supplies in question and was never told of them prior to the libel suit, but it was held that in view of the fact that Flynn, the chief engineer, was appointed by him, and that the Moore & Scott Iron Works had given former credits to the steamer upon the order of Flynn from time to time prior to the making of the charter party, and that the charges therefor had always been paid, that the chief engineer had ostensible authority from the owner to order the repairs and materials, and hence the vessel was subject to the lien of the libelant.

[1] The contention made by appellants here is that of an estoppel, and the attack is directed against a portion of finding X, as being contrary to the adjudication made in the United States court in the libel suit against the steamer. That part of the finding referred to reads as follows:

> "That the said lien for said work and labor done and supplies furnished to the said steamer F. A. Kilburn was created by the said defendant Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company, a corporation; and the said work and labor done and supplies furnished to the said steamer F. A. Kilburn, for which said lien was claimed, was so done and performed and furnished at the special instance and request of said defendant Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company."

It is argued by appellants that it is a legal impossibility for the charterer of a vessel to create a lien thereon as found by the superior court, and that hence this judgment must be erroneous However, in the case upon which they place most reliance to support this argument, The Valencia, 165 U. S. 264, 17 Sup. Ct. 323, 41 L. Ed. 710, the concluding portion of the opinion is in part as follows:

> "Under what circumstances, if under any, a charterer who has control and possession of a vessel under a charter party requiring him at his own cost to provide for necessary supplies and repairs, may pledge the credit of the vessel, it is not necessary now to determine."

Whether this principle of law, as contended by appellants, is correct, and whether the doctrine of res adjudicata may be invoked against finding X, is unimportant, for, in our opinion, it was not necessary in order to support the judgment in favor of plaintiff for the court to find, as it did, either that the lien was created by the Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company, or that the labor and supplies were furnished at the request of said company.

A contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties. Civ. Code, § 1643.

The charter party provided, as we have seen, that the appellants should pay all costs of operating and maintaining the steamer (with certain exceptions not involved here), and, upon the expiration of the charter, deliver back the said steamer to the owner, free of all liens and incumbrances. The defendants in this action covenanted in their bond that the Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company should strictly perform all the covenants and agreements of the charter party, which by it was to be kept and performed, and deliver back said steamer to the owner after the expiration of the charter party, free from all liens and incumbrances. There is not a word in the charter party or bond, limiting respondent's right of recovery to liens created by any particular person or persons. The reasonable construction to be placed on the instruments is that the owner should be protected against all liens while the steamer was being operated under the charter party unless the liens were imposed for work and materials made necessary under the exceptions mentioned in the eighth subdivision.

[2] The fact that the owner retained the chief engineer and reserved the right to appoint that officer cannot alter the meaning of the contract in this particular, for it appears even from the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, cited by appellants, that Lehman, the president of the charterer company, testified in the libel case that the owner reserved such right "to keep the vessel in good condition."

It is to be presumed that the appellants knew that, in operating and maintaining the steamer under the charter party, liens and incumbrances might be impressed upon the steamer under section 813 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, through the acts of the chief engineer and without their knowledge. In construing a contract, existing laws enter into and become a part of contracts to which they are applicable. Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 Pac. 48; Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568.

The owner was not to pay any of the costs of operating and maintaining the steamer, except in cases arising under the 8th subdivision we have mentioned, and yet, in effect, appellants take the position that such obligation is imposed upon the owner by the charter party, if fortuitously the ship chandler enters his credit against the vessel instead of against the charterer. No such construction can be successfully raised as a shield in their defense.

[3] The appellants argued that certain matters appearing in their answer, the same being taken from the answer of the owner in the libel suit against the steamer, also constitute an estoppel here. The only plea of estoppel set up by their answer is:

> "That by virtue of the foregoing decision the said plaintiff is estopped to allege or maintain that the said work and labor done and materials furnished to said steamer F. A. Kilburn as in said amended complaint alleged, was so done or furnished at the instance or request of the defendant Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company, a corporation, or that said lien in said amended complaint mentioned was created by said defendant Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company, a corporation, in the operation and maintenance of said steamer during the pendency of said charter party or otherwise, or at all created by said Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Company."

This also is the only plea of estoppel referred to in the findings of the court. The appellants were not parties to or actors in the libel suit, although respondent made timely demand upon them to defend. Of course, it must be conceded that, if a party relies upon an estoppel, he must plead it (Burk v. City of Santa Cruz, 163 Cal. 811, 127 Pac. 154, and cases there cited), and that as a general rule a party is not precluded from asserting a claim because inconsistent with some claim previously asserted by him, but not successfully maintained (Lackman v. Kearney, 142 Cal. 115, 75 Pac. 668; 15 R. C. L. 956).

In discussing the doctrine of estoppel, it was said by the learned author of the opinion in Allen v. Hance, 161 Cal. 189, 118 Pac. 527:

> "Whether the estoppel rests in judgment, deed, contract, or in pais, in its essence it amounts to but this, that a man is forbidden to show the existence of a fact because by his past conduct, his declarations, his agreement, his deed, or a judgment, it would work an injustice and an injury to his adversary to permit him to do so."

We search the answer of appellants in vain for any statement, intimation, or suggestion that anything appearing therein, or that any act, writing or conduct of respondent at any time, caused any injustice or injury to appellants.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; RICHARDS, J.

PAYNE, Agent, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. * (Civ. 3296.)

Commerce ⚷27(8)—Railroad employee, repairing engine, was engaged in interstate commerce.

Railroad employee, repairing engine in general shops, who, while tapping its boiler, sustained an injury to his eye from a piece of steel blown from the exhaust of a compressed air motor operated by men working near him, held engaged at the time in work so intimately connected with interstate commerce as practically to be a part of it, so that the Industrial Accident Commission of the state had no jurisdiction to make an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

*Certiorari granted, 254 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 377, 65 L. Ed. —.

Application for certiorari by John Barton Payne, as Agent under Transportation Act 1920, § 206 (41 Stat. 461) subd. (b), he having been substituted for Walker D. Hines, against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, to review its order awarding compensation for injuries to O. J. Burton. Award annulled.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Angellotti, C. J., and Lawlor and Wilbur, JJ., dissenting.

Fred E. Pettit, Jr., and E. E. Bennett, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WELLER, J. This proceeding was brought to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission of California in awarding compensation to one O. J. Burton for injuries sustained by him in the line of his employment under Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, operating the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad.

On February 1, 1919, when he received the injury, Burton was engaged in repairing engine No. 3673 in the general shops of the Salt Lake Railroad at Los Angeles. While tapping the boiler of the engine, a piece of steel, blown from the exhaust of a compressed air motor operated by men working near him, lodged in his left eye, causing the injury for which he was awarded compensation. This locomotive had been used several months for the exclusive purpose of hauling heavy freight trains in interstate commerce between points in the states of Nevada and California, on the main line of the railroad. On the 19th of December, 1918, it was placed in the shops at Los Angeles for general overhauling and the installation of a superheating apparatus to increase the steam pressure, whereupon it was the intention to return it to its regular service. It was estimated that this work would be finished about January 30, 1919, but owing to delay in delivery of necessary materials it was not actually completed until about February 21, 1919. After the repairs had been made the engine was given a trial for several days in the yards of the company at Los Angeles, in accordance with the usual custom, without cars attached. On February 25, 1919, it hauled a freight train from Los Angeles to San Pedro, and on the following day returned to Los Angeles with a similar train, a portion of the cargo in both instances being consigned to points outside of California. It was testified that the trip to San Pedro was a part of the process of "breaking in" after a locomotive had undergone extensive repairs. After this run to San Pedro, the engine was returned to the shop, remaining there until March 4, 1919, when it was sent out attached to a through freight train, and resumed its former run between Yermo, Cal., and Caliente, Nev., on the main line of the railroad, where it has ever since been used.

This rather elaborate detail seems essential to a thorough understanding of the facts which are uncontroverted. It is conceded that, if the Industrial Accident Commission of California had jurisdiction of the case, the award is just and proper in all respects. The sole question presented for our consideration is: Was the engine at the time of the accident, engaged in interstate commerce, within the meaning of the federal Employers' Liability Act (35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665])?

The answer to this simple proposition is rendered difficult by the apparent conflict of decisions of the various courts, federal and state, which have been called upon to apply the law to the facts in issue in particular cases. It is complicated by reason of the fact that no fixed rule has been established by the Supreme Court of the United States for the application of the statute. It has held that each case must be decided in the light of the particular facts, with a view to determining whether, at the time of the injury, the employer is engaged in interstate business, or in an act which is so directly and immediately connected with such business as substantially to form a part or necessary incident thereof. New York C. & H. R. Co. v. Carr, 238 U. S. 260, 35 Sup. Ct. 780, 59 L. Ed. 1298. Where the employer is engaged in both intrastate and interstate commerce, and the instrumentalities are used indiscriminately in both, the line of demarkation between the two classes of business is exceedingly difficult to trace. A résumé of some of the decisions will serve to illustrate this point.

In Louisvile & Nashville R. Co. v. Parker, 242 U. S. 13, 37 Sup. Ct. 4, 61 L. Ed. 119, the employee was engaged in switching a car not moving in interstate commerce from one track to another, for the purpose of reaching and moving an interstate car; and it was held that he was engaged in interstate commerce. The court says:

> "The difference is marked between a mere expectation that the act done would be followed by other work of a different character, * * * and doing the act for the purpose of furthering the later work."

New York C. R. Co. v. Carr, supra, was a case where two cars carrying interstate freight was uncoupled from an interstate train and backed into a siding, where the employee was injured. We quote from the decision:

> "The matter is not to be decided by considering the physical position of the employee at the moment of injury. If he is hurt in the course of his employment while going to a car to perform an interstate duty, or if he is injured while preparing an engine for an interstate trip, he is entitled to the benefits of the federal act, although the accident occurred prior to the actual coupling of the engine to the interstate cars."

In the case of Erie R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 170, 37 Sup. Ct. 556, 61 L. Ed. 1057, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 662, an employee was in charge of a switch engine which was used in switching cars about in the yard, especially to and from a transfer station; some cars containing interstate freight, others intrastate, and still others carrying both classes. After completing his day's work, he put his engine away and started to leave the yard. While crossing a track on his way out, he was struck by an engine and killed. It was held that, as his work was particularly interstate, and his leaving the yard was a necessary incident to his employment, he was at the time engaged in interstate commerce within the purview of the federal act.

New York C. R. Co. v. Porter, 249 U. S. 168, 39 Sup. Ct. 188, 63 L. Ed. 536, determined that a workman engaged in removing snow from tracks used for the transportation of interstate and intrastate commerce was entitled to compensation under the federal law.

In Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Smith, 250 U. S. 101, 39 Sup. Ct. 396, 63 L. Ed. 869, the employee was the cook of a construction crew which was employed in repairing bridges at different places along the line. The court stated that as he was actually assisting the bridge carpenters by keeping their bed and board close to their place of work, he was engaged in interstate commerce.

Pederson v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 229 U. S. 146, 33 Sup. Ct. 648, 57 L. Ed. 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, decided that an employee who was carrying bolts to be used in repairing an interstate railroad, and was injured by an interstate train while performing that duty, was within the terms of the federal statute.

Shanks v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 239 U. S. 556, 36 Sup. Ct. 188, 60 L. Ed. 436, L. R. A. 1916C, 797, enunciates the principle that a workman employed in removing and installing fixtures in a machine shop which is conducted for repairing locomotives used in both interstate and intrastate transportation is not entitled to the benefit of the federal act. The court in its opinion says:

> "The connection between the fixture and interstate transportation was remote at best, for the only function of the fixture was to communicate power to machinery used in repairing parts of engines some of which were used in such transportation."

In the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 Sup. Ct. 517, 60 L. Ed. 941, the workman was employed with a crew in switching cars of coal to sheds, where it was placed in chutes, thence to be used to supply coal to engines engaged in both classes of transportation. The court held that he was not in interstate commerce, stating that—

> "Manifestly there was no such close or direct relation to interstate transportation in the taking of the coal to the coal chutes."

The above citations will suffice to indicate the subtle distinctions which have been drawn by the Supreme Court of the United States in interpreting and applying the federal Employers' Liability Act.

Coming, now, to the decisions of our own Supreme Court construing these authorities, we encounter a direct conflict which adds to the difficulty of reaching a satisfactory solution of the problem.

In the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 Pac. 277, L. R. A. 1916E, 916, the Industrial Accident Commission of California had assumed jurisdiction, under substantially the following facts: A workman named Ruth was repairing a switch engine, which had been withdrawn from service in the yard at Roseville Junction, Cal., where some 70 per cent. of the switching was interstate commerce work. While thus engaged, Ruth received injuries resulting in his death. The accident occurred during the time the engine was in the roundhouse undergoing repairs, and three days before it was restored to service. Our Supreme Court annulled the award, after discussing the decisions of the federal court, some of which we have cited. On May 21, 1917, without filing an opinion, the Supreme Court of the United States denied a petition for a writ of certiorari whereby it was sought to review the decision of the state court.

On January 8, 1917, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion in the case of Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 Sup. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 358, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 54, from which we quote:

> "The agreed statement is embraced in a few words. The plaintiff was making repairs upon an engine. This engine 'had been used in the hauling of freight trains over defendant's line, * * * which freight trains hauled both intrastate and interstate commerce, and * * * it was so used after the plaintiff's injury.' The last time before the injury * * * was on October 18, when it pulled a freight train into Marshalltown, and it was used again on October 21, after the accident, to pull a freight train out from the same place. That is all * * * we have, and is not sufficient to bring the case under the act. This is not like the matter of repairs upon a road permanently devoted to commerce among the states. An engine as such is not permanently devoted to any kind of traffic, and it does not appear that this engine was destined especially to anything more definite than such business as it might be needed for. It was not interrupted in an interstate haul to be repaired and go on. It simply had finished some interstate business and had not yet begun upon any other. Its next work, so far as appears, might be inter- state or confined to Iowa, as it should happen. At the moment it was not engaged in either. Its character as an instrument of commerce depends upon its employment at the time not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events." (Italics ours.)

On the authority of this Winters Case, our Supreme Court, in Hines v. Industrial Acc. Com., 192 Pac. 859, filed October 4, 1920, affirmed an award to one Brizzolara, under circumstances somewhat similar to those in the Ruth Case, supra. The finding of the commission in the Brizzolara Case was as follows:

> "That at the time of said injury and death said employee was engaged in making repairs upon a switch engine, which had been temporarily withdrawn from service therefor. That, when in service, said switch engine was used in both interstate and intrastate traffic. That the evidence herein is insufficient to establish as a fact that the proportion of said interstate use exceeded or amounted to thirty per cent. of the whole."

After quoting from the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the opinion proceeds to state that the ruling in the Ruth Case is at variance with the holding in the Winters Case, and that the Ruth Case, therefore, cannot be considered as controlling, notwithstanding that the Ruth Case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court some four months after the Winters Case was decided.

Some of the other adjudications of our Supreme Court are illuminating upon this intricate problem. It has been held that a watchman at a railroad crossing used for both interstate and intrastate traffic is engaged in interstate business while employed in keeping the track clear of obstructions in order to facilitate the passage of interstate trains. Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Rolfe Case) 174 Cal. 8, 161 Pac. 1139, L. R. A. 1917E, 262; Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Smith Case) 174 Cal. 16, 161 Pac. 1142. An electric lineman, employed in the removal of an overhead telephone wire which had fallen on the trolley wire used by a railroad for furnishing electric power for the operation of cars of the railroad's interstate and intrastate passenger system, was engaged in interstate commerce, as he was then engaged directly in removing an obstruction to the operation of an instrumentality in actual use for purposes of such commerce. Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Covell Case) 174 Cal. 19, 161 Pac. 1143.

In the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 178 Cal. 20, 171 Pac. 1071, one Butler was killed by an electric shock received while he was wiping insulators on the main power line of an interstate and intrastate system, between the power house and substations. The electrical energy was generated at this power house and conveyed in an alternating current of high voltage to the substations, there converted and transformed to a direct current of reduced voltage, thence passed to the trolley wires, and from there to the motors on the cars. Our Supreme Court applied the principle of the Harrington Case, supra, and decided that the work being done by Butler was analogous to the situation of an employee loading coal chutes for the supply of interstate engines, and held that Butler's employment was too remote from interstate commerce to bring him within the federal statute. This action was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States (251 U. S. 259, 40 Sup. Ct. 130, 64 L. Ed. 258), the court saying;

> "Generally, when applicability of the federal Employers' Liability Act is uncertain, the character of the employment, in relation to commerce, may be adequately tested by inquiring whether, at the time of the injury, the employee was engaged in work so closely connected with interstate transportation as practically to be a part of it. * * * Power is no less essential than tracks or bridges to the movement of cars. The accident under consideration occurred while deceased was wiping insulators actually supporting a wire which then carried electric power so intimately connected with the propulsion of cars that if it had been short-circuited through his body, they would have stopped instantly. Applying the suggested test, we think these circumstances suffice to show that his work was directly and immediately connected with interstate transportation and an essential part of it."

The cases which most closely parallel the one we have under consideration are found in the decisions of the Circuit Courts of Appeals, and, though they are not expressions of the court of last resort, nevertheless they may guide the action of the state courts in determining the applicability of the federal statute.

Law v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 208 Fed. 869, 126 C. C. A. 27, L. R. A. 1915C, 17, was decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Sixth Circuit. A boiler maker's helper was injured in the shops of the railroad company at Memphis, Tenn., while assisting the boiler maker in repairing a freight engine regularly used in interstate commerce. The engine was in the shop for what is called "roundhouse overhauling," and had been dismantled at least 21 days before the accident. Up to the time it was taken to the shop, it had been regularly used in interstate commerce, was destined to return thereto on completion of the repairs, and did so return the day following the accident. In the opinion holding the federal act applicable to the facts, the court propounds the following pertinent interrogatories:

> "Under the existing facts, can the length of time required for the repairs change the legal situation? If so, where is the line to be drawn? How many days temporary withdrawal would suffice to take it out of the purview of the act? And is it material whether the repairs take place in the roundhouse or in general shops? Is not the test whether the withdrawal is merely temporary in character?"

Further quoting from the opinion:

> "As held in the Pederson Case, the work of keeping the instrumentalities used in interstate commerce (which would include engines) in proper state of repair while thus used is so clearly related to such commerce as to be in practice and in legal contemplation a part of it."

In Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Maerkl, 198 Fed. 1, 117 C. C. A. 237, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit held that an employee engaged at the railway shops in making repairs upon a refrigerator car theretofore used indiscriminately in intrastate and interstate commerce, and intended again to be so used when repaired, was one of the instruments of interstate commerce.

Some general statements in the opinion in the Brizzolara Case, supra, might seem to be determinative of the issues here involved; but a perusal of the opinion discloses that such statements, in so far as they attempt to state the legal principles applicable to all engines, are not warranted by the decision in the Winters Case, Supra, upon which they purport to be based. The Winters Case turned upon the proposition that the future use of the engine was undetermined, and that its character as an instrumentaity of interstate commerce could not be made to depend upon remote possibilities or upon accidental later events. The switch engine involved in the Brizzolara Case, when in service, was used in both interstate and intrastate traffic—the proportion of each not being ascertainable from the evidence. It does not appear that it was intended for such service in the future, or that it was utilized for any purpose whatever after being repaired. The facts in the instant case are distinguishable from those in either the Winters Case or the Brizzolara Case. Here the engine was permanently devoted to interstate commerce, was destined to return to that service on completion of the necessary repairs, and was so returned when placed in condition for such use. It would seem that the length of time it was out of commission is immaterial, so long as it was the intention to maintain its character as an instrumentality of interstate commerce. As stated in the Parker Case, supra, "the purpose controls, and the business is interstate." Its future use was not dependent upon "remote probabilities or accidental later events"; but, so far as purpose and intention are concerned, its continued use in interstate traffic was as certain as anything in human affairs can be predetermined.

In the light of the decisions, we conclude that, at the time of the accident, Burton was engaged in work so intimately connected with interstate commerce as practically to be a part of it, and therefore that the Industrial Accident Commission of California had no jurisdiction.

Award annulled.

50 Cal. App. 314

FLINT v. GIGUIERE. (Civ. 1904.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 7, 1920. Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1921; Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 3, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Jury's finding on conflicting evidence as to fraud will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Contracts 🔑108(2)—Waiver of option in favor of another not against public policy.

Agreement not to exercise option, so as to allow another to buy, is not legally objectionable; there being nothing to indicate that it is against public policy.

3. Contracts 🔑65(3)—Agreement not to exercise option so that defendant might buy consideration for agreement to pay.

Plaintiff's agreement not to exercise an option, so as to allow defendant to buy, was consideration for defendant's promise to pay plaintiff a certain sum.

4. Contracts 🔑9(1)—Agreement not to exercise option sufficiently definite.

Agreement not to exercise an option so as to allow a third person to buy the articles held not so uncertain or indefinite as to make it invalid or unenforceable.

5. Contracts 🔑333(5)—Agreement not to exercise option held pleaded.

Complaint held to plead, in effect, contract of plaintiff not to exercise option, so as to allow defendant to buy the articles, in consideration of amount to be paid for each article bought.

6. Contracts 🔑28(3)—Finding of agreement not to exercise option warranted by evidence.

Evidence held to warrant finding of agreement of plaintiff not to exercise option, allowing defendant to buy the articles, he in consideration to pay plaintiff a certain amount for each article that he should buy of the third person.

7. Contracts 🔑348—One attacking written option as without consideration has burden of proof.

Under Civ. Code §§ 1614, 1615, as to presumption of consideration and burden of proof as to lack of consideration of written instrument, defendant, sued on contract whereby plaintiff agreed not to exercise his written option and to allow defendant to buy the articles, has the burden of proof on his claim of want of consideration for the option.

8. Contracts 🔑50—Agreement not to exercise option held to contain the necessary reciprocal promises and obligations.

Plaintiff's option constituting property, his agreement not to exercise it and to allow defendant to buy the articles, imposed on him a burden and on defendant a benefit under Civ. Code, § 1605, so that, defendant agreeing to pay plaintiff, in consideration for such agreement, a certain amount for each of such articles that he should buy of the third person, there were the reciprocal promises and obligations necessary for a valid contract.

9. Frauds, statute of 🔑84—Agreement as to option held not sale within statute.

Agreement of plaintiff not to exercise his option, so that defendant could buy the articles independently of the option, was not one for sale within Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Chose in Action.]

10. Frauds, statute of 🔑85—Agreement for sale not within statute, the price not necessarily being $200.

If agreement of plaintiff not to exercise option to buy 365 cattle, but to allow defendant to buy them, defendant to pay plaintiff $1 for each head purchased, be considered one for sale of the option, it is not within Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4, as he might buy less than 200 head so that the price of the option would be less than $200.

11. Frauds, statute of 🔑144—One receiving benefit of contract estopped to claim its invalidity.

Even if plaintiff's agreement not to exercise an option to buy cattle, but to allow defendant to buy them, defendant in consideration to pay plaintiff $1 for each head defendant should buy of the third person, be considered a contract for sale of the option within the statute, defendant, having availed himself thereof, is estopped to assert invalidity of the contract because not in writing.

12. Contracts 🔑350(1)—Evidence that purchase by defendant from third person was under agreement with plaintiff held sufficient.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that the purchase of cattle by defendant was under his agreement with plaintiff, whereby plaintiff, having an option for their purchase, agreed not to exercise it, but to allow defendant to buy them, he to pay plaintiff $1 for each head that he should buy of the optionor.

13. Contracts 🔑192—Defendant, to be liable under agreement whereby plaintiff waived option in his favor, need not have purchased during life of option.

For defendant to be liable under agreement with plaintiff, who, having option to buy cattle, agreed not to exercise it, but to allow defendant to buy them, he to pay plaintiff $1 for each head that he should buy of the third person, it was not necessary that defendant's purchase should be before expiration of the option.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by S. W. Flint against Carl Giguiere. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for appellant.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The complaint in this action is brief and may be set out in full as follows:

"(1) That within two years last past the said plaintiff and D. B. Woods entered into a contract whereby the said D. B. Woods agreed to sell and deliver to the said plaintiff 365 head of cattle situated in Berryessa Valley, Cal.

"(2) That said plaintiff and defendant agreed that if plaintiff would permit said defendant to purchase said cattle so held under contract by plaintiff from the said Woods that the said defendant would pay plaintiff the sum of $1 per head for each and every head purchased by him; that, in consideration of said agreement on the part of said defendant to so pay him the sum of $1 per head, the said plaintiff agreed that said Woods might sell said cattle to the said defendant, notwithstanding the contract between plaintiff and the said Woods.

"(3) That the said defendant thereupon purchased from the said Woods 365 head of said cattle.

"(4) That there is due, owing, and unpaid from the said defendant to the plaintiff the sum of $365; that the same has not been paid and no part thereof has been paid."

In the answer it was denied, on information and belief, that plaintiff and Woods entered into such contract, and it was denied positively that plaintiff and defendant entered into the contract mentioned in the complaint. An affirmative defense of fraud, based upon misrepresentation by plaintiff of the fitness of said cattle, was also set up, and it was alleged that the agreement was that defendant should pay plaintiff the sum of $1 per head "for each and every head of the said cattle fairly fat, fit and suitable for slaughtering purposes which he might purchase from the said Woods"; that immediately after entering into said contract defendant discovered that said cattle were extremely thin, lean, and scrawny and entirely unfit and unsuitable for slaughtering purposes, and informed plaintiff that he would not purchase the same or any thereof.

The action was tried before a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $328, and the appeal is from the judgment entered thereon.

[1] At the outset we may dispose of the question of fraud by saying that as to it the evidence is conflicting, and it may not be amiss, indeed, to recall the principle that requires us to approach the determination of all the issues with the disposition to find, if possible, legal support for the verdict and judgment, and to be content if such support be found.

The theory of plaintiff, as we understand it, is that he had an option for the purchase of certain cattle from one Woods; that he agreed with defendant that he would not exercise said option if the defendant would pay him $1 per head for all of said cattle that the defendant might purchase; that thereafter said defendant did purchase 328 thereof, and hence plaintiff became entitled to the payment of $328.

[2-4] Abstractly considered, such agreement does not appear to be legally objectionable. There is nothing to indicate that it is against public policy, and the declination of the plaintiff to exercise his option in order that the defendant might have the opportunity of purchasing the cattle for himself would constitute a sufficient consideration for the latter's promise to pay the former the said sum of money. Nor is there anything so uncertain or indefinite in its terms as to make such contract invalid or unenforceable.

But we do not understand appellant to claim that an agreement of that kind may not be enforced, but his contention is that no such contract was either pleaded in the complaint or shown by the evidence.

[5] As to the complaint it is true that it is not expressly alleged that plaintiff agreed "to stand aside" or not to exercise his option, but that is necessarily implied in the averment "that said plaintiff agreed that said Woods might sell said cattle to the said defendant, notwithstanding the contract between plaintiff and said Woods." The inference is also strengthened by a consideration of the use of the expression "permit said defendant to purchase said cattle." In brief, the complaint shows the agreement to be that defendant would pay plaintiff $1 per head for each of the cattle purchased by him, and in consideration of this promise the plaintiff agreed that Woods might sell said cattle to defendant, notwithstanding said option. If that is not equivalent to a promise on the part of plaintiff not to exercise his legal right to purchase said cattle, then the promise amounts to nothing. Of course, he could not permit defendant to buy the cattle or carry out his agreement that "Woods might sell said cattle to said defendant," if he exercised his option. Both conditions could not coexist. It hardly seems controvertible that plaintiff has substantially set forth in his complaint a contract in accordance with the theory for which he contends in his brief.

[6] We may next consider whether the evidence furnishes any rational ground for the inference that such was the contract of the parties. In reference to it the plaintiff testified as follows:

> "Mr. Giguiere came to my house. Mrs. Flint and I were there. Mr. Giguiere wanted to get those cattle. He says 'I hear that you got Woods' cattle tied up.' That's the expression he used. I says, 'I have a contract on his cattle and I am going to try to sell them;' and he says, 'Will you turn those cattle over to me?' I says, 'I would be glad to, Carl; we live here in Yolo county, and I've done some business with you before; I would be glad to do it, turn them over to you, providing you pay me what I would make; otherwise a dollar a head is my commission.' He says, 'All right, I'll pay you a dollar a head.' And then Mrs. Flint took the original contract— Q. When you say the original contract, you mean the one of February 22d? A. Yes, sir; all those, all of them, and gave Mr. Giguiere a copy. Mrs. Flint wrote this copy out and handed it to Mr. Giguiere, and Mr. Giguiere took it and said he would go ahead and finish the business up with Mr. Woods."

Is it not a reasonable inference from the foregoing that the intention of the parties was that plaintiff would make no attempt to buy the cattle, in other words, to consummate his option, and in consideration of this waiver the defendant would pay him $1 for every head that he might buy? The agreement was not formulated with the accuracy that would be expected of attorneys, but these men are laymen, and extreme precision, especially in the use of legal terms, may not be looked for. But here again we may say that the language quoted can hardly bear any other construction than as claimed by respondent. In the cross-examination he added that defendant said: "All right, now, if I buy these cattle, Sam, I'll give you one dollar a head." But it is not contended by respondent that appellant was to pay unless he purchased the cattle. So that the foregoing expression is not inconsistent with plaintiff's theory. Indeed, as we have seen, the complaint makes the purchase by defendant a condition of his obligation to pay plaintiff.

We are not concerned, of course, with the fact that defendant testified that the agreement was that he was to pay $1 a head for all the fat cattle he bought. But it is worthy of remark that his testimony on the other point is to the effect that plaintiff was to give up his option in consideration of said promise of defendant.

As to the execution of said agreement, it is sufficient to say that it is not disputed that plaintiff did "step aside" and permit defendant to purchase the cattle, and there is evidence which the jury had the right to believe—if indeed it is really contradicted —that defendant did purchase 328 head of said cattle. Thus were the conditions fulfilled for the creation of the obligation of defendant to pay said sum.

[7] Now for a more specific consideration of defendant's criticisms of the judgment: The first is that there was no consideration for the promise to pay said money to plaintiff. This is based upon the assumption that plaintiff did not confer any benefit or suffer any detriment, for the reason that his so-called option was without consideration. As to this, it is probably sufficient to say that the defendant presented no such defense in his answer. The option was embodied in a written instrument, and in such cases the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support it lies with the party seeking to invalidate it. Civ. Code, § 1615.

The instrument being in writing, the presumption is that there was a sufficient consideration (section 1614, Civ. Code), and to overcome this presumption it was incumbent upon appellant to allege and prove the contrary (Yellow Jacket, etc., Co. v. Holbrook, 24 Cal. App. 687, 142 Pac. 128; Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 67 Pac. 681).

[8] Nor do we see anything in the form or terms of said option to render it invalid. It conferred upon plaintiff the legal right to purchase within a certain time said cattle at a certain price. Manifestly plaintiff was not required to promise to purchase the cattle in order to make it an enforceable instrument. If he had so promised, it would, of course, have made the instrument a contract of sale instead of an option. From the nature of this instrument it would follow that, a valuable consideration having presumably been paid therefor, the "option" was binding upon Woods and constituted property which was capable of ownership and of being transferred. But whether Woods could have withdrawn the privilege granted therein before it was acted upon is indeed immaterial, since there is no doubt that it was operative at the time of said agreement between plaintiff and defendant. This privilege or option being a property right, necessarily it would be a sufficient consideration to support an obligation. It is immaterial what its value was, although plaintiff and defendant placed its value at $1 per head. At any rate, we must presume it was of value, and therefore the assignment of it—or what in effect is the same thing as far as the consideration is concerned—the voluntary declination of plaintiff to exercise said option, imposed upon him a burden and upon defendant a benefit; and hence there were reciprocal promises and obligations that constituted a valid contract between plaintiff and defendant. Bacon v. Grosse, 165 Cal. 481, 132 Pac. 1027; Civ. Code, § 1605.

[9] It is also contended by appellant that the contract between Woods and Flint constituted a chose in action, and therefore the attempted transfer of it by oral agreement was invalid by virtue of subdivision 4 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, pronouncing invalid "an agreement for the sale of goods, chattels, or things in action, at a price not less than two hundred dollars, unless the buyer accepts or receives part of such goods and chattels or the evidences, or some of them, of such things in action, or pays at the time some part of the purchase money."

But the answer is that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant was not for the sale of said "chose in action," but that plaintiff would not avail himself of said privilege. There was no claim nor was there any evidence that defendant was to buy the cattle under the agreement between plaintiff and Woods, as would have been the case if there had been a sale of the "chose in action." By reason of plaintiff abandoning his right to purchase, defendant was left at liberty to make whatever terms he could with Woods.

[10] Moreover, if the transaction might be regarded as a sale, the statute would not apply for the reason that the promise of defendant was not to pay a definite amount of $200 or more, but he was to pay $1 for every head which he might buy. He did not bind himself to buy any definite number. In fact, this seems to have been left to his judgment. It might therefore have been less than $200. To such a contract the statute does not apply.

[11] But, be that as it may, under the circumstances of the case, as we are required to view it, appellant is estopped from urging the statute of frauds. Flint performed his part of the agreement. He surrendered his property right upon the faith of Giguiere's promise to pay $1 per head. Having received the benefit of that agreement with Flint, it would be unjust and inequitable for defendant to repudiate it upon the ground that the contract was not in writing. Many refinements and much learning on the subject are displayed in the books and the decisions, but we think it can be safely said that in cases like this where one of the parties has performed his obligation, has suffered the detriment contemplated by the agreement, and the other party has fully received the benefit of the transaction, the chancellor has a large discretion in determining whether it would be inequitable to allow the party who gains by the contract to take refuge under the statute of frauds, and, unless it can be said that such discretion has been abused, an appellate court will not interfere. The question, we may say, arose upon an objection to the testimony of plaintiff as to the contract with defendant, and we think it cannot be held that the trial court erred in the ruling.

As illustrative of the application of this principle we may refer to the two California decisions cited by respondent.

In Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 Pac. 154, 159, the action was for the specific performance of an oral contract to convey real property, and the Supreme Court, in holding that there was a sufficient performance by one party to require an execution of the contract by the other, made this statement:

"Where there is a verbal agreement under which each of the parties is to convey land to the other, it is generally held that a conveyance by one on the faith of the agreement constitutes such part performance as will in equity take the case out of the operation of the statute [citing cases]. The case at bar is within the principle of these decisions, and the conveyance by plaintiffs therefore places them in a position to compel compliance by the defendants with the undertakings on their part."

In Hefferman v. Davis, 24 Cal. App. 295, 140 Pac. 716, the action was for the recovery of rent, and the lessee defended upon the ground that the lease was invalid, because not in writing. It was held that he was estopped from setting up the statute of frauds; this court holding that it would be inequitable to allow him to repudiate the contract on any such ground.

[12] Some contention is made that appellant did not buy the cattle under said contract with respondent, but that it was a subsequent transaction in which he was jointly interested with his partner, Holmes. But, if we concede merit in such defense, there is sufficient evidence to the contrary to sustain respondent's position. As to this it will answer to quote the following from the testimony of plaintiff:

> "Q. After that did you ever have any talk with Mr. Giguiere in regard to whether he had actually taken the cattle from Woods? A. Yes, sir; I was out in Mr. Giguiere's machine and sold him, if I remember right, a couple of head of cattle that I bought out here from Tom Chalmers, and Giguiere says, 'Well, I made the trade and I'll give you a check.' I says, 'All right,' and I says, 'Any time.'"

[13] Another point is made that the purchase of the cattle was subsequent to the expiration of the option, and therefore not within the terms of the contract between plaintiff and defendant. Respondent claims that there is a conflict in the evidence as to this, but, granting that appellant is right as to the time, it does not seem to be material. The agreement between plaintiff and defendant did not require the purchase to take place before the expiration of the option. Indeed, as to that, no time was specified, although probably a reasonable time was implied. The sale, at any rate, took place only a few days after said option expired, and plaintiff, having performed his part of the agreement, was entitled to recover.

In conclusion, we may state that in none of the cases cited by appellant do we find anything militating against this view. We may briefly notice the last of these Thomas v. Birch, 178 Cal. 483, 173 Pac. 1102.

That case involved an option, and the court held that it was not binding upon either party until the defendant exercised his option by making the payment within the time limited, but it was found that the option was without consideration and therefore constituted a mere offer which required acceptance before it became a contract. Herein, however, there was a consideration for the option, and we are justified in holding that it was accepted by Flint, and therefore became a property right of value.

The case involves a comparatively trivial amount, but we have given it as careful consideration as though much were at stake, and we have reached the conclusion that, under familiar principles, we should not disturb the result reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOATMAN et al. v. FULLER et al.
(Civ. 3347.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 15, 1920. Rehearing Denied Jan. 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 10, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑18(3)—Evidence held to prove an indebtedness, sustaining plaintiff's claim that lessee held lease as security only.

Evidence held to prove an indebtedness of K. to a defendant, sustaining plaintiff's contention that a lease to a defendant belonged in fact to K., who assigned to plaintiff, but was executed to defendant as security for debts owed by K. to such defendant.

2. Evidence 🔑158(28)—Testimony as to items charged to witness not competent; books being best evidence.

In an action for an accounting, testimony of plaintiffs' assignor that certain payments of wages were charged to him by a defendant was not competent; such defendant's books being the best evidence.

3. Account 🔑18—Copy of statement admissible over objection it did not show it related to land in suit.

In an action for an accounting, copy of statement furnished to plaintiffs' assignor by a defendant's bookkeeper held admissible over objection that there was nothing to show that it related to the land involved in the suit.

4. Pleading 🔑237(1)—Court did not abuse discretion in denying motion to amend answer to correspond with proof.

In an action for an accounting, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendants' motion at the close of the evidence to amend their answer in a particular to correspond with the proof, where, in view of the facts found by the court, the denial sought to be incorporated by the amendment would not have corresponded with the proof.

5. Trial 🔑391—Specific finding on averments of answer including only probative facts not necessary.

In an action for an accounting, certain averments of the answer held to include nothing more than probative facts bearing on one of the principal issues tried and determined by the court, that is, whether or not a defendant took a lease on behalf of another defendant and in trust for plaintiffs' assignor, so that specific finding on such averments was not necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by William Goatman and R. P. Gage against O. B. Fuller and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. T. Clotfelter and E. T. Lucey, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Respondents, as assignees of one Peter Karales, brought this action to have it decreed that the plaintiffs are the owners of a certain lease of 320 acres of land, which was executed by Artesian Land Company to O. B. Fuller, and thereafter assigned by him to C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company, hereinafter called the Fuller Company, and for an accounting of the rents, issues, and profits thereof. An interlocutory decree was entered, whereby it was adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said lease. It was further ordered that the lease be assigned to the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs forthwith be given possession of the leased premises, that the subleases be assigned to the plaintiffs, and that the defendants O. B. Fuller and the Fuller Company account to the plaintiffs for the rents, issues, and profits of said Karales lease. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

Among other things, the court found that on the 24th day of September, 1917, Karales was engaged in the business of leasing, farming, and subletting farming lands and properties in the county of Orange, and in the course of said business, which he had carried on and conducted for some time prior thereto, had been given financial aid and assistance by the defendants Fuller Company and Pioneer Ranch Company, and had set over and assigned to said defendants various and sundry leasehold interests as security for his obligations to them; that on the 24th day of September, 1917, Karales had negotiated and secured the promise of a lease from the Artesian Land Company upon the terms and conditions of the lease here in question; that on said 24th day of September, 1917, when the said Artesian Land Company was about to make and execute said lease to Karales, the defendant O. B. Fuller, acting as the agent for and on behalf of the defendant Fuller Company, requested and demanded that said lease be made and executed to him, the said O. B. Fuller, and in his name, as further security for the moneys then owing and thereafter to become due from Karales to said Fuller Company; that thereupon Karales agreed to join O. B. Fuller in said request and demand; that thereupon, and pursuant to said request and demand, and solely by reason thereof, and for the said purposes stated, and not otherwise, the lessor made, executed, and delivered to the said O. B. Fuller, as the agent of and representing the Fuller Company, the said lease; that O. B. Fuller took said lease as such agent of the Fuller Company and in trust, with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of said company, for Karales and his successors and assigns, for the uses and purposes stated, and not otherwise; that Fuller thereafter executed an instrument assigning to the Fuller Company all the right, title and interest of Fuller in said lease; that the Fuller Company ever since has held and now holds the said lease in trust for Karales, his successors and assigns. Other facts are stated on which it was held that the plaintiffs are entitled to an accounting, and it was ordered that such accounting be made before the court.

Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify these findings, and especially that there is no evidence legally sufficient to sustain the finding that the lease was placed in the name of Fuller as further or any security for moneys owing from Karales to the Fuller Company. Incidental to this specification, appellants claim that the evidence is insufficient to establish the fact that on the 24th day of September, 1917, or at any time thereafter, Peter Karales was indebted to the defendants or any of them in any sum whatever. The argument is that, since there was no debt, therefore the testimony tending to show that the lease was made in the name of Fuller as security for a debt becomes legally insufficient to establish the conditions on which respondents rely as entitling them to the status of beneficiaries of a trust.

On the law of the case, counsel for appellants first refer to various decisions defining the character of evidence required to establish an equity of the kind asserted by respondents in this case. The gist of the rule, as applied where it is sought to show that a deed in form is in fact a mortgage, is set forth by Mr. Pomeroy as follows:

> "The presumption, of course, arises that the instrument is what it purports on its face to be, an absolute conveyance of the land; to overcome this presumption, and to establish its character as a mortgage, the cases all agree that the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, for otherwise the natural presumption will prevail." Pomeroy's Eq. Jurisp. (3d Ed.) § 1196.

We shall assume, without further discussion, that the rule is as thus declared and that it is applicable to this case. However, it also must be remembered that, where facts have been found by the trial court and the evidence is conflicting, the appellate court will not set aside those findings, unless the evidence favorable to the findings is so slight that it becomes legally insufficient to establish the facts. In a case of the kind now under consideration, therefore, the rule that the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing means no more than that the evidence in support of the findings, if believed by the court, must have been sufficient to furnish clear, unequivocal, and convincing proof of the facts found. If it was thus sufficient, then the fact that there was other and conflicting evidence, in which it appears that the court did not have confidence, cannot alter the legal effect of the evidence upon which the findings are based.

Prior to a date on or about May 5, 1917, Peter Karales had been indebted to the Pioneer Ranch Company, a corporation whose officers were the same persons as the officers of the Fuller Company. O. B. Fuller was president of the Fuller Company and vice president of the other. The indebtedness to the Ranch Company was, among other things, secured by a chattel mortgage on certain cattle, and by an assignment of a lease then held by Karales on a 935-acre tract owned by the Artesian Land Company and situated near the 320-acre tract described in the lease here involved. By foreclosure sale of the cattle, the indebtedness of Karales to the Pioneer Ranch Company was fully satisfied. A few days later, Peter Karales (together with his brother who had some interest therein) assigned to the Fuller Company said 935-acre lease. Appellants claim that at that time, in consideration of this assignment, and in connection with the Fuller Company's agreement to employ Peter Karales in its operation of said 935 acres, all indebtedness of Peter Karales to the Fuller Company was then and there satisfied and canceled. Peter Karales in his testimony denied the fact of such settlement agreement. The witnesses on the part of the appellants have not testified to any oral statements made between appellants and Peter Karales concerning this matter, nor to any written statement other than that Karales at said time executed the assignment of the 935-acre lease. At about that time the Fuller Company opened an account under the heading "Karales Ranch," in which items of receipts and expenditures were entered relating to the 935-acre tract, and in some instances relating to the 320-acre tract. This account also shows entries of $100 per month paid to Karales by the Fuller Company between May and October, 1917. During that period Karales was rendering services connected with all of these leased lands. Whether he was then merely an employee at a salary of $100 per month, or whether these were advancements made to Karales as a part of the transactions out of which his indebtedness arose, is one of the evidentiary questions of fact in dispute herein.

Prior to September 24, 1917, Karales on his own account had negotiated with Artesian Land Company for a lease of said 320 acres. The lease had been made out in his name, but he had not been able to make the initial payment of $220, without which the Land Company would not deliver the lease. By application made to Mr. Ramsey, an officer of the Fuller Company, Karales had asked the Fuller Company to advance this money for him. Finding Mr. Ramsey unwilling to comply with this request, Karales applied to the president, O. B. Fuller. Fuller and Karales went to W. H. Daum, manager of the Land Company, and had a conversation which resulted in the substitution of the name of O. B. Fuller for that of Peter Karales as lessee in the written lease which had been prepared. Thereafter Fuller paid the $220 and received the lease. Peter Karales testified that at that interview Mr. Fuller said to him:

> "Peter, I get everything in my name as collateral;" also, "I want to get this 320 acres in my name;" that "Daum turned around and asked me if that was so, if that was fair. I tell him all right; that is all there was."

Mr. Daum testified that at that interview Mr. Fuller said he would like to have the lease in his name, instead of Karales, as Mr. Karales would have to assign it anyway to protect funds that had been advanced. On cross-examination, Mr. Daum discriminated between the degrees of definiteness of his recollection of the facts, thus:

> "I would say I was positive that he said he would like to have it in his own name so far as the assignment was concerned; as to the balance it is the very best of my recollection."

The cross-examination on this point went on at great length, but the witness still insisted that the facts were as stated, to the best of his recollection. On the other hand, Mr. Fuller's version of the conversation at Daum's office is as follows:

> "I took that lease in my own name. We went up to Mr. Daum's, and I told him what we come for, and he asked me how I wanted the lease. I said I wanted it to myself, O. B. Fuller. He said to Peter, 'Is that all right?' Peter said, 'All right, go ahead and take it,' and I did so."

Again:

> "Did you give him (Daum) any reason for it? A. I don't think so."

With respect to the indebtedness, Fuller testified that Peter Karales never owed him personally any money at any time, and that since May, 1917, Karales had not owed the Fuller Company any money. About the beginning of December, 1918, pursuant to negotiations of Karales with the plaintiffs, Goatman and Gage, a transaction occurred whereby the 935-acre lease was assigned by the Fuller Company to the plaintiffs. Whether the consideration for that assignment was part of an ordinary sale made by the Fuller Company as lease owner, or whether plaintiffs took over the assignment by paying the amount of an existing debt of Karales to the Fuller Company, is an additional question of fact in the case. At about this time Karales and the witness Brown called at the office of the Fuller Company. Karales says that he asked Mr. Fuller for a statement; that Mr. Fuller told the bookkeeper, Mr. Pearl, to let him have it, and Pearl gave him a statement (a copy of which was introduced in evidence). Brown testified that he told Fuller he came in to talk about Peter Karales' account, stating that possibly he could raise the money; that Fuller asked for Mr. Ramsey to come into the room, and that Fuller asked Mr. Ramsey, "How much does Peter owe us?" that Ramsey stated the amount to be about $9,200; that Fuller said, "Peter, I want my money, or else I will close you up." Some days later they returned to the Fuller Company's office with Mr. Goatman and Mr. Gage. At that time a statement of account from the Fuller Company's books relating to these matters was produced by the company, and Mr. Fuller wrote at the top thereof "Peter Karales Ranch Account with C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company." It was in accordance with the balance shown by that statement that the payment was made in consideration of which the 935-acre lease was assigned to the plaintiffs. Mr. Gage testified that this heading on the statement was placed there by Mr. Fuller at his request, because there was no heading on it.

> "Q. You still thought it was a statement of Peter Karales' indebedness to C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company, didn't you? A. If it is not, somebody has misrepresented it to us; Mr. Fuller said it was."

However, on cross-examination this occurred:

"Q. Neither Mr. Karales nor Mr. O. B. Fuller told you at any time during these negotiations that Peter Karales was indebted to the company, did he? A. I don't know as he used the word you use, Mr. Clotfelter; but they said the balance due them on the Karales Ranch account was $10,200 and some odd dollars."

Mr. Goatman testified:

"I asked Mr. Fuller myself, sitting opposite across the table, if this money was what Mr. Karales owed you people, and he said 'Yes.' He went on to tell about Peter being a very fine fellow, but he had something to say about his not managing just as he should do, etc., and that six months ago Peter had a credit of $1,700."

Opposed to this we have Fuller's testimony that, when Karales and Brown asked him how much Peter Karales was owing the Fuller Company:

"I told them Peter Karales owed nothing; the indebtedness was an indebtedess that was owed by the Peter Karales Ranch to the C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company."

Fuller's explanation of the book account is that it was merely an expense account between the company and its leased property, showing expenditures and receipts on account thereof, and that in fixing the amount which they would accept for the assignment of the 935-acre lease, they established that consideration at "the difference between the outgo and the income on the ranch," instead of fixing a lump sum as the price. The reason, he said, was—

"because I told Peter Karales that, if he could sell out our interest in that thing and get our money out, that was all we wanted; we would be willing to lose our own time and all our work, if we could get our money out."

[1] Enough of the evidence has been stated here to test the question raised by appellants' contention that the evidence is insufficient to prove that any indebtedness of Karales to the Fuller Company existed on or about the 24th day of September, 1917. There had been such indebtedness. Was it settled and satisfied in May? If there was not an agreement whereby the transfer of the 935-acre lease to the Fuller Company was accepted by the creditor, and made by the debtor, as payment of the debt; if the 320-acre lease was made to Fuller, and passed to the Fuller Company by reason of the facts declared in the testimony of Daum and of Karales; if the corroborative facts existed as set forth in the testimony of Karales, Brown, Goatman, and Gage, concerning their conversations with Fuller and others at the Fuller Company's office, and the statements of account then furnished—then, from those facts, the court might reasonably determine, as the ultimate fact clearly, unequivocally, and convincingly established, that the 320-acre lease was placed in the name of Fuller as further security for the indebtedness of Karales to the Fuller Company. That those facts did exist may not be denied by this court, for there was evidence of them, which the trial court believed.

[2-5] Appellants argue in support of five alleged errors in rulings at the trial. The first is of slight importance, and the ruling was correct. The second relates to the overruling of an objection to a question asking Karales to whom certain payments of wages were charged after the payments had been made by the Fuller Company; in response to which the witness answered, "Charged to me." The evidence called for was not competent, as the company's books were the best evidence. It is, however, scarcely possible to conceive that this item appreciably affected the result of the action.

The third of these points is that the court erred in receiving in evidence a copy of the statement which had been furnished by the company's bookkeeper to Karales. The objection to this document was that it had been shown by the testimony of Mr. Pearl, the bookkeeper, that the document simply purported—

"to set forth the operating expenses and receipts in connection with some land and there is nothing on the face of the report to show that it relates to the land involved in this suit. Therefore no foundation has been laid."

Taken in connection with the testimony above mentioned, in which the circumstances under which the statement was given are shown, we think that the objection was not well taken.

The fourth of these claimed errors was the denial of a motion made by appellants, at the close of the evidence, to amend their answer in one particular to correspond with the proof; that is to say, by stating that the defendants deny:

"That on the 4th day of December, 1918, or at any time since May, 1917, Peter Karales was indebted to either of the defendants."

In view of the facts found by the court, which heretofore we have held are sufficiently sustained by the evidence, this denial would not have corresponded with the proof. Moreover, the nature of the evidence received indicates that the case was tried on the theory that such denial had been made. The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit the amendment.

Finally, appellants claim that the court failed to find on a material allegation in the answer. This allegation was as follows:

"The defendant O. B. Fuller alleges that, before he took said lease as before stated, the said Peter Karales informed him that unless he, the said Karales, were furnished the money necessary to be paid as a condition precedent to the execution and delivery of the lease by the Artesian Land Company to him on the lands described in the complaint, he, the said Karales, would be wholly unable to get the lease, and that said defendants C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company and Pioneer Ranch Company had refused to let him, the said Karales, have said money, and that he was therefore compelled to drop the negotiations for such lease and to give up the idea of obtaining the same; that but for such information on the part of said Karales the said defendant O. B. Fuller would not have taken said lease."

These averments of the answer include nothing else than probative facts bearing upon one of the principal issues tried and determined by the court, viz. whether or not O. B. Fuller took said lease on behalf of the Fuller Company and in trust for Karales. A specific finding upon the particulars stated in said paragraph of the answer was not necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOYT v. THOMAS et al. (Civ. 3440.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 8, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 3, 1921.)

1. Specific performance 🔑114(1)—Complaint to enforce agreement to make will must show money judgment not adequate relief.

Complaint in an action to enforce an agreement to make a will and devise property to plaintiff must show, either by direct averment or from a description of the character of the services rendered, that a money judgment would not furnish adequate compensation to plaintiff.

2. Specific performance 🔑114(1)—Complaint in action for specific performance of contract to make will insufficient.

Complaint alleging that plaintiff rendered personal services to decedent, and that as rendered they were worth $3,500, or thereabouts, and that decedent agreed to make a will in his favor therefor, held not to disclose services rendered by plaintiff such as to entitle him to specific performance of decedent's contract.

3. Pleading 🔑408—Denial in answer held not a waiver of right to question complaint as not showing right to relief.

Where defendants in an action for specific performance of contract to make a will by their answer denied that services of the value stated in the complaint, or of any value, had been rendered by plaintiff, by such denial they did not waive their right to question the complaint on the general ground that it failed to state sufficient facts to authorize equitable relief by way of specific performance to be administered.

4. Specific performance 🔑121(3)—Evidence held insufficient to show that services rendered could not be compensated in money.

In an action for specific performance of decedent's contract to make a will in favor of plaintiff, evidence held insufficient to support the trial court's finding that services rendered by plaintiff could not be compensated in money.

5. Appeal and error 🔑294(1), 553(2), 757(1)—Motion for new trial unnecessary to review of evidence under alternative method; reporter's transcript serves as bill of exceptions under alternative method; under alternative method brief should contain part of record referred to.

Under the alternative method of appeal, the reporter's transcript, prepared according to the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, serves all the puposes of a bill of exceptions to permit review of the evidence; it being necessary, however, that the parties print in their briefs such portions of the records as they desire to call to the attention of the court, and so absence of motion for new trial will not preclude review of the evidence under the alternative method.

Lloyd W. Moultrie, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment awarding to the plaintiff the relief demanded in his complaint.

Defendants are the heirs and distributees of the estate of Hattie McIntire, deceased. Hattie McIntire died intestate in September, 1917, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property which was appraised at the sum of $4,043.77. The value of the property distributed after settlement of the estate accounts is stated in the briefs to have been the sum of $3,469.12. This plaintiff presented and had allowed in his favor against the property of the estate two claims, one for rugs purchased, $20, and a second for money advanced, $85.30. Immediately upon the order settling the estate being made and distribution being had, plaintiff commenced this action. In his complaint he alleged that in March, 1903, a contract was entered into between plaintiff and Hattie McIntire, widow of William F. McIntire, whereby the said plaintiff promised the said Hattie McIntire that he would attend to her business affairs, particularly her said real estate, and perform such personal services for said Hattie McIntire as she should from time to time request during the remainder of her natural life; that in consideration thereof the said Hattie McIntire promised and agreed that all of the estate of which she died possessed should thereupon be and become the property and estate of the said plaintiff, Frank C. Hoyt; that said Hattie McIntire then and there promised and agreed that she would, prior to her death, execute a last will and testament, or such other papers as should be necessary to carry out the terms of said contract on her part, and to assure the possession of said property to said Frank C. Hoyt; that said Hattie McIntire died on or about the 19th day of September, 1917, without having executed said will or other papers, and without having transferred said property or any part thereof to plaintiff; that said agreement was and is just, fair, and equitable in all its terms and conditions, and the consideration moving to the said Hattie McIntire from plaintiff was and is adequate; that said plaintiff fully kept and performed each and every of the terms and agreements on his part to be kept and performed from the making of said contract until the death of said Hattie McIntire; that during all of said time he had charge of her business affairs and the management of her property, and performed all such personal services as the said Hattie McIntire required from time to time, and remained in charge of her said property after her death until he delivered possession of the same to the public administrator; that all of said services so performed by plaintiff for said Hattie McIntire in her lifetime were and are of the reasonable value of $3,500, or thereabouts. The allegations which we have quoted comprise all of the substantial averments of the complaint. The trial judge, under those allegations, made, among others, this finding:

> "That certain of the said services so performed by plaintiff for said Hattie McIntire in her lifetime were of a nature and character not to be compensated for by money alone, and that all of said services so performed by plaintiff for said Hattie McIntire in her lifetime, so far as the same can be valued in money, were and are of the reasonable value of $3,500, or thereabouts."

[1, 2] One of the points made is that the judgment cannot be sustained because it is predicated upon a complaint which fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a good cause for the equitable relief demanded and adjudged. The particular point in this objection goes to the question as to the right of a plaintiff in the circumstances alleged to have specific performance if it appears that he might have been adequately compensated in money. It will be noted that nowhere in the complaint is there a statement of what the particular alleged "personal services," which plaintiff asserted that he had rendered to Hattie McIntire, were. He affirmatively alleged that the services as rendered were worth "$3,500, or thereabouts." This allegation follows a general one that the contract was fair and equitable in all its terms and conditions and that the consideration was adequate. As we understand the law, it is settled that in a complaint in an action to enforce an agreement to make a will and devise property in favor of the plaintiff, it must appear, either by direct averment or from a description of the character of the services rendered, that a money payment would not furnish adequate compensation to the plaintiff. The fact that the plaintiff has fixed a definite sum as being the value, "or thereabouts," of the services rendered, would not alone vitiate the statement of a good cause of action for the relief demanded, provided the complaint had contained such a description of the services which were performed as to enable a court to say that the value of such services could not be adequately measured in money terms. We quote from the decision in Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148:

> "Equity, it is true, does entertain contracts for specific performance to convey the whole or any portion of the promisor's property by will, but it decrees such performance, first, only upon clear proof of fairness, justness, and adequacy, and where the rights of innocent third parties are not imperiled; and, second, it does so only where the plaintiff cannot be compensated in money. These cases usually arise where the service is of some extraordinary nature which cannot be, and in the contemplation of the parties was never expected to be, paid for in money, as where home ties are broken, and minors go to live with an adult upon his promise that he will stand in loco parentis and will to them his property in return for their filial services during his lifetime. * * * So it will be found that in all of the cases in which specific performance of these agreements to leave property by will has been decreed by the courts, there has been present the element of peculiar personal services, fully performed and incapable of compensation in money" (citing authorities).

In Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 Pac. 259, the Supreme Court, by the Chief Justice, said:

> "There is no dissent in the authorities from the proposition that one may make a valid contract with another to devise or bequeath property by his last will in a certain specified way. It is clear that in the event of a breach of such a contract, the party damaged has an action at law for the damage caused by such breach of the promisor, and in some cases this, by reason of the circumstances, may be his only remedy, for a resort to any equitable remedy can be had only where the circumstances are such as to make the case one within the well-settled principles relative to the proper exercise of equitable jurisdiction. Where the party damaged is restricted to his remedy at law for the breach, he must necessarily proceed upon the theory that he is a 'creditor' of the deceased, having a 'claim against the estate' 'arising upon contract,' within the meaning of those words as used in our probate law. * * *"

In our opinion, not only did the complaint in this action fail to disclose services rendered by the plaintiff of such a character as to entitle him to have specifically performed the contract alleged, but the effect of the affirmative allegation as to the value of such services makes it appear with reasonable certainty that plaintiff could have secured full redress by money claim against the estate of Hattie McIntire. Respondent admits that the general objection now made to the complaint was not waived by failing to demur (Code Civ. Proc. § 434), but does assert that because the defendants made denial of the allegation as to the value of the services they are estopped from questioning the sufficiency of the compaint in the regard mentioned.

[3] We do not think that the conclusion by any means follows. The defendants by their answer denied that services of the value stated or any value had been rendered, and by this denial assuredly they did not waive their right to question the complaint on the general ground that it failed to state sufficient facts to authorize equitable relief to be administered. The trial court evidently realized that it was necessary, in order to support the judgment, to make a finding that services had been performed which could not be valued in money, when it determined facts as we have shown in the finding quoted. The finding, however, lacks necessary support in the allegations of the complaint; and it appears to us also that, as appellants insist, it fails to find sufficient support in the evidence. Plaintiff testified that—

> Prior to the making of the agreement with Mrs. McIntire he had helped her around the house, mowed lawns, "and different things like that, little things, and I had been working in a grocery store and delivered groceries there; and there was a rubber elbow on the toilet that got a hole in it, broken, and I went to a hardware store and got another rubber elbow and put it on the toilet at that time. And she says, 'Frank, I haven't any people of my own, and you have been good to me, and if you will take care of things for me so long as I live, then whatever is left at the time of my death I will give to you.' I told her that I would do that; whatever she required me to do; take care of her, and do things for her."

The testimony further of the plaintiff was that he took up the study of the law at a school shortly thereafter; that he visited Mrs. McIntire on an average of probably two or three times a week, doing things about the house, cleaning the yard, fixing the fences, and some housework and washing; that that went on for a year or two, and then he looked after the making of certain contracts for her, made mortgage loans, and generally transacted her business as her representative; that about the year 1914 Mrs. McIntire became ill, and that he took medicines out to the suburban town where she was staying a number of times; that finally she became quite ill in 1917, and that he stayed at her house "quite a bit" nights, doing housework at times, and washing. He testified:

> "I went out nights after I would get through my work and stay overnight; and the neighbors helped her some. And then about a week or two before she went to the hospital she hired a woman who stayed there with her. * * * So I persuaded her, on the advice of her doctor, that she had better go to the hospital and rest up until her foot got in condition so she could get around. * * * Upon my advice she decided to go to the hospital. * * * I told her it would be difficult for me to see her very often out there [Glendale]; that if she wanted to see me, that I knew of a place in Hollywood that was a private hospital, a small hospital that she could go to and get very good care, and that seemed to please her and she decided to go there. And I took my machine and went and took her to that hospital in Hollywood. * * * I visited her there practically every day, and got whatever she needed in town, took it out to her and got things she wanted; alcohol for rubs and nightgowns and an air cushion; numerous things that I could not name definitely. It was paid for by her money. I never paid for anything for her out of my own pocket. She always paid me the money to get things for her, but she never paid me anything for any services rendered of any kind, that is, for whatever work I did, or car fare, or for traveling expenses, or anything like that. I took her out a great many times in an automobile the last three or four years; I took her a great many trips around the country. She never paid any expenses on account of anything like that, and she never paid anything of that sort, but, so far as the things she used herself or that I bought for her, she always paid for them. * * * Q. Now, Mr. Hoyt, what, in your opinion, was the value of the services you rendered to Mrs. McIntire from March, 1903, to the time of her death? A. Well, I would place the value of them at about $4,000."

[4] There was other testimony of a corroborative nature, consisting of alleged statements made by Mrs. McIntire to nurses and others, confirming the fact as to her having made the agreement alleged with plaintiff; and further as to the fact that plaintiff had been "more than a son" to her, and that deceased had said, "I will pay him well; anything left, it is for him when I am gone." Had this testimony stood alone, relating to the character of the services rendered, it perhaps might be proper to hold that the question as to whether the services were capable of being compensated for in money was one for the trial court. However, the plaintiff himself seems to have had it in his mind that the services had a particular and definite money value, for he testified, without apparent hesitation and without qualification, so far as the record shows, that in his opinion the services were worth, as stated, about $4,000. And so we think that the second point made by appellants, to wit, that the particular finding of the court herein referred to is not supported by the evidence, is well taken.

[5] Respondent's counsel insists that it is improper to review the evidence on an appeal from the judgment where it is not shown that there has been a motion for a new trial. Even under the established Code practice, and before the inventive brain of some practitioner, ever seeking an easier way to practice law, had evolved the so-called alternative method, the statute permitted the review of evidence upon an appeal from a judgment where the appeal was taken within 60 days and the evidence was presented in a bill of exceptions. Section 956, Code Civ. Proc., before amendment of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 328); Perkins v. Cooper et al. (Sup.) 24 Pac. 377. The case cited was given a hearing in bank and later the decision made on another point, but its argument has not been discountenanced by any later expression of the Supreme Court. Under the alternative method, the reporter's transcript, prepared according to the requirements of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, serves all the purposes of a bill of exceptions; it being necessary, however, that the parties print in their briefs such portions of the records as they desire to call to the attention of the court.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

HACKLEMAN v. LYMAN. (Civ. 3331.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 8, 1920.)

1. Fraud 🔑58(4) — Evidence insufficient to show purchaser relied on vendor's representations.

In an action to recover damages for fraudulent representations, as a result of which plaintiff purchased land from defendant, evidence held insufficient to warrant finding that plaintiff, believing the representations to be true, relied thereon and was thereby induced to purchase the property.

2. Fraud 🔑20—Purchaser making full investigation presumed to have relied on own judgment.

If a purchaser of realty visits the land prior to sale and makes a personal examination of it, touching representations made as to its quality, character, or condition, he will be presumed to rely, in making the purchase, not on the representations, but on his own judgment, if the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation being as full as he chooses.

3. Appeal and error 🔑553(2)—No bill of exceptions necessary under alternative method.

Under the alternative method of appeal no bill of exceptions is necessary.

4. Appeal and error 🔑294(1)—To secure review of sufficiency of evidence appellant need not present motion for new trial.

It is not necessary, to entitle appellant to review of the sufficiency of evidence to support the decision, that he first present to the trial court motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by L. B. Hackleman against C. A. Lyman. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lewis S. Riley and Chas. B. De Long, both of San Diego, for appellant.

E. R. Simon, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for alleged fraudulent representations made by defendant to plaintiff, as a result of which the latter, in reliance thereon, was induced to purchase certain land. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $450 and costs, from which the defendant has appealed.

It appears that defendant was the owner of 40 acres of unimproved land situated in Imperial Valley. The land was rough, and had never been ditched, leveled, bordered, or otherwise prepared for irrigation, without which it could not be cropped or cultivated. Negotiations were entered into between plaintiff and defendant which culminated in a purchase of the tract of land by plaintiff. As alleged in the complaint, the court found:

> That for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to purchase the land, defendant, during the negotiations, and "on or about the 15th day of May, 1916, and at various other times between that date and the 28th day of June, 1916, represented and stated to the plaintiff that the above-described land had had water over it, and that about 25 acres of said land was irrigable and could be put into a crop immediately after suitable ditches had been constructed and the land bordered;" "that all of said entire tract of land, excepting 12.2 acres, lies too high and at too great an elevation to be irrigated; that at the times said representations as aforesaid were made the ditches of the Imperial Eastside Water Company, a water company furnishing water for irrigation in the neighborhood of said land, ran to and adjacent to said tract of land; that all of said land, excepting 12.2 acres, lies above and is higher than the ditches of said water company, and it is impossible to bring water upon any portion of the 25 acres referred to by the defendant, excepting 12.2 acres thereof" —followed by findings to the effect that at the time defendant made said representations he knew the same to be false and untrue and made them for the purpose and with the intent that plaintiff should rely thereon, and that plaintiff did believe said representations and relied upon the same, as a result of which he made the purchase.

The sole contention of appellant is that these findings are not supported by the evidence.

[1] Conceding that defendant did make the representations that the land had had water on it and that 25 acres thereof was irrigable and could be put into crop immediately after suitable ditches had been constructed and the land bordered, all of which at the time he knew to be false and untrue, nevertheless legal fraud could not be predicated thereon unless it should be made to appear further that plaintiff, believing the same to be true, relied thereon and was thereby induced to purchase the property. Maxon-Nowlin Co. v. Norswing, 166 Cal. 509, 137 Pac. 240. Indeed, as to such facts the court found in favor of plaintiff; but, in our opinion, such finding, while necessary and material in support of the judgment, is not warranted by the evidence.

Disregarding all evidence offered on behalf of defendant, it appears from the testimony of plaintiff that after the making of the alleged misrepresentations he secured the services of William Orrick, who had had experience in leveling land and preparing it for irrigation, and with him went upon the land, where they spent two or three hours inspecting the same, at which time plaintiff consulted Orrick as to the cost of leveling "and whether or not the land would be irrigable." Orick testified that, "with a view of ascertaining whether or not the land could be irrigated," he and plaintiff walked all over it, after which they discussed the question as to whether the land could be irrigated and came to the conclusion that about 25 acres, when leveled, could be irrigated. It was apparent from the physical appearance of the land that it had not been cropped or irrigated. While inspecting the land, Orrick stated to defendant: "This land looks a little high to me; are you sure that it will irrigate?" to which defendant replied, "Yes." Orrick further states that he made a rough report to plaintiff and stated to him, "the land would have to be surveyed before it could be determined * * * which way the water would run"; that it did not look to him as though the water would run over the land from the service ditch designated by defendant; that the land looked higher than the ditch; and, in the presence of the plaintiff, he said: "I made the statement I didn't think water would run from the ditch on the land." "I made the remark, 'It don't look to me like the water would run out of that ditch onto the land.'" But further said, "When you get a surveyor and survey it, it might be different." Without such survey, Orrick said no man could tell positively whether the land could be irrigated. It further appeared that prior to the purchase plaintiff had resided in the valley more than ten years, during four years of which time he had been engaged in farming operations there and was familiar with the conditions which required land to be leveled, ditched, and bordered as a means of cultivating the same, and that water for such purpose was obtained by gravity through delivery ditches from the water company which assumed the duty of supplying lands with water. No statement was made by defendant that he had surveyed the land, without which, according to Orrick, no man could say just what part thereof could be irrigated. Hence plaintiff, having equal means of knowledge, and in the absence of any obstacle interposed by defendant to a full investigation of the matter, must be deemed to have known that defendant was in no better position to judge of the question than was Orrick or himself. It thus appears that, instead of relying upon the representations made by defendant, he, with the aid of Orrick, whom he had employed by reason of his experience in such matters and fitness for the service, made an independent examination, upon which he must be presumed to have acted, rather than upon the representations made by defendant.

[2] If a purchaser of real estate visits the property prior to the sale and makes a personal examination of it, touching representations made as to its quality, character, or condition, he will be presumed to rely, not upon the representations, but upon his own judgment in making the purchase, provided the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation being as full as he chooses. Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 257, 8 Sup. Ct. 881, 31 L. Ed. 678; Farrar v. Churchill, 135 U. S. 609, 10 Sup. Ct. 771, 34 L. Ed. 246; Wainscott v. Occidental, etc., Ass'n, 98 Cal. 253, 33 Pac. 88. In Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 398, 23 Pac. 28, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137, the court says:

> "The power to cancel a contract is a most extraordinary power. It is one which should be exercised with great caution—nay, I may say, with great reluctance—unless in a clear case. A too free use of this power would render all business uncertain, and, as has been said, make the length of a chancellor's foot the measure of individual rights. The greatest liberty of making contracts is essential to the business interests of the country. In general, the parties must look out for themselves."

It conclusively appears herein that plaintiff was unwilling to accept as true the representations made by defendant as to the questions involved, and thereupon sought the services of Orrick to make an independent investigation and advise him as to the questions involved. In our opinion, the case comes squarely within the rule announced by Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 893, which is as follows:

> "If, after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled by it. Such claim would simply be untrue. The same result must plainly follow when, after the representation, the party receiving it has given to him sufficient opportunity of examining into the real facts, when his attention is directed to the sources of information, and he commences, or purports or professes to commence, an investigation. The plainest motives of expediency and of justice require that he should be charged with all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end with diligence and completeness. He cannot claim that he did not learn the truth, and that he was misled."

And again, in section 894, the same author says:

> "If, in a contract of sale, * * * representations are made by the vendor concerning some * * * qualities or attributes of the subject-matter which are open and visible, so that the falsity of the statement is patent to an ordinary observer, and it is made to appear that the purchaser, at or shortly before the concluding of the contract, had seen the thing itself which constitutes the subject-matter, then a knowledge of the facts is chargeable upon such party; he is assumed to have made the agreement knowingly, and cannot allege that he was misled by the false representations."

In Attwood v. Small, 6 Clarke & F. 232, it was said:

> "If a purchaser, choosing to judge for himself, does not avail himself of the knowledge or means of knowledge open to him or his advisors he cannot be heard to say he was deceived by the vendor's misrepresentations."

In our opinion, the testimony of plaintiff and that offered on his behalf brings the case squarely within the rules announced by the foregoing authorities. As shown by the evidence, plaintiff did not rely upon the representations made by defendant, but, without any interference on the part of defendant, made an independent investigation, and, after obtaining the opinion and advice from the expert whose services he sought, he purchased the land, and hence should not now be heard to claim that he was deceived by the false representations made by defendant.

[3, 4] The appeal was taken within 60 days from the rendition of judgment and, in lieu of a bill of exceptions, the record is presented by a typewritten transcript of the phonographic notes, as provided by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. No motion for a new trial was made in the court below, and because of this fact respondent insists that plaintiff is not entitled to a review of the question touching the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. Such appears to have been the rule under the practice prior to the adoption of the Code, as decided in Reed v. Bernal, 40 Cal. 628. Under section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, an appeal may be taken from any judgment within 60 days from the entry of said judgment, and, as provided by section 956, Code of Civil Procedure, the court, upon the taking of such an appeal from the judgment, may review the verdict or decision. The findings of the court as to ultimate facts constitute the decision, and, under section 647, Code of Civil Procedure, are deemed to have been excepted to. Under the alternative method of appeal, no bill of exceptions is necessary. Neither is it necessary, in order to entitle an appellant to a review of the sufficiency of evidence to support the decision, that he first present to the trial court a motion for a new trial. The contention is without merit. Hoyt v. Thomas et al. (Civ. 3440) 195 Pac. 260 (this day filed).

The judgment is reversed.

1. Payment 🔑82(7) — Enforced satisfaction does not constitute "voluntary payment."

A "voluntary payment" means one made without compulsion, and one made on an illegal claim with knowledge of its illegality or groundlessness does not constitute "voluntary payment," and enforced satisfaction of a judgment is not "voluntary payment" thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Voluntary Payment.]

2. Payment 🔑82(2)—Whether payment is voluntary depends on facts of each particular case.

Whether payment of a judgment is voluntary depends on the facts of each particular case, as indicating an intention on the part of the payor to waive his legal rights.

A notice of a default judgment, sent by mail, but misdirected and never received, was not such a notice as is required by Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by F. W. Engelken against the Justice Court of Eden Township and W. J. Gannon, Justice of the Peace. From a judgment refusing writ of prohibition, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

See, also, 189 Pac. 298.

J. C. Thomas, of Susanville, for appellant.

Charles Quayle, of Oakland, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of the superior court in Alameda county refusing to prohibit the respondents from proceeding with an action originally commenced in the justice court.

In the justice court suit Engelken, the appellant, sued Manuel Faira in claim and delivery on an assigned claim from one Sanderlock for a nine year old Indian pony. The value of the pony was alleged to be $100. Manuel Faria, not Faira, was served with summons and complaint. The record shows that Sanderlock testified that he worked for Faria and for his work was to receive the pony. Thereupon default judgment was entered, not against Faira, but against Faria, for the pony, on in lieu thereof $100 and costs taxed at $7, on September 26, 1919. Notice of the judgment was immediately mailed by the justice of the peace to Manuel Faira and was thereafter returned by the postoffice undelivered. Execution on the judgment was issued October 2d. On November 7th the constable demanded payment of the judgment on the execution then in his hands for levy and Faria paid the $107, saying at the time to Engelken, who accompanied the constable with his attorney, "This is a hell of a game you are pulling off on me." On the following day Mrs. Manuel Faria called on the justice and was informed in regard to the judgment, and within ten days thereafter Faria filed affidavits with the justice setting forth, among other things, that he was unable to read the English language; that when he was served with the summons and complaint by the constable he explained his side of the controversy to the plaintiff, he was assured by the plaintiff that he was satisfied Sanderlock had no claim against him, and that he (Faria) understood from the conversation that nothing further would be done in the suit; that he had heard nothing further in regard to the matter until the constable demanded payment of the judgment under execution; and that he had a valid defense to the plaintiff's claim. Counter affidavits were filed by the plaintiff denying the statements contained in the affidavits of Faria. The prohibition proceeding was commenced in the superior court to prevent the justice of the peace from setting aside the default judgment.

Only two questions presented require determination. They are: First, whether or not the payment made by Faria was voluntary and in complete satisfaction of the judgment; and, secondly, if it was not, whether the justice court had power to vacate the default judgment under the provisions of section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1-3] A voluntary payment means one made without compulsion and one made on an illegal claim with knowledge of its illegality or groundlessness. Amsden v. Danielson, 19 R. I. 533, 35 Atl. 70; Redmond v. City of N. Y., 125 N. Y. 632, 26 N. E. 727; Davis v. Kling, 77 Hun, 598, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1029. When payment is made under species of compulsion it is not voluntary. Jones Co. v. Board of Education, 30 App. Div. 429, 51 N. Y. Supp. 953. It is the established rule in this state that an enforced satisfaction of a judgment does not constitute voluntary payment. Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 466–467, 132 Pac. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232. Whether payment of a judgment is voluntary or not depends upon the facts of each particular case as indicating an intention on the part of the payor to waive his legal rights. The determination of the superior court against the contentions of the plaintiff on the conflicting evidence presented upon this subject must be upheld.

[4] Section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a justice's court may relieve a party from a judgment by default taken against him by his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, "but the application for such relief must be made within ten days after notice of the entry of the judgment and upon an affidavit showing good cause therefor." There is no claim on the part of the plaintiff that any other notice was given Faria than the notice mailed by the justice. That notice was not addressed to Faria, but to Faira. It was not delivered through the post office to Faria, but was returned undelivered to the justice of the peace. It is too plain for argument that a notice of a default judgment addressed to a person other than the judgment debtor is not such a notice as is required by section 859, Code of Civil Procedure, to start time running within which a motion to vacate the judgment may be made. Faira and Faria are not idem sonans. The first notice received by Faria was on the date the execution was presented to him, and within ten days of that time he gave notice of motion. It was within time and the justice court had power to hear and determine the questions arising upon his showing of any of the grounds specified in the statute. The writ of prohibition was properly denied.

It is maintained that the appeal should be dismissed because of the failure of the transcript to show that an appeal bond was filed, the appeal being under the old method. A dismissal would have the same effect as an affirmance of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First appellate district, division 2, is denied.

The statement in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that "Faira and Faria are not idem sonans" is not necessary to the decision, and, as we are not prepared to accept it as a precedent, we withhold approval thereof. The decision is fully supported by the facts that the defendant did not in fact receive any notice whatever of the rendition of the judgment and that the notice sent by mail was misdirected. The court had discretion in such a case to open the default and allow him to present his defense.

KENNEDY v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(Civ. 3364; L. A. 6794.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 26, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 25, 1921.)

1. Master and servant 🔑416—Industrial Commission has continuing jurisdiction over compensation award.

The Industrial Accident Commission has continuing jurisdiction on a showing of good cause to rescind, alter, or amend any decision or award made by it until 245 weeks from the date of injury, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, subd. "a," notwithstanding section 55, subd. "b," and sections 64, 65, and 67.

2. Courts 🔑30 — Jurisdiction continues until final judgment.

It is elemental that, where a tribunal has jurisdiction over parties and subject-matter, the jurisdiction continues until final judgment shall have been entered.

3. Master and servant 🔑416—Continuing jurisdiction of Industrial Commission not limited by statute conferring power, "including" right to increase or diminish award.

The broad grant of continuing jurisdiction in the Industrial Accident Commission to rescind, amend, or alter any decision for a period of 245 weeks after the injury as conferred by the general terms of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, subd. "d," is not to be limited by the more particular reference in that section to the Commission's right "to review, grant, regrant, diminish, decrease, or terminate" any award upon the ground that the "disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated"; the word "including" in such section not being a word of limitation, but rather a word of enlargement, and in ordinary signification implying that something else has been given beyond the general language that precedes it.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Master and servant 🔑416—Industrial Commission has jurisdiction to amend award after expiration of time for rehearing.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where the Commission, on finding of injury in the course of and arising out of employment, made an award against the insurance carrier, which claimed that its policy did not cover the injury, but made no order relieving the employer and left the case undecided as to him, and the award against the insurance carrier was annulled by a court of competent jurisdiction, the Commission had jurisdiction to amend the award and insert the name of the employer in place of that of the insurance carrier, after the expiration of the time within which application could have been made for a rehearing under section 55, subd. "b," and sections 64, 65, and 67, and that without invoking the "continuing jurisdiction" expressly granted by section 20, subd. "d," since it had jurisdiction over the parties and subject-matter until final judgment was entered.

In Bank.

Proceeding by J. L. Millard and Mrs. Julia E. Millard under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for the death of a son, Byron J. Millard, opposed by P. R. Kennedy, the employer, and the Western Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. From an award of compensation against the employer, he brings certiorari. Award affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Swanwick & Donnelly, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a petition by P. R. Kennedy for the review of an amended award made against him by the Industrial Accident Commission. Petitioner was the employer of Byron J. Millard, deceased, who was killed on October 9, 1918, while in petitioner's employ. The Commission awarded a death benefit to the applicants therefor, the parents of young Millard. The sole question presented is this: The applicants for the death benefit having failed to apply to the Commission, within the time provided by the statute, for a rehearing, did the Commission, nevertheless, have the power to amend the award after the expiration of the time within which application could have been made to it for a rehearing?

The facts necessary to an understanding of the question are these: The Western Indemnity Company, an insurance carrier, agreed to respond to any damage that might occur on account of injuries or death suffered by any employee of Kennedy in and during the course of and arising out of the operation of the trade, business, or work described in its policy of indemnity insurance. The injury that caused the death of young Millard was sustained in the course of and arose out of his employment by Kennedy, but did not occur in the course of, nor did it arise out of, the operation of the particular trade, business, or work described in the insurance policy. See Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 185 Pac. 306, for a more detailed statement of the terms of the policy and of the facts respecting the cause of the injury.

Both Kennedy and the insurance carrier were made parties to the proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission. The principal controversy there was whether the indemnity policy covered this particular injury or not. The Commission, one commissioner dissenting, determined that the injury that caused young Millard's death was covered by the insurance policy, and accordingly, on May 14, 1919, made an award against the insurance carrier, the Western Indemnity Company, awarding to the parents of young Millard a death benefit recoverable from the carrier. The Commission did not make any order relieving Kennedy from liability on the ground that it appeared from the proof that the insurance carrier, joined as a party to the proceeding, was liable for all of the death benefit, as it was authorized to do by subdivision 2 of subdivision "e" of section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Stats. 1917, p. 860. Instead, the Commission, apparently out of an excess of caution, probably anticipating that the award against the carrier might be annulled on a review thereof on certiorari, left the case undecided as to Kennedy, making no award against him and no final decision discharging him from liability. This course doubtless was adopted by the Commission to the end that, if the award against the insurance carrier should be annulled by a court of competent jurisdiction, it still would be possible to enter an award against Kennedy, as the employer.

Thereafter the insurance carrier, having applied in vain for a rehearing by the Commission, applied to the District Court of Appeal for a writ of review. The writ was granted, and the court, by decision rendered October 8, 1919—Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra—annulled the award against the insurance carrier on the ground that the policy did not cover the injury that resulted in the death of young Millard.

In due time the court's remittitur was sent down to the Commission, and on March 11, 1920, the Commission caused to be served on Kennedy, the petitioner here, a notice of its intention to amend its award of May 14, 1919, by substituting Kennedy in the place and stead of the Western Indemnity Company as the party liable under the award. On April 7, 1920, the Commission, over Kennedy's objection, amended the original award—the award of May 14, 1919, against the Western Indemnity Company—by making an award against Kennedy for the amount of the death benefit that it previously had adjudged to be due to the applicants on account of their son's death. In due time petitioner applied to the Commission for a rehearing. A rehearing was denied. Kennedy thereupon petitioned this court for a writ of review to annul the amended award so made against him. He is seeking for an annulment of the award against him upon the ground that the Commission had not the power thus to amend its award after the expiration of the time provided by the statute within which the applicants for the death benefit could have petitioned the Commission for a rehearing on the original award of May 14, 1919.

Sections 64 and 65 of the Workmen's Compensation Act relate to the matter of rehearings before the Commission. Section 64 provides that persons aggrieved by any award of the Commission may apply to the Commission for a rehearing in respect to matters determined by it of which they complain. That section likewise prescribes the procedure for making and serving the application for rehearing and for the determination thereof by the Commission. Section 65 states the grounds upon which applications for rehearing may be made, and provides that application for such rehearing by the Commission must be made by the aggrieved party "at any time within twenty days after the service of any final order or decision of the commission awarding or denying compensation, or arising out of or incidental thereto."

By section 67 it is provided that "within thirty days after the application for a rehearing [by the Commission] is denied, or, if the application is granted, within thirty days after the rendition of the decision on the rehearing, any party affected thereby" may apply to the Supreme Court or to a district Court of Appeal for a writ of review to determine the lawfulness of the award or final decision of the Commission.

By subdivision "b" of section 55 it is provided that all findings, decisions, and awards of the Commission shall be conclusively presumed to be lawful until and unless they are modified or set aside by the Commission, or upon a review by the courts as in the act specified, "within the time and in the manner herein specified."

As applied to a rehearing by the Commission on the application of an aggrieved party, the foregoing provisions are susceptible of but one construction. From the language of section 65 and subdivision "b" of section 55 it clearly appears that a party aggrieved by the award or final decision of the Commission, notwithstanding he may have good cause for a rehearing by that body, cannot, as strict matter of right, demand such rehearing unless, within 20 days after service of the decision awarding or denying compensation, he file with the Commission his application for a rehearing. These provisions of the act apply to rehearings that are initiated by a party to the proceeding. Under these provisions the right of a party thus to initiate proceedings for a rehearing is conditioned by his obligation to do so within 20 days after service of the Commission's final decision or award.

[1] But there are other provisions of the act under which, good cause appearing therefor, the Commission itself, on its own initiative, or on its attention being called to facts showing good cause, and at any time within 245 weeks from the date of the injury, may rescind, alter, or amend any decision or award made by it. The Commission is expressly given "continuing jurisdiction," during that period of time, to rescind, alter, or amend any order, decision, or award that it may have made under sections 6 to 31, inclusive, if there be good cause shown for such rescission, alteration, or amendment.

Subdivision "d" of section 20 of the act in force at the time of the injury that caused young Millard's death—the present Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 850)—reads:

> "The Commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limits prescribed by this act, any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury."

(The word "including" has been italicized by us to call attention to the fact that the power conferred upon the Commission by the clause in which that word occurs is included within, and therefore is but a part of, the broader power conferred by the preceding words of the section as quoted by us.)

Under the above-quoted subdivision "d" of section 20 of the act of 1917, "continuing jurisdiction," for the full period of 245 weeks after the injury, is specifically conferred upon the Commission "over all its orders, decisions and awards." By virtue of such "continuing jurisdiction" the Commission, after notice to and an opportunity to be heard by the party in interest, is specifically empowered to "rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it, upon good cause appearing therefor." This is a broad and general grant of "continuing jurisdiction." The act does not profess to say what shall be deemed to constitute "good cause" for the rescission, alteration, or amendment of any order, decision, or award. It does, however, declare, by positive legislative fiat that the act "shall be liberally construed * * * with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Section 69.

[2] Without attempting to define the "good cause," the existence of which is a prerequisite to the exercise by the Commission of its continuing jurisdiction to rescind, alter, or amend its orders, decisions, or awards—that had best be left to the gradual process of exclusion and inclusion as cases arise that involve an exercise of the power—we have no doubt that the facts in the instant case constituted "good cause" within the meaning of the statute. The findings of the Commission show that the applicants, the parents of young Millard, were entitled to payment of a death benefit and in the amount fixed by the Commission's findings. The findings, as they existed prior to the decision of the District Court of Appeal in Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, further show that Kennedy, the employer, is liable for that death benefit save only as such liability may be affected by the further finding that the Western Indemnity Company was the insurance carrier at the time of the injury and as such liable for the full compensation. The District Court of Appeal specifically adjudged that "the findings and award" against the Western Indemnity Company be annulled. By the court's annulment of the finding that the Western Indemnity Company was the insurance carrier and as such liable for the death benefit, the remaining findings, left unaffected by the court's decision, show on their face that Kennedy, and Kennedy alone, is liable. In other words, since the time when the decision of the District Court of Appeal became final, Kennedy's liability for the death benefit follows as a legal conclusion from the findings made and filed by the Commission. And yet, notwithstanding this fact, no decision was ever made by the Commission awarding or denying payment of compensation by Kennedy prior to the time when it amended its award on April 7, 1920, by substituting Kennedy for the Western Indemnity Company. Until then the proceeding, as to Kennedy, was left open and undetermined. Under this condition of the record, we entertain no doubt that, in the exercise of its "continuing jurisdiction," expressly granted to it by subdivision "d" of section 20 of the act, to rescind, alter, or amend any order, decision, or award made by it under the provisions of sections 6 to 31, inclusive, the Commission had the power to amend its award by substituting Kennedy for the Western Indemnity Company as the person by whom the death benefit shall be paid and against whom the award should be made. Indeed, we doubt if, under these circumstances, it is necessary to invoke the "continuing jurisdiction" expressly granted to the Commission by the Workmen's Compensation Act. Never having entered judgment for or against Kennedy prior to the entry of the amended award of April 7, 1920, the Commission, aside from the "continuing jurisdiction" vested in it by subdivision "d" of section 20, always had jurisdiction to enter a judgment or decision for or against him, and therefore had jurisdiction to make its award of April 7, 1920, awarding young Millard's parents a death benefit payable by Kennedy. It is elementary that, where a tribunal has jurisdiction over parties and subject-matter, the jurisdiction continues until final judgment shall have been entered.

Counsel for petitioner place their main reliance upon the decision of our Supreme Court in Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 289.[1] There it was held that the "continuing jurisdiction" given to the Industrial Accident Commission by the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (subdivision 4, § 25, and subdivision "b," § 82) is given for the sole purpose of making such rescissions, alterations, or amendments of the original decision or award as may be required by the occurrence of any new fact or facts whereby the disability of the person in whose favor the award originally was made has been increased, diminished, or terminated. Counsel for petitioner, gratuitously assuming that the act of 1917 is susceptible of the same construction that the court in the Georgia Casualty Company Case put upon the act of 1913, argue against the Commission's jurisdiction to enter the amended award of April 7, 1920, upon the ground that the decision of the District Court of Appeal, whereby the findings and award against the insurance carrier were annulled, was not a new fact, occurring after the original award, whereby disability was either increased, diminished, or terminated.

The vice of counsel's argument lies in the assumption that the "continuing jurisdiction" conferred upon the Commission by the act of 1917 is no greater or other than that which had been conferred upon it by the act of 1913. Under the act of 1913 "continuing jurisdiction" was given to the Commission in general terms by subdivision "d" of section 25 (Stats. 1913, p. 293.) That subdivision read:

> "The Commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections twelve to thirty-five, inclusive, * * * and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the accident."

It was held in the Georgia Casualty Company Case that the broad grant of continuing jurisdiction thus conferred in general terms by subdivision "d" of section 25 of the act of 1913 was, in effect, limited by the language of subdivision "b" of section 82 (Stats. 1913, p. 317). That subdivision read:

> "Nothing contained in this section shall, however, be construed to limit the right of the Commission, at any time within two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of its award, and from time to time, after due notice and upon the application of any party interested, to review, diminish or increase, within the limits provided by this act, any compensation awarded upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either increased or diminished or terminated."

In construing the several provisions of the act of 1913, and endeavoring to harmonize them, the Supreme Court held that these two sections—sections 25 and 82, disconnected in their respective positions in the act, but connected in their mutual reference to the powers of the Commission over its orders, decisions, and awards—should be read together, and should be so construed as to present one harmonious system for the re-examination by the Commission of the matters decided by it. The court said:

> "When these several sections are so read and construed together, it seems quite obvious that the provisions of subdivision 'b' of section 82, which permit the Commission within the period of 245 weeks after its award to rescind, diminish, or increase the same 'upon grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either increased or diminished or terminated,' contemplate a change in conditions arising after the making of the original award, and by which the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has been either increased, diminished or terminated, and that under this subdivision of section 82 of the act the power of the Commission thus extended over the period of 245 weeks after the date of its original award is limited in its exercise to the consideration of such facts only as have arisen since the making of such award, and that it is only upon the proof of such facts that the Commission has jurisdiction to review, diminish or increase such award." (Italics ours.)

It is obvious that the court's reference to new facts that "have arisen since the making of such award" means such new facts as affect the disability of the person in whose favor the award was originally made, by increasing, diminishing, or terminating such disability.

[1] 170 P. 625.

[3] No such narrow construction can be put upon the language of subdivision "d" of section 20 of the present act, whereby "continuing jurisdiction" is conferred upon the Commission. The sections of the act of 1913 that related to the Commission's continuing jurisdiction—section 25, subd. "d," and section 82, subd. "b"—could be harmonized only by construing the general terms of section 25 as limited by the more restrictive language of section 82. But the broad grant of continuing jurisdiction as conferred by the geneal terms of subdivision "d" of section 20 of the present act is not to be thus limited by the more particular reference in that section to the Commission's right "to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate" any award upon the ground "that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated." True, subdivision "d" of section 20 of the present act is, to a large extent, a re-embodiment, mutatis mutandis, of subdivision "d" of section 25 and subdivision "b" of section 82 of the act of 1913; the provisions of these two sections of the act of 1913 being embodied, with few, but important, changes in subdivision "d" of section 20 of the act of 1917. But, though subdivision "d" of section 20 of the act of 1917 is largely a re-embodiment of subdivision "d" of section 25 and subdivision "b" of section 82 of the act of 1913, still subdivision "d" of section 20 of the present act is vastly different from a mere re-enactment of the corresponding provisions of the act of 1913. The present act, in subdivision "d" of section 20, declares, in general terms, that at any time within 245 weeks from the date of the injury the Commission "shall have continuing jurisdiction over its orders, decisions and awards * * * and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision, or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor." This general grant, in itself unlimited save as to the time within which the power may be exercised, is followed by a more particular provision, namely, a particular reference to the power of the Commission to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase, or terminate any award "upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated." But the language of this more specific or particular reference to the exercise of the Commission's "continuing jurisdiction," so far from limiting the preceding general grant of power, implies the very opposite. The use of the word "including" in the phrase "such power including the right to review," etc., indicates that the power that the Commission may exercise under its grant of continuing jurisdiction is more than the mere power to "review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate" an award on the ground that the disability has "recurred, increased, diminished or terminated." "Including" is not a word of limitation. Rather it is a word of enlargement, and in ordinary signification implies that something else has been given beyond the general language that precedes it. Fraser v. Bentel, 161 Cal. 394;[2] In re Goetz, 75 N. Y. Supp. 750.[3] As here employed, the word "including" is used to express the idea that the specific power to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase, or terminate an award upon the ground that the disability has recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated—a particular power specifically referred to in the section of the present act—is but a part of the larger and more comprehensive power conferred by the more general language of the immediately preceding clause of the section. One of the definitions of "include," as given by Webster, is:

> "To comprehend or comprise, as a genus, the species, the whole a part, an argument or reason the inference; to contain; to embrace."

For these reasons we conclude that the particular power conferred by that clause of subdivision "d" of section 20 which begins with the words "such power including the right to review" is but a part of, and not a limitation upon, the larger and more general power granted by the clause which confers upon the Commission "continuing jurisdiction" or power to rescind, alter or amend any * * * order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor."

As we have seen, the general grant of power conferred upon the Commission by the more general language of subdivision "d" of section 20 of the present act is broad enough to include the amendment of the award that was made by the Industrial Accident Commission in the present instance. We conclude, therefore, that the award against petitioner should be, and it is, affirmed.

We concur: THOMAS, J.; WELLER, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

In denying the application we desire to say that we are not to be understood as approving all that is said in the opinion as to the proper construction H of subdivision "d" of section 20 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 850) with relation to the powers of the Industrial Accident Commission in view of the "continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards" thereby given. Some of the language in the opinion with relation to the power of the Commission over its awards under this provision is rather broad, and we prefer to reserve any intimation of our opinion as to its correctness, deeming it in no way essential to the judgment of the District Court of Appeal. The conclusion of the District Court of Appeal finds full support in the facts of this case as stated in the opinion, without any necessity of invoking this "continuing jurisdiction" provision, as is fully shown and stated in the opinion.

[2] 119 Pac. 509, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1062.

[3] 71 App. Div. 272.

All concur.

SNEARLY et al. v. HIESTAND et al.

(Civ. 3648.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 10, 1921.)

1. Quieting title ⚿47(2) — Inconsistency of finding as to possession held not fatal.

In action to quiet title, inconsistency of findings as to possession of the land held not fatal; plaintiff not being required to have possession.

2. Quieting title ⚿12(1)—Plaintiff not required to be in possession.

It is not necessary, in order to maintain an action to quiet title, that an owner should be in possession.

3. Appeal and error ⚿907(3)—On appeal on judgment roll, inconsistency between findings as to ultimate fact and probative facts held not fatal.

In vendor's action against purchaser in default to quiet title, inconsistency between findings that vendors were the owners of the property involved, and the purchasers had no interest therein, and findings as to probative facts, showing that vendors waived default, held, on appeal by purchasers on the judgment roll, not fatal to judgment for vendors, in absence of showing that such probative facts were the only facts proven at the trial, since on appeal on judgment roll alone findings must be construed to support judgment.

4. Trial ⚿398—Finding of ultimate fact not to be overcome by a finding of probative facts.

The finding of an ultimate fact cannot be overcome by a finding of probative facts, unless it clearly appears that the finding of the ultimate fact is entirely based on probative facts which are destructive of the former, or that the trial court made the finding of the ultimate fact as a conclusion from the particular facts found.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by George Snearly and another against McClellan B. Hiestand and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. O'Brien, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Eden & Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiffs to quiet title to the land described in the complaint. Defendants in their amended answer allege that the parties entered into an agreement, by the terms of which plaintiffs agreed to sell and defendants to purchase the property here involved for the sum of $2,400, payable as follows: $125 upon the execution of the agreement, and $50 thereafter monthly until the full sum of $900 was paid, and the assumption by defendants of a mortgage upon the property amounting to the sum of $1,500. That the defendants further agreed to pay all taxes assessed against the property and the interest on the mortgage from the date of the same. The agreement provided that time was of the essence of the contract, and in the event of failure to comply with its terms the plaintiffs would be released from all duty to convey, and defendants should forfeit all rights to any sums of money paid thereunder. The answer further alleged the payment by defendants of four different installments amounting to the sum of $350, together with the dates of payment, and a statement of certain amounts paid by defendants to plaintiffs to apply upon interest on the mortgage of $1,500. These payments were made at different dates between December, 1916, and April, 1918. They were seven in number, and aggregated the sum of $165. Possession in defendants was also alleged, and it was recited in the answer that none of the payments to apply on the principal sum due under the agreement were made when due, and that by the acceptance of such payments when overdue plaintiffs waived the condition in the agreement that time was of the essence thereof. By other recitals the defendants claimed that under the agreement final payment became due on the 11th day of March, 1918, and that plaintiffs had not tendered to defendants any deed to the property or a certificate of title as provided for in their agreement. The cause was tried, and judgment went for plaintiffs. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. The case is here appealed on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] Defendants rely for reversal upon the sole ground of uncertainty and inconsistency in the findings. In this behalf it is first claimed that the findings are inconsistent for the reason that in one portion thereof the court recites that plaintiffs were in possession and in another part that defendants were in possession of the property. Conceding this to be true, it can avail appellants nothing, for the finding upon the question is immaterial. It is not now necessary in order to maintain an action to quiet title that an owner should be in possession. Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 Pac. 517; Phillips v. Menotti, 167 Cal. 328, 139 Pac. 796.

[3, 4] Again it is claimed that the findings are inconsistent on the question of ownership. The record does not support this contention. Upon this question the court made a specific finding as follows: "That plaintiffs in the above entitled action are now and for a long time prior hereto have been the owners," etc.; and, further, "that the defendants have not any estate, right, title or interest whatever in or to said premises or any portion thereof;" and, again, "The court further finds that the plaintiffs above named are the owners of the said premises." The findings further show the existence of the agreement, the amount of payments made thereunder, together with the dates when made, the default of the defendants under the contract, and a recital that plaintiffs had not waived the conditions as set forth in the agreement by accepting payments after the same had become due, and that plaintiffs had not tendered a deed and the certificate of title provided for upon final payment. Appellant insists for this reason that the findings are contradictory and self-destructive, in that they clearly show that every payment upon the principal sum having been made subsequent to its due date, plaintiffs waived the condition that time was of the essence of the contract, and that the right of forfeiture provided for could only be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of adherence thereto, and, the findings not showing that such notice had been given, that they clearly show a waiver of this condition. It is further claimed that the finding that plaintiffs had not tendered a deed is fatal to respondents' case. We are cited to Stevenson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751, and Boone v. Templeton, 158 Cal. 297, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, as supporting appellants' contention. These cases lay down certain principles concerning the relative rights and duties of vendors and purchasers under installment contracts relating to the sale of land, but with which we are not concerned on this appeal. As above indicated, the findings show plaintiffs to be the owners of the land, and that defendants have no interest therein. These are findings of ultimate facts, based on evidence produced at the trial, and they cannot be overcome by the probative facts found by the court. The case is here on the judgment roll alone. The findings must be construed so as to uphold the judgment. In the absence of a bill of exceptions, or the evidence, this court is unable to say what facts were proven at the trial upon which the ultimate findings of fact are based. The finding of an ultimate fact cannot be overcome by a finding of probative facts, unless it clearly appears that the finding of the ultimate fact is entirely based on probative facts which are destructive of the former, or where it appears that the trial court made the finding of the ultimate fact as a conclusion from the particular facts found. Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 639, 44 Pac. 319, 52 Am. St. Rep. 201. Here there is nothing to show that the probative facts found are the only facts proven at the trial. If such were the case, appellants should have presented a bill of exceptions, so that we might examine the evidence. The record before us throws no light upon the subject, nor does it limit the effect of the ultimate facts found, every intendment being in favor of the judgment. Estate of Hill, 167 Cal. 59, 138 Pac. 690.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

LOVELACE v. CRENSHAW et al.

(Civ. 3430.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1920.)

Vendor and purchaser 🔑212 — Assignee of contract held not to assume obligations of original vendor.

A grantee of land and assignee of contract of sale of such land held not to assume the obligations of the original vendor, the property being conveyed and the contracts assigned as security for an indebtedness of the original vendor to the grantee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Joseph Lovelace against G. L. Crenshaw and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. L. Kilgore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hickcox & Crenshaw and Harry W. Hanson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This action was brought in part to compel specific performance of a contract made by defendant Brent Investment Company, whereby said investment company agreed, in consideration of certain payments to be made to it, to convey to the plaintiff a certain parcel of real estate. Judgment was in favor of all of the defendants except the Brent Investment Company, and plaintiff has appealed therefrom. The judgment as to said investment company was for the recovery of damages only. So far as the appeal is concerned, the only complaint made by the plaintiff is that the defendant Crenshaw should have been required to respond under the judgment, on the ground that he had assumed the obligations of Brent Investment Company. This claim arises through the fact that, after the making of the contract between the Brent Investment Company and the plaintiff, the contract, together with a number of others of similar kind, was assigned to Crenshaw as security for an indebtedness owing by the Brent concern to said Crenshaw. A deed in ordinary grant form was also made for a like purpose by the Brents, conveying to Crenshaw the whole of the property involved. As a matter of fact, that property was at the time subject to a mortgage securing a large indebtedness of the Brents to others of the defendants. The evidence was clear to the point that both the assignment of the contracts and the making of the deed were acts done by the Brents to secure to Crenshaw the payment of money due from the former to the latter. To be sure, the contract holders, the plaintiff being one of these, made payments thereafter to Crenshaw, but by no act that the record discloses did Crenshaw assume the obligations of the original vendor. The legal condition resulting from these same facts was before this court and given full consideration in the case of Lewis v. Crenshaw et al., 191 Pac. 72, the only substantial difference being that the plaintiff there was a different contract holder. His contract, however, was of the same kind, affected a part of the same property, and was dealt with in the same manner as was the plaintiff's here. It will be unnecessary to repeat the discussion in that decision made, and we refer to it as containing expression of the views which we hold as to the points involved in this appeal. The contentions advanced in the Lewis Case were resolved against the plaintiff there.

The judgment is affirmed.

DURBIN et al. v. HILLMAN. (Civ. 2108.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 10, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹173(6)—Objection that authorization of agent to buy was not in writing must be made below.

Though under Civ. Code, § 1091, contract for sale of personalty at a price in excess of $200 is invalid unless in writing, and though under section 2309 authority of an agent to enter into such a contract must be in writing, yet, the contract not being void if not in writing, but the requirement of the statute being waivable, and the agency and sale having been shown by oral testimony without objection, objection that the contract of authorization was invalid cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

2. New trial ⟹102(9) — Not authorized by showing forgetfulness of evidence without excuse.

A showing of forgetfulness of evidence, without any showing tending to excuse the forgetfulness, does not entitle one to new trial as for newly discovered evidence.

3. Appeal and error ⟹173(7)—Objection to agent acting in own name waived.

A principal is not relieved from liability on a purchase made by his agent in his own name, he not having at any time before appeal, from judgment against him, raised the point or repudiated the transaction on that account, though under Civ. Code, § 2322, general authority does not authorize an agent to act in his own name.

4. Appeal and error ⟹1151(2) — Judgment may be modified for excessive allowance of interest.

Judgment may be modified on appeal because of an allowance by the jury, carried into the judgment, of a year's interest in excess of the proper amount.

5. Interest ⟹66—Need not be prayed in a contested case.

The complaint need not contain a prayer for interest in a contested case, as any relief that is within the issues may be granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by P. J. Durbin and another against C. D. Hillman. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oliver O. Clark, George M. Pierson, and Claud B. Andrews, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The defendant brings this appeal from a judgment rendered against him for the purchase price of personal property at a price in excess of $200. The contract was in writing, and the actual purchase was effected through the medium of an agent. The authority of this agent was wholly oral. The defendant did not accept any part of the purchased property nor pay any part of the purchase price. He repudiates the sale and disclaims any authority in the agent to represent him. At no time until the hearing on this appeal has he based his action upon the absence of a writing. Every issue in the case has been resolved against the defendant by stipulation of the parties, save that of agency. The attorney for the defendant stated the stipulation as follows:

> "I would like to state that it is purely a question of agency. That seems to be the only issue in the case."

[1] The evidence in support of the sale and of the agency was abundantly sufficient to support the verdict if such evidence was competent for that purpose. It was all oral, but it was received without objection. The defendant chose to waive all other defenses and to rest his entire defense upon the single one as to the agency of the party purporting to represent him, waiving even, as we shall see further along, the defense that the authority of the agent was oral. It is not controverted that the authority of an agent to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing must itself be reduced to writing. Section 2309, Civ. Code. Although the only question reserved for the jury was the question of "agency," still we are inclined to hold that this limitation does not withdraw from the jury the issue as to the potency of the oral authorization to the agent. A denial by the defendant that the purported agent was in fact his agent necessarily implies a denial that he was such an agent as, in view of the provisions of said section, was clothed with authority to make the particular purchase.

The actual authority itself being derived from the very words which are relied upon to constitute the agency, that agency is valid only in proportion as the authority itself is valid. A person cannot be an agent to do nothing. But no objection was interposed to this oral evidence, nor is there in the entire record any suggestion on the part of the defendant that he desired or intended to rely upon a want of written authority. By his silence he waived this point. There appears to be nothing unlawful, immoral, or against public policy in such a waiver. There are certain classes of transactions which are at once void if certain formalities are not observed. Section 1091, Civ. Code. A void contract is a nullity—of no effect. It cannot be ratified, and any attempted ratification must in itself be the equivalent of an original contract. But those contracts that come under the provisions of the statute of frauds, other than those relating to transfers of interests or estates in real property, are only "invalid." We are not called upon to attempt to define the very difficult word "invalid," as used in section 1624 of the Civil Code, but it is sufficient for our purpose to say that it describes a condition that falls short of being void. Such contracts may be ratified, and it is held that the benefit of the statute may be waived. In Sweetland v. Shattuck, 66 Cal. 31, 4 Pac. 885, Mr. Justice Ross, speaking for the court, says:

> "Assuming that the agreement upon which the plaintiff relied for a recovery was required to be evidenced by writing, the plaintiff was permitted in the court below to give proof of the agreement without objection that it was not in writing. Such objection cannot be made here for the first time."

And from Schultz v. Noble, 77 Cal. 79, 19 Pac. 182, we quote the following extract:

> "It has been held, where an action was brought to enforce a contract required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and parol proof of the contract was admitted without objection, that the contracting party could not have the proofs stricken out because it subsequently appeared that the contract was only a verbal one."

And quoting from another case in the same volume:

> "Conceding now that the contract declared on was void, by reason of the statute of frauds, because it was verbal, still, as no objection was made by plaintiff to the evidence when offered, it must be held that the right to invoke the statute of frauds was waived by the appellant, and it cannot now be invoked * * * as a reason why the judgment should be reversed or a new trial granted." Nunez v. Morgan, 77 Cal. 433, 19 Pac. 755.
> "But the statute of frauds * * * was * * * undoubtedly intended to establish mere rules of evidence. * * * In other words, the original object of the statute was unquestionably to lay down in express terms certain rules by which only certain contracts in themselves, perfectly legal and valid could be proved. The provisions of the statute * * * affected the remedy—that is, in effect deprived the party seeking to enforce the contract coming within their purview of his right of action if such contract were not in writing." In re Balfour & Garrette, 14 Cal. App. 261, 111 Pac. 615.

In this case a rehearing before the Supreme Court was denied. Its doctrines are peculiarly applicable to the instant case. Section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not render the contracts to which it relates ab initio void, and it reaches only the method of establishing the contract. This being so, the defendant lost all right to object for the first time on appeal that the contract of authorization was invalid because it was not reduced to writing. Our attention has been directed to no California case that questions the principle laid down by the foregoing authorities. We could add a number of cases not cited, all pointing to the same conclusion. It is true that in Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, quoting from page 535, 21 Pac. 984, at page 988 (4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162), the commissioner states: "A parol contract within such a statute is void." If void, of course no measure or kind of proof could sustain or vivify it. But that case is not in conflict with the foregoing. The commissioner had before him a case involving estates in real property, and as applied to such estates his observation just quoted is true. Moreover, he was not considering the subject of the statute of frauds as to the general classes arising under section 1624 and section 1973, supra. No more is the more recent case of Gard v. Ramos, 23 Cal. App. 303, 138 Pac. 108, an authority to the contrary. The court in that case, it is true, did hold that the party did not waive the statute of frauds by failure to object to oral evidence of the terms of the contract. But in that case the oral evidence was offered as a part of a chain of proofs to show that the defendant had accepted delivery of part of the goods. The oral evidence was perfectly proper for that purpose, and it would have been inconsistent and unlawful for the court to have excluded it. As soon as it was seen that the proofs of delivery fell short, the defendant raised the point and was sustained by the trial court. In the case before us the learned trial judge must have held a view in harmony with the quoted cases, since he denied a motion for a new trial.

[2] The motion for a new trial was properly denied. The affidavits do not show any newly discovered evidence. Mere forgetfulness that the evidence existed without any showing that tends to excuse the forgetfulness does not entitle a party to a new trial. Converse v. Ferguson, 166 Cal. 1, 134 Pac. 977.

[3] The claim urged that the agent purchased the property in his own name is unimportant. It is true that this was in violation of the terms of section 2322 of the Civil Code, but the agent is not disputing the validity of the sale, and the defendant did not raise the point in the court below. He did not at the time of purchase or at any time afterward repudiate the sale upon that ground. Beyond all this, the point is covered by the terms of the stipulation.

[4, 5] The jury awarded just one year's interest in excess of the proper amount. This court may direct the proper modification of the judgment. Smith v. Johnson, 23 Cal. 65; Kerry v. Pacific Marine Co., 121 Cal. 564, 54 Pac. 89, 66 Am. St. Rep. 65. The complaint contains no prayer for interest. This, however, is unnecessary in a contested case. Any relief may be granted that is within the issues. Lane v. Gluckauf, 28 Cal. 288, 87 Am. Dec. 121, and a long line of following cases.

The judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the interest for one full year, to wit, $142, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed; the respondents to recover costs.

DUNNE v. HINES et al. (Civ. 3668.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 1, California. Dec. 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑933(4)—Order granting new trial presumably not granted for insufficiency of evidence.

Where order granting new trial did not specify that it was granted for insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, authorizing a presumption of no such ground in such case, the appellate court on appeal from the order will not examine the testimony.

2. New trial 🔑6—Discretionary with trial court.

Much is committed to the discretion of the trial court in considering grounds for a new trial.

3. Railroads 🔑282(9)—Negligence in shunting cars in industrial yard held for jury.

The backing up of cars in an industrial yard without rear end light where there was evidence that deceased yard employee had been told of the approach of the cars held not negligence as a matter of law; the question being for the jury.

4. Death 🔑58(1)—Presumption of due care controvertible.

When death is caused without eyewitnesses, the presumption is that the decedent was exercising due and proper care for his own safety, but such presumption is controvertible.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Mary Dunne, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Dunne, deceased, against Walker D. Hines, as Agent, under section 206, Transportation Act of 1920 (Southern Pacific Company), substituted for Walker D. Hines, as Director General of Railroads, and the United States Railroad Administration. Verdict for plaintiff, and from an order granting the defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert H. Borland, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward F. Fitzpatrick and A. Kincaid, both of Redwood City (Henley C. Booth, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Dunne, deceased, brought this action against Walker D. Hines as Director General of Railroads of the United States Railroad Administration, to recover for the death of the decedent, alleged to have been killed through the negligent operation of cars belonging to the Southern Pacific Company, at a time while said Dunne was engaged in the performance of his duties as a laborer in the yard of the Pacific Coast Steel Company. The defendants filed an answer in which they denied all the allegations of the complaint, and stated that said decedent, Thomas Dunne, was killed through his own negligence and by colliding with the car of the defendants. Trial was had by jury, which returned a unanimous verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $15,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was granted, from which order the plaintiff has appealed.

The motion for a new trial was based upon several grounds, to wit: Excessive damages; insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; that said verdict was against law; and errors of law occurring at the trial. The order of the court was as follows:

> "It was never pretended by any one that the deceased was not killed by defendant's cars moving in the nighttime without lights or a lookout. This want of lights or a lookout is claimed by plaintiff to constitute negligence rendering the defendant liable for the death; and the court at plaintiff's request so instructed the jury thereby eliminating any other question or consideration and leaving nothing for the jury to do but fix the amount of the damage. The instruction was tantamount to a direction to find for plaintiff. A verdict so based cannot be sustained, and a new trial—regrettable though it be—must be granted. Accordingly the verdict is set aside, and a new trial of the above-entitled action is hereby ordered."

[1] "When a new trial is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict the order shall so specify; otherwise on appeal from such order it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground." Code Civ. Proc. § 657. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, for us to examine the testimony which was brought here by the alternative method. Respondent is not here contending that the verdict was excessive; hence our examination narrows to a consideration of certain instructions amounting, in the opinion of the trial court, to errors of law warranting the granting of the new trial.

On the night in question a number of gondola cars, in which scrap iron and steel had been hauled into the yards of the Pacific Coast Steel Company, were being unloaded by the use of an electric magnet suspended from a traveling crane, by means of which the scrap was transferred from the cars to a pile alongside of the track. Thomas Dunne, the decedent, was instructed by the night foreman to clean out the gondolas of any scrap iron which the magnet did not pick up, and also to clear the track between the cars and near the scrap pile, in order that the switching of the cars might not be obstructed. Such had been his particular duty for about a month, and he had worked in the yard for about twice that time. He was last seen alive by the night foreman about 1:30 o'clock on the morning of the 23d of August, 1918, at which time he was engaged in throwing scrap out of the cars, which were then spotted on the scale and crane track, about 10 or 11 car lengths from the scale. At that time the foreman told him to walk back along the track toward the scale, as soon as the cars were empty, and see that the track was cleared of all scrap so that the engine of the defendant could come in and move the cars. Some time later Arnall, the switching foreman, in charge of defendant's crew, went up this track to see if it was clear. He found Dunne working in one of the gondola cars, and told the decedent that "they were coming in on the track." He had warned Dunne a number of times about keeping out of the way of the trains and cars when they were being switched. The night in question was clear, and the decedent could plainly see from where he was working, a distance of several hundred feet along the track, in the direction from which the cars would come in.

Arnall then caused his crew to shunt eight cars over the scale, allowing them to drift, with no light on the front end, and with no brakeman in place to control the cars, or give warning of their approach. Fifteen minutes afterwards the switching foreman found the body of the decedent, lying at right angles to the track, face downward, nearly severed at the waist, with the head between the rails. Absence of a light and the brakeman or any one to give warning of the approach of the cars while switching was customary, and was admitted as a fact in the case.

The court instructed the jury, at the request of the defendant, that if the deceased had been notified that the cars were about to be operated on the track, it was not negligence for the defendant to operate the same without showing any lights, or having a man on the front of the car, or giving any other warning, and that their verdict should be for the defendants, unless the lack of the man or lights was the proximate cause, without his fault, of the decedent's death, while in another part of the charge, at the request of the plaintiff, the jury was instructed to find for the plaintiff if it found that the defendants carelessly, negligently, and without giving warning or displaying a light on the front of said cars, shunted or pushed a string of empty cars over and upon the decedent. The jury was further instructed, at plaintiff's request, that if at the time of the accident "the defendants were operating a switching engine and pushing cars ahead of said engine, and that at said time there was no light displayed on the head of the car of said train, or that by reason thereof" the decedent was killed, "the failure to display said light was negligence on the part of the defendant," and immediately following, also at the request of the plaintiff, "that it is negligence per se to set a single car in motion at a place where human beings are allowed and likely to be injured without having a lookout or workman thereon in a position to perceive or avoid danger to said persons and warn said persons of the approach of said cars." These instructions were followed by the giving of the following:

> "I instruct you that, if at the time of the accident in question the defendants, their agents or employees, were pushing, shunting, or otherwise propelling cars ahead of the switch engine belonging to the defendant, and that no light was displayed on the front of the first of said cars, and that no switchman or workman was riding upon said car in a position to see or give warning of the approach of said car, and that by reason thereof the said Thomas Dunne was injured, then I instruct you that your verdict should be for the plaintiff.
> "I instruct you that at night a light must be put upon a moving and backing train sufficient to warn persons attempting to cross the track at lawful places of the approach of said train.
> "I instruct you that, if you believe from the evidence that Elmer Arnall was the foreman in charge of said switching crew, and that he, the said Elmer Arnall, had no notice or knowledge that the defendant Thomas Dunne was working on the said track in the vicinity where he was killed, and that he, the said Elmer Arnall, failed to place a light on the first car being pushed ahead of said engine or to place a switchman thereon, and that as a result of said failure so to do the said Thomas Dunne was injured or killed, then I instruct you that your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[2, 3] These instructions not only misstate the law, but are contradictory, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff upon the finding by the jury of the various facts specified therein, without embracing all the things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant, and to warrant the direction or conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 183, 184, 118 Pac. 700; Killelea v. California Horseshoe Co., 140 Cal. 602, 604, 605, 74 Pac. 157. Appellant contends that other instructions correctly state the law in these respects as favorably to the defendant as was warranted. But the giving of these other instructions if appellant be correct in her estimation of their effect, only serve to produce a still greater conflict in the instructions, and it is impossible for us to say which portion of the charge the jury followed in arriving at a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The trial court was convinced that the jury was improperly influenced by the instructions, and much is committed to its discretion in considering such grounds for a new trial. Thompson v. California Construction Co., 148 Cal. 35, 38, 82 Pac. 367.

The instructions misstated the law. A court might be justified in declaring as a matter of law, that it was negligence, under some circumstances, for a railroad company to permit its cars, or even a single car, to move along its track, without having some one on the same to control its movements, or without a warning light; but the question presented by the case is an entirely different one. The cars were permitted to go along the track in an industrial yard, where no persons might be expected to be present except those who might be familiar with the customary conditions existing, and the mode of conducting the business of the place. If it was negligence to permit the cars to be operated as described, it was not such that the court could pronounce it negligence as a matter of law. Kelley v. C., M. & St. P. Ry., 53 Wis. 74, 9 N. W. 816. Whether it was negligence or not for the servants of the railroad company to shunt the cars onto the scale track, without stationing some one on the foremost car, to signal its approach to the decedent, or any other persons who might be on or near the track, and without having a light thereon, was controlled by all the circumstances under which the cars were operated, as disclosed by the testimony, and was purely a question of fact for the jury to determine. Carraher v. S. F. Bridge Co., 81 Cal. 98, 102, 22 Pac. 480; Southern Ry. Co. v. Daves, 108 Va. 378, 61 S. E. 748. The trial court, by its instructions, took the right and duty of deciding the question away from the jury. and its action was clearly erroneous. Ryan v. Oakland Gas, Light & Heat Co., 10 Cal. App. 484, 489, 102 Pac. 558.

[4] While it is true, as argued by appellant, that when death is caused under circumstances such as these, without eyewitnesses, the presumption arises that the decedent was exercising due and proper care for his own safety, such presumption is controvertible, and it still remains for the jury to say whether or not, under all the circumstances of the case, the acts on the part of the defendant complained of amounted to negligence. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 506, 143 Pac. 714; Ross v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys. Co., 191 Pac. 703.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

In the matter of the estate of Peter McGuirk, deceased, wherein Mrs. Lizzie Kersey contested admission of decedent's will to probate, and from judgment admitting it to probate appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, Jackson Mahon, for appellant.

J. W. Wiley and R. B. Lambert, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Peter McGuirk died on the 3d day of August, 1919, leaving an olographic will, dated June 7, 1918. Upon the presentation of the will for probate by Josephine H. Gunston, the sole legatee named therein, a contest thereof, upon the ground that at the time of the execution of the will the deceased was not of sound or disposing mind or memory and was incompetent to make a will, was filed by Mrs. Lizzie Kersey, a sister of deceased. The case was tried before a jury and, at the conclusion of contestant's evidence, the court granted a nonsuit and rendered a judgment admitting the will to probate, from which contestant has appealed.

[1] Appellant concedes the well-recognized rule that insanity of a testator, in order to affect the validity of his will, must be either of such a broad character as to establish mental incapacity generally, or some specific form thereof, by reason of which the testator is the victim of hallucination or delusion. Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 168, 113 Pac. 130; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 670, 164 Pac. 1110. No claim is made that the testator, when he made the will, was subject to delusions; but it is insisted that—

> "The testator was mentally incompetent to execute a will because of the broad and general character of his unsoundness of mind, an unsoundness of mind that first became marked some 25 years prior to the execution of the will (when he had a stroke of paralysis), and which grew worse and became more marked from year to year up to the death of the testator."

[2] It appears from the evidence introduced that at the time of his death Peter McGuirk was about 62 years of age, unmarried and without other heirs than his brothers and sisters, all of whom were of mature age. All of the witnesses testified that in their opinion deceased was, at the time when he made the will, of unsound mind. The facts upon which such persons based their conclusions, and without which their opinions could in no event be of any weight (Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 190, 81 Pac. 534), are that, in 1894 testator had a stroke of paralysis, prior to which time he was an active man, both mentally and physically; that as a result of such affliction his physical condition was impaired, and thence to the time of his death a marked change was noted in his disposition and conduct towards other persons, including his mother, towards whom he used abusive language, and on one or two occasions, during altercations, tried to strike her with a cane or poker; that on one occasion, while camping in the mountains, he was partaking of a meal consisting of macaroni and beans, among which were worms and maggots. While physically unable to dress or care for himself without assistance, he, in 1910, put in a bid for a contract to carry the mail, and in 1912 ran for supervisor. He frequently stated his neighbors were trying to rob him, and both the living and the dead were made the subject of his curses. In conversation he would change from one subject to another, and frequently, for considerable periods of time, would engage in talking to himself, acted indecently in the presence of ladies, and once or twice mistook a niece for her cousin. In talking about his land, he, in the opinion of the witness, placed an exorbitant value thereon. No attempt was apparently made to show the time to which in their testimony the witnesses referred with relation to the time of making the will. His conduct from which the witnesses concluded that he was of unsound mind covered a period of 20 years, and the evidence is to the effect that deceased grew worse mentally and physically from the time he had the stroke to the time of his death some 25 years later. Andrew McGuirk, a brother of deceased, testified that he was led to believe that testator was of unsound mind because he refused to buy a piece of land which his mother advised him to purchase, and in failing to do so he made a mistake; that he abused his brother and applied vile epithets to him, both before and after he was paralyzed, but did not abuse him as much before the affliction as he did afterwards. The deceased for several years prior to his death lived at the house of the contestee, and she nursed, cared for, and assisted him in the transaction of his business, and doing such things which by reason of his physical infirmity he could not readily do for himself. He kept a bank account, and frequently drew checks thereon; and for some four years prior to his death transacted business with the contestant as a lessee of his land, which she occupied as a tenant, and to whom he executed a contract or option to buy the same. As stated, the will was in his own handwriting, but copied from one prepared by his attorney under his instructions, and to whom he said he wanted it worded so as to carry out his intentions, and so there would be no technicality upon which they could break it.

The foregoing constitutes a fair statement of the evidence most favorable to contestant, and the question presented thereon is whether it was such as to have demanded of the trial court that it deny the motion for nonsuit and submit the question to the determination of the jury.

That the testator was unmindful of the presence of ladies when engaged in his duties to nature, used intemperate and profane language on all occasions, was eccentric, and said and did things inconsistent with what might be deemed conventional rules, may be readily conceded. Nevertheless, and assuming further that his conduct justified the inference that his mental faculties were impaired and weakened to an extent which warranted the conclusion, as stated by witnesses, that he was of unsound mind, there is nothing in the evidence which tends, either directly or inferentially, to prove that his testamentary act was in the slightest degree influenced or affected by the condition of mind which prompted him to say and do things upon which the witnesses based their opinion. "The rule of law is not that no person who is insane may make a valid will, but that the will of no person who, by reason of insanity, is incapable of making valid testamentary disposition shall be upheld." Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 168, 113 Pac. 130. Under the circumstances, and due to the fact that the testator had, for years preceding the making of the will, made his home at the house of the contestee, who had during such time looked after his wants and cared for him when occasion demanded it, and assisted him in the transaction of his business affairs and the handling of his property, the value of which appears not to exceed $8,500, it was most natural that he should make her the recipient of his bounty. The facts herein are quite similar to those involved in Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 Pac. 1110, wherein the will of the deceased in that case was attacked, as here, upon the contention that decedent was not of sound and disposing mind at the time of the execution of the will. The appeal therein was from an order revoking the probate of the will, and upon a review of the evidence, which was much stronger in favor of the contestant than that here presented, the Supreme Court reversed the order.

The judgment is affirmed.

MALTBY v. CONKLIN et al.

(Civ. 3482; L. A. 6266.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟹254(1)—Foundation of doctrine of vendor's lien stated.

The foundation of the doctrine as to lien of a vendor is in the principles of equity and moral justice that a person who has acquired the estate of another ought not in conscience, as between them, to be allowed to keep it and not pay the consideration money.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟹251—Vendor's lien does not exist while vendor has title.

So long as a vendor retains title, he has an express lien for unpaid purchase money, and a vendor's lien does not exist until he has parted with title.

3. Estoppel ⟹52—No waiver of right until it exists.

One cannot impliedly waive a right before such right exists.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟹266(8)—Vendor's lien held not waived by conveyance.

Vendor's lien was not waived by an agreement contained in a contract of sale to retain the title to the property as security for the payment of the purchase price, and hence vendor had a vendor's lien on the property where he conveyed it to the vendee before payment of the purchase price, under Civ. Code, § 3046.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟹301 — Remedy of vendor on failure of purchaser to pay.

A vendor retaining the title may sue at law for the balance of the purchase money or file his bill in equity for the specific performance of the contract and take an alternative decree that, if the purchaser will not accept the conveyance and pay the purchase money, the premises be sold to raise the money, and that the vendee pay any deficiency remaining after the application of the proceeds arising upon such sale.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟹265(1)—Grantee without consideration held to hold subject to vendor's lien.

Persons to whom land was conveyed by the vendee without consideration for the purpose of sale to another had no standing in equity in an action by one to foreclose a vendor's lien.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑280(3)—Waiver of vendor's lien cannot be shown unless pleaded.

In action against grantees of vendee to enforce a vendor's lien, defendants could not urge that plaintiff's acceptance of a mortgage from the vendee deprived plaintiff of his vendor's lien, where defendants did not plead a waiver of the vendor's lien.

8. Vendor and purchaser 🔑281(1)—Lien presumed to exist as incident of sale.

A vendor's lien is presumed to exist and is an incident of the transaction of sale in all cases unless the intention of the vendor that it shall not exist be clearly manifested by his acts or declarations, and the burden of proof is upon the vendee or his successors to show such intention.

9. Pleading 🔑236(1) — Permitting amendments within discretion of trial court.

The permitting or refusing of amendments to pleadings is a matter within the judicial discretion of the trial court.

10. Pleading 🔑229—Amendments only allowed in furtherance of justice.

Amendments to pleadings are only allowed in furtherance of justice, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

11. Vendor and purchaser 🔑266(8)—Taking of unrecorded mortgage waiver of vendor's lien.

Taking by vendor of an unrecorded mortgage was a waiver of his vendor's lien.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1041(3) — No complaint of refusal to permit amendment which would not have changed result.

Court did not err in refusing to permit an amendment to an answer where the final result would have been exactly the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Guy Maltby against J. Conklin, Jr., and wife and Lorenzo F. Miller and others. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant and others appeal. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

W. C. Wilde, of San Diego, for appellants.

W. R. Andrews, of San Diego, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants Lorenzo F. Miller, Hattie E. Miller, A. G. Wilde, and Mark Wilde, from a judgment for plaintiff. The action was brought to have ascertained the amount of the purchase price due to plaintiff from defendants J. Conklin, Jr., and Sara Conklin for certain real property in San Diego, and to have said amount declared a lien upon the said premises; also to have whatever interests the defendants, other than the Conklins, might have in the property declared to be subsequent and subject to the said lien of plaintiff. Plaintiff also prayed for a sale of the property under his lien, and for general relief.

The facts of the case are: On May 11, 1915, plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants Conklin under which it was agreed that plaintiff would sell to said Conklins lot 11 in block 17, Ocean Beach, San Diego, for the sum of $752.05. A copy of this contract is attached to the complaint. It contains the provisions above mentioned and the further provision that the title to the property is to remain in the vendor until the full purchase price is paid, and that a deed to the property executed by plaintiff should be placed in the hands of an escrow holder with instructions to deliver the same to defendants Conklin upon the payment of all installments of the purchase price; but in the event of default in any particular by said defendants the deed to be returned to the vendor and the purchase contract canceled. In pursuance of said contract, plaintiff executed the deed provided for therein, and placed the same, together with the contract of purchase and sale with the escrow holder. Plaintiff also placed the defendants Conklin in possession of the property. On September 23, 1916, while Conklins were in possession of the property, and with no further payment than the initial payment of $10, plaintiff delivered to defendants Conklin a deed to said property. No further payments were ever made upon the purchase price. It is further alleged that the purchase price has not been secured to plaintiff otherwise than by the personal obligation of the Conklins. It was alleged that the defendants Miller acquired the property without consideration, and with full knowledge of plaintiff's lien and claim for the purchase price thereof, and that the other defendants Wilde acquired their interest under a deed of trust, with full knowledge of all the facts.

[1-4] The first contention of appellants is that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, as the complaint does not state a cause of action. This is based upon the argument that it appears by the complaint that the vendor's lien upon the premises was waived by the agreement contained in the contract to retain the title to the property as security for the payment of the purchase price, and that this lien, having been once waived, could never be revived again by relinquishing the security so provided to be retained. Therefore appellants argue, when a deed was actually given to the Conklins by the plaintiff, without the payment of the purchase price, the plaintiff was merely waiving the security which he had reserved to himself in lieu of the vendor's lien, and consequently he was left with no security whatever, neither the vendor's lien nor the lien reserved by the written contract. We think there is no merit in this contention. The foundation of the doctrine as to the lien of a vendor is in the general principles of equity and moral justice that a person who has acquired the estate of another ought not in conscience, as between them, to be allowed to keep it and not pay the consideration money. Selna v. Selna, 125 Cal. 357, 58 Pac. 16, 73 Am. St. Rep. 47. So long as the vendor retains title, he has an express lien for unpaid purchase money. Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619, 25 Pac. 919, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272. A vendor's lien does not exist until the vendor has parted with title. Avery v. Clark, supra, 87 Cal. 625, 25 Pac. 919, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272. It is apparent that one cannot impliedly waive a right before such right exists. In the present case, when the contract was made for the sale of the property, reserving the title in the vendor until full performance by the vendee, there was as yet no equitable vendor's lien in existence because the title had not yet been conveyed; that being true, the vendor did not by entering into this contract waive his vendor's lien. The law implies no lien from a mere contract to pay the purchase money; and, where the vendor has title, he has it without any occasion for a lien. Vance Redwood Lumber Co. v. Durphy, 8 Cal. App. 664, 671, 97 Pac. 702. It was not until later when he transferred to the defendants the legal title, without payment of the consideration, that the law created for him a vendor's lien. Section 3046, Civ. Code; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467, 471; Tripp v. Duane, 74 Cal. 85, 91, 15 Pac. 439. The complaint sets out no transaction occurring subsequent to the time of the creation of the equity of the vendor's lien which indicates a waiver of such lien.

[5] A situation somewhat similar to that presented by the present case was considered in the case of Finnell v. Finnell, 156 Cal. 589, at page 597, 105 Pac. 740, at page 743, 134 Am. St. Rep. 143. In that case it appeared that the vendor had at first demanded a mortgage from the vendee as security for the unpaid purchase price, but later withdrew that demand and conveyed to the vendee without such security being given him. The court said in discussing this matter:

> "The fact that plaintiff asked his father to give a mortgage as security for the balance of the purchase money and that his father declined to do so certainly does not show any disposition on plaintiff's part to waive any security given him by the law. It shows, on the contrary, that he did desire to obtain, if possible, a written contract of security, and the utmost shown by his subsequent willingness to convey without obtaining this is that he withdrew his demand for such a contract, not that he waived anything given him by the law."

Likewise in the present case the transaction shown in the complaint indicates that the plaintiff abandoned his right to have an express lien upon the property, but does not indicate that he also relinquished the less valuable right of a vendor's lien. As stated by the court in Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 194, in the case of a vendor's lien, the vendor has parted with the legal and equitable title, and possesses only a bare right, which is of no operative force or effect until established by the decree of the court; while in a case of retention of the legal title as security for the purchase money the vendor's position is in some respects similar to what it would have been had he executed a conveyance to the vendee and taken from him a mortgage upon the property. A vendor retaining the title may in like manner sue at law for the balance of the purchase money, or file his bill in equity for the specific performance of the contract, and take an alternative decree that, if the purchaser will not accept the conveyance and pay the purchase money, the premises be sold to raise the money, and that the vendee pay any deficiency remaining after the application of the proceeds arising upon such sale.

It therefore appears that the express lien which the plaintiff was entitled to insist upon under the contract was a larger right than the implied vendor's lien. By a conveyance of the property without payment of the consideration, plaintiff waived this larger right, but certainly he did not thereby waive the lesser right to a vendor's lien. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants.

The evidence and findings show that the appellants Lorenzo F. Miller and Hattie E. Miller, his wife, received the property without consideration and with full knowledge of the transaction between the plaintiff and his vendee, Conklin. The record shows that Lorenzo F. Miller was a brother of Sara Conklin, wife of the plaintiff's vendee. When the Conklins left the state of California, Miller undertook to dispose of this parcel of land together with the improvements thereon, and to pay the plaintiff the amount due upon the purchase price. This clearly appears from the correspondence between the parties and from the findings of the court. For this purpose, Miller asked that the legal title to the property be conveyed to him so that he might execute a deed to a purchaser, which he claimed to have found. Solely for this purpose a deed was sent to him conveying the property to him. No consideration was paid for the execution of this deed, and Miller was instructed not to record the same unless the anticipated sale could be consummated. He, however, did record the deed, making himself the record owner. He never consummated any sale, but later executed a deed of trust upon the property for $235, in favor of the defendants Wilde, to secure a loan which he obtained from them upon the property. At the time he secured this loan he represented to the Wildes that he was the absolute owner of the property, and the court has found that the Wildes had no notice of the real facts and were bona fide incumbrancers for value without notice.

[6] Because of this finding, the Wildes are protected in the decree, and are given a lien for the full amount of their loan with interest, which lien is, by the decree, made superior to the lien of the plaintiff. The Wildes are fully protected to the extent of their interest, and the decree provides for the payment to them of the full amount due them before the plaintiff can enforce his lien upon the property. We cannot see, therefore, how they have any equitable standing here to urge the many technical objections which appear in their brief. And as for the Millers, as found by the trial court, and stated most forcefully by said court in rendering its decision, they have no standing whatever in a court of equity. They never had any rights in the property; they are entitled to nothing; and their conduct, as disclosed by the record, precludes them from receiving any consideration in an action of this kind.

The vendees, J. Conklin, Jr., and Sara Conklin, did not contest plaintiff's claim of lien. They defaulted in the trial court and have not appealed from the judgment. Lorenzo F. Miller, held merely the bare naked title to the property for a specific purpose. He never had any equitable title to the property, and the agreement under which he was given the legal title was for the benefit of the plaintiff, and Miller violated this agreement. The other defendants (A. G. and Mark Wilde), as before stated, have been protected by the decree to the extent of the money advanced by them.

[7, 8] There is one other matter urged by appellants which we shall discuss briefly. Upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff the attorney for Miller and Wilde brought out the fact that the reason the transfer of the legal title to the property had been made by the plaintiff to Conklin before the payment of the full purchase price was that plaintiff, at the time of said transfer, was involved in a lawsuit, and wished to divest himself of title to the property to avoid payment of any judgment that might be obtained against him. Appellants urge that it appears from the evidence that, in pursuance of this design, plaintiff deeded to Conklin the property in controversy, and also another piece of land, and took a note secured by a mortgage upon both parcels of land, as payment therefor. He never intended to, and never did, put this mortgage upon record, and never enforced nor relied upon the same. Appellants urge that this acceptance of the mortgage deprived plaintiff of his vendor's lien. However true this would be as an abstract proposition of law, there are several reasons why appellants' contention is without merit upon the record before us here. First, appellants, under the facts shown here, are not concerned with the motives of plaintiff in deeding his property to Conklin without the full payment of the consideration. They are not his creditors nor his grantees, and have no interest in the property, save and except the interest of Wilde in the sum of $235, which has been fully allowed in the decree. Furthermore, appellants did not plead a waiver of the plaintiff's lien, and the evidence regarding the note and mortgage, relied upon by appellants to establish a waiver, was admitted over the objections of the plaintiff. A lien is presumed to exist and is an incident of the transaction of sale in all cases unless the intention of the vendor that it shall not exist be clearly manifested by his acts or declarations, and the burden of proof is upon the vendee or his successors to show such intention. Finnell v. Finnell, supra; Selna v. Selna, supra. The trial court denied the motion of appellants, made at the close of the trial and argument, to amend their pleadings so as to set up the alleged waiver. In denying this motion, the trial judge stated that the amendment was objected to, and in view of the default of the Conklins, the vendees, and the evidence regarding the interests and equities of the other parties before the court, the allowance of such an amendment would not be in furtherance of justice.

[9, 10] The permitting or refusing of amendments to pleadings is a matter within the sound judicial discretion of the trial court. Cheney v. O'Brien, 69 Cal. 199, 10 Pac. 479; Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. 673; Fitzgerald v. Neustadt, 91 Cal. 600, 27 Pac. 936; Trower v. City and County, 157 Cal. 762, 769, 109 Pac. 617. Amendments are only allowed in furtherance of justice. Section 473, Code Civ. Proc.; Kirby v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 604, 606, 10 Pac. 119.

And this discussion of the equity and justice of the situation presented by the record leads us to a compelling reason for the affirmance of the judgment. It is that an examination of the entire record convinces us that no injustice has been done any of the appealing defendants, and that full and substantial justice has been done between the parties. To reverse this judgment would be to override all of the equities apparent in the record, and to make mere technicalities and obvious subterfuge prevail over right and justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: BRITTAIN, J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

[11, 12] In denying a hearing, we desire to say that we do not agree with any possible intimation, if there be such, in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that the taking by the plaintiff of the unrecorded mortgage was not a waiver of any vendor's lien. But such waiver was not pleaded, and the trial court was justified in refusing the defendants leave to amend for the purpose of pleading it. If such leave had been granted, the only result would have been to show merely that the plaintiff had a mortgage lien instead of a vendor's lien. The final result, in other words, would have been exactly the same.

All concur, except SLOANE, J., absent.

LAKESIDE DITCH CO. et al. v. PACKWOOD DITCH CO. (Civ. 2193.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Dec. 7, 1920.)

1. Corporations 🔑503(3) — Defendant corporation not entitled to absolute right of removal of case to county of residence.

Where a corporation is sued in a county other than wherein it has its place of business and therefore where it "resides," as permitted by Const. art. 12, § 16, subject to change of venue "as in other cases," it has no absolute right to removal to the county of its residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395, 397, providing for trial where defendant resides, and for change to the proper county, but can only secure a removal, "as in other cases," on same ground legally recognized other than that of residence in another county.

2. Venue 🔑68—County in which title shows action to have been brought prima facie proper county.

The presumption is, in the absence of an affirmative showing in that particular, that the county in which the title of the action shows that it is brought is, prima facie, the proper county, where the court in which the action is brought has jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof.

3. Corporations 🔑503(3)—Allegation held to disclose that contract was made in county in which action was commenced.

In action against corporation for its proportionate share of expenses incurred by association of which it was a member, due under a contract to pay proportionate share thereof, allegation of complaint that "said association is located in Tulare county, and does its business therein, and said transactions took place therein," held sufficient, on motion for change of venue, to disclose that the contract sued on was made in such county.

4. Venue 🔑70 — Complaint cannot be challenged for insufficiency of facts by affidavit on motion for change of venue.

The complaint cannot be challenged, on motion for change of venue, either for insufficiency of the facts or insufficiency of the statement of the facts by an affidavit of merits or any affidavit filed in such a proceeding, and may be considered on such motion only in so far as it may throw, or tend to throw, light on the question whether the action should or should not be removed.

5. Corporations 🔑503(3)—Payments to association presumed on motion for change of venue payable at its place of business.

In action on contract of defendant corporation to pay its proportionate share of expenses incurred by association of which it was a member, it will be presumed, under Civ. Code, §§ 1488, 1489, on motion for change of venue, that the payments were to be made at the principal place of business of the association, in the absence of a showing of an agreement to make payments at some other place.

6. Pleading 🔑8(3)—Allegation that transactions took place in county held statement of fact.

Allegation of complaint that "transactions took place" in county in which action was brought held a statement of fact, and not a statement of a legal conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Lakeside Ditch Company and another against the Packwood Ditch Company. From an order denying its motion for change of venue, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Pendleton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Larkins & Bailey and Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, all of Visalia, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Tulare county denying appellant's motion for a change of the place of trial from the county of Tulare, Cal., to the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.

On July 26, 1919, plaintiffs commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Tulare, in which they demanded judgment against the defendant in the sum of $9,054.23, together with attorney's fees and costs. The action is based upon a certain contract between the plaintiff and the defendant and certain other corporations. Within the time allowed by law appellant filed a demurrer to said complaint, and at the same time filed a notice of motion and a demand for a change of the place of trial of said action from the county of Tulare to the city and county of San Francisco. Said motion and demand were supported by an affidavit made by the defendant's president, who therein deposed that the principal place of business of the defendant was, at the time of the commencement of the action, and at all times thereafter, in the city and county of San Francisco, and that deponent, having fully stated the facts of the case to the defendant's attorney, was advised by the latter that defendant has a "good and substantial defense upon the merits of said action," etc. It will be observed that the sole ground upon which the demand for a change of the place of trial of the action was based is that of the residence of the defendant.

The contract is set out in the complaint in hæc verba. It appears that the plaintiffs, the defendant and a number of other corporations owning in severalty certain canals and ditches have been for a long period of time, and were at the time of the commencing this action, "appropriating, diverting, and using water from that certain natural water course known as the St. Johns river, and the branches, continuations, and extensions thereof." All the corporations referred to, including the plaintiffs and the defendant, for the purpose of protecting their respective rights to the water flowing in said river from wrongful interference by other parties and effecting a proper division of said waters between them, entered into said contract. The preamble of said contract declares that "it will be necessary to clean out and improve the channels of each of said streams [the St. Johns river and the Kaweah river, from which the former is supplied], and for such purpose to expend large sums of money," and, furthermore, that "it may become necessary to institute or defend actions at law in the courts for the protection and preservation of the rights of the parties hereto or some of them in and to the waters of said streams." It is then provided in the contract that the parties thereto shall constitute an association composed of one representative and an alternate selected from the stockholders of each of the corporations making and subscribing to the contract to act for and in behalf of said corporations, and that "the representatives so selected shall have the power to fully carry out all the provisions of this agreement," each such representative being vested with full power to bind his principal or principals "in all matters pertaining to this agreement."

The contract, after outlining the method for effecting the permanent organization of the association (designating the officers thereof and the method of their selection), and setting forth in detail the quantity of waters each of the said corporations shall be entitled to use, which is regulated, of course, according to their respective rights as to quantity and priority of appropriation, provides that said association may for and on behalf of the parties to the said contract incur any expense necessary to keep the waters rightfully entitled to flow in the St. John's river flowing therein down to the head of the several ditches of the parties to the agreement, and to cause said waters to be delivered to the respective ditches of said parties, "and to take all steps and incur all necessary expense to enforce and protect the rights of said parties to the waters of said river and to the use thereof, and to commence or defend any action or actions at law for said purpose in their own, joint or several names, or as said association may deem best, which expense the parties hereto agree to pay; provided, that no expense shall be incurred for any action which may arise between any of the parties to this agreement." The twelfth article of the agreement provides as follows:

> "And it is further agreed that each of the parties to this agreement, and each of those who may hereafter unite with them, shall pay and bear such a proportion of the expenses incurred by this association as the number of feet of water to which each is entitled to have turned to him or it, according to the terms of this agreement, bears to the whole number of feet of water to which all are entitled."

The sixteenth article provides:

> "Said association shall hold such special meetings, and at such place or places, as it may determine in its by-laws, but a regular meeting of such association shall be held once each year in the city of Visalia, county of Tulare, and state of California."

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant, through and by one George H. Castle, acting under a duly executed power of attorney from defendant, entered into and became a party to the above-mentioned contract; that, after the said association was formed, it found the channel of the St. John's river in such a condition from obstructions, etc., that it was with difficulty that the waters of said river could be carried to the intakes of the ditches and canals of the parties to the said contract, and that a large amount of work, including the construction of a cement dam, had to be done, and was actually done, to get the waters rightfully flowing in said river to the heads of the ditches of the said parties, including that of the defendant's canal; that the association, to protect its rights, has been compelled to and has, at different times since the formation of said association, brought and defended suits at law in the names of the members of said association, and was compelled to and did expend large sums of money for such purposes; that a suit by the association, in the names of the members thereof, including defendant as one of the plaintiffs therein, was initiated in June, 1916, in the superior court of Tulare county, against the Lindsey-Strathmore Irrigation District to enjoin the latter from further pumping waters rightfully entitled to flow in the St. John's river, which pumping of water by said district wrongfully interfered with the legal right of the members of said association in the waters of said stream; that the defendant knew of the work done above mentioned by the association to facilitate the flow in said river of the waters rightfully belonging to said stream when said work was done, and knew of the suits at law prosecuted and defended by said association for and in behalf of the members thereof when said suits were commenced and were pending and tried, and that defendant acquiesced in and accepted the benefits of the work done and acquiesced in the course of the association in prosecuting and defending the several suits referred to. It is alleged that the aggregate pro rata share, under the terms of said contract, of the defendant for the expenses so incurred by said association is the sum of $9,054.23, for which, as above stated, judgment is prayed. It is further alleged:

> "That said association is located in said county of Tulare and does its business therein, and said transactions took place therein, and said cause of action arose therein."

It is also alleged that within six months prior to the commencement of this action the said association notified the defendant of its share of the expenses incurred as above explained, demanded payment by defendant of said aggregate sum, but that defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay said amount or any part thereof.

[1] The plaintiffs contend that the place of trial of the action is fixed by section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, which reads:

> "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

The position of the defendant is twofold, viz.: (1) That the defendant is, by virtue of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitled to have the case tried in the city and county of San Francisco, which is its principal place of business, and therefore where it "resides," within the meaning of said section; (2) that, conceding that the action may be commenced and tried in any of the counties referred to in section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, other than the county in which the defendant resides, the plaintiffs have not shown by their complaint that the contract upon which recovery is sought was either made or to be performed or that the obligation or liability arising thereon arose or the breach of said contract occurred in Tulare county. Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in all cases other than those specified in the three "preceding sections" the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action, or if it be an action for injury to person, or property, etc. (referring to particular kinds of torts), the action must be tried in the county where the injury occurs or in which the defendants or some of them reside at the commencement of the action. Said section, it is hardly necessary to say, includes all personal actions, save certain other personal actions in some way involving or affecting real property, and which may, in the absence of a better designation, be termed quasi personal. Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern County Land Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 Pac. 120.

The section of the Constitution above quoted herein declares, it will be observed, that a corporation may be sued in any one of several counties, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases—that is, as in the cases mentioned in section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure—to wit: (1) The county where the contract is made; (2) in the county where the contract is to be performed; (3) in the county where the obligation arises or the breach of the contract occurs; (4) in the principal place of business of the corporation.

The present action obviously does not involve or affect in any sense or measure the title to land. It in no way bears any relation to the title to or an interest in land. It is one which, while not strictly so, is in its practical effect for the enforcement of a contract for the payment of money. Hence it is purely and simply a personal or transitory action, and, being such an action, it clearly comes within the class of actions referred to by section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, and is therefore, as to the matter of venue, governed by said section of the organic law. In other words, the plaintiffs had the right to commence the action in the county where the contract was made or where it was to be performed, or where the obligation arose. Lewis v. S. P. C. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 209, 5 Pac. 79; National Bank v. Superior Court, etc., 83 Cal. 491, 24 Pac. 157; Trezevant v. Strong Co., 102 Cal. 47, 36 Pac. 395; Whitney & Co. v. Sellers' Com. Co., 130 Cal. 188, 62 Pac. 472; Miller & Lux v. Kern Co. Land Co., 134 Cal. 586, 66 Pac. 856; Bank of Yolo v. Sperry Flour Co., 141 Cal. 314, 74 Pac. 855, 65 L. R. A. 90; Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern County Land Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 Pac. 120; Cook v. Ray Manufacturing Co., 159 Cal. 694, 115 Pac. 318. And, having the right, under the constitutional provision in question to commence the action against the corporation in the county where the contract sued on was made or performed or the liability of the defendant arose, they have the right to have the action tried or prosecuted to a finality in that county, unless the place of trial is changed for some other sufficient reason than that of the residence of the corporation defendant. Jager v. California Bridge Co., 104 Cal. 542, 38 Pac. 413, and the cases above cited.

Prior to the case of Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 Pac. 120, supra, the cases, of which there are many, in effect uniformly held that section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution applied to any and all actions against corporations. The case of Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 134 Cal. 586, 66 Pac. 856, which involved an action for damages for alleged injury to real property, expressly held that the provisions of the Constitution as to the place of trial applied in that case. Both the plaintiff and the defendant were corporations, and the principal place of business of both was in the city and county of San Francisco. The action was brought in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the defendant's motion to have the place of trial changed to Kern county, wherein the land alleged to have been injured was situated, was denied. The claim was that, under section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that actions for injuries to real property must be tried in the county where the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, the venue of the action was in Kern county. The Supreme Court affirmed the order, and held, substantially, that but for section 16 of article 12 the place of trial of the action would be Kern county, where the land charged to have been injured was situated, but further held that the section of the Constitution "is in the nature of a Code provision in regard to procedure, and is obviously self-executing and differs from a statutory provision only in that it cannot be repealed, nor can its scope and operation be limited by a statute. So far as it conflicts with the statute," continued the court, "the statute must give way." But, in the Grocers' Union Case, supra, the question whether section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, in so far as it might purport to apply to actions affecting the title to or an interest in real property, was in contravention of the inhibition of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it denied to corporations a right, accorded to natural persons, to have an action affecting the title to or an interest in real property tried in the county where such property is situated, was raised for the first time, and it was held in that case, after an exhaustive review of the question, that, since the provisions of a statute in regard to the venue of an action "involve rights in respect to which the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States forbids arbitrary discrimination," section 16 of article 12 of our own Constitution was, to the extent that it purported to apply to actions affecting the title to or interest in land, unjustly discriminatory and violative of the inhibition of said Fourteenth Amendment. That case, however, does not hold that section 16, article 12, does not apply to and govern in the matter of venue in transitory actions against corporations. To the contrary, the opinion, if not expressly, by clear inference, recognizes the validity of that section of the state Constitution in so far as it applies to purely personal actions against corporations; and in the later case of Cook v. Ray Manufacturing Co., supra, the court, in an opinion by the late Chief Justice Beatty, holds that corporations are, as to venue in transitory actions, subject to the provisions of section 16 of article 12, and that, so far as such actions are concerned, that provision of the Constitution is paramount to the Code sections respecting the place of trial thereof. And in that case one of the points directly raised involved a consideration of the question whether "section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution of California, as heretofore construed, is, in its applicaton to transitory actions, such as this, violative of a right secured to our domestic corporations by the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution." The Chief Justice reviewed the Grocers' Union Case, which was cited by the appellant in the Cook Case as in support of an affirmative answer to the question. The learned writer of the opinion, as seen, answered the question negatively, and pointed out in characteristically clear and forceful language the distinction and the reasons supporting the distinction between the Grocers' Union Case and the case then considered by him and decided by the court. After giving the reasons which obviously prompted the incorporation of section 16 into the Constitution, he said, in holding that said provision applied to an action such as the one he was considering in that case:

> "Here it appears that there were at the time our Constitution was adopted weighty considerations justifying the discrimination as to actions arising out of breach of contract. The same conditions which prevailed at that time still continue, though modified to some extent by the fact that other places outside of San Francisco are now the principal places of business of many large corporations formed since the adoption of the Constitution, which, however, may be held to have accepted as one of the conditions of their corporate existence the particular provision of our Constitution here in question. If the views above stated are correct, this case is governed by the principle affirmed in Cincinnati St. Railway Co. v. Snell, 193 U. S. 30 (24 Sup. Ct. 319, 48 L. Ed. 604)—the principle, that is to say, that the Fourteenth Amendment safeguards only fundamental rights, and not the mere form which the state may deem proper for their enforcement. That was a case involving a discrimination made by a statute of the state of Ohio between corporations and natural persons as to the venue of personal actions, and the statute was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States without any dissenting opinion."

It is thus to be seen that the rule in California with respect to the place of trial of transitory actions against corporations is as it is declared in section 16 of article 12 of our state Constitution. The result is that a corporation against which such an action is brought has no absolute right to have the action either commenced or removed to the county in which it has its principal place of business, which is the county of its residence, merely upon that ground or for that reason, but can only secure a removal "as in other cases" or upon some ground, legally recognized, other than the fact that its residence is in a county other than the county in which the action has been commenced. See, also, in addition to the cases above named, Eddy v. Houghton et al., 6 Cal. App. 85, 87, 91 Pac. 397.

[2] It now remains to be seen whether it is sufficiently made to appear that the venue of the present action is in Tulare county. And first we remark as to this proposition that the record furnishes no direct predicate for the conclusion that the venue is not in that county. In other words, there is nothing affirmatively appearing in the complaint that indicates that Tulare county is not the legally proper place for the commencement and trial of the action, unless it be true, as the counsel for the appellant contends, that the fact that the complaint fails directly to aver or show that the contract sued on was either made or was to be performed in said county must be regarded as a sufficient ground or reason for inferring and so holding that the venue is not in the county named. But, as to this latter proposition it is to be said that, in the very logic of the situation, it is groundless. The presumption is, in the absence of an affirmative showing in that particular, that the county in which the title of the action shows that it is brought is, prima facie, the proper county, where the court in which the action is brought has jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof. Chase v. S. P. C. R. Co., 83 Cal. 468, 472, 23 Pac. 532. If, therefore, the only showing of venue in this case was in the title of the action, there would be at least a prima facie showing of venue in Tulare county which would be sufficient to cast the burden upon the defendant to show that the contract was not made nor to be performed, or that the breach thereof by it or its liability by reason of the breach thereof did not occur or arise in said county. This necessarily follows from the proposition, before stated, that a corporation defendant is not entitled as of right, as in cases of transitory actions in which the defendants are natural persons, to have an action against it removed from the county in which it is commenced to the county of its residence, where the action is brought in a county other than that in which its principal place of business is. The defendant here did not undertake to discharge the burden thus resting upon it. It relied merely upon the mere fact that its residence was in the city and county of San Francisco.

[3-5] But we think the complaint itself sufficiently discloses that the contract was made in the county of Tulare. As seen, the contract is set out in full in the complaint. and immediately following are the averments of the facts constituting the gist of the action against the defendant, after which it is alleged, as above shown, that "said association is located in Tulare county and does its business therein; and said transactions took place therein, and said cause of action arose therein." These averments are not denied or controverted in the affidavit of merits filed by defendant or at all. They would undoubtedly be held, under a challenge by a demurrer, to involve an insufficient statement of the facts sought thereby to be stated. for they do not involve a direct statement that the business of the association was at all times done or carried on in Tulare county. In this connection, though, we may remark that the complaint, on a motion for a change of venue, cannot be challenged either for insufficiency of facts or insufficiency of the statement of the facts by an affidavit of merits or any affidavit filed in such a proceeding. That pleading can be considered only in so far as it may throw or tend to throw any light upon the question whether the action should or should not be removed, and, so considering the averments just mentioned, we think that, taken all together, they involve a statement of facts and circumstances sufficient, upon a motion to change the place of trial, to warrant the inference that all the business of the association was, from its organization to the time of the commencement of this action, transacted in Tulare county. From the allegation that the association is "located in Tulare county," it is fairly inferable that its place of business is in that county, and it is naturally to be implied that where a corporation's or an association's place of business is located is where all the business to carry on which it was organized or formed is transacted. Moreover, the contract as set out in the complaint binds the parties thereto to pay their respective proportions of the expenses necessarily to be incurred in carrying out the objects and purposes of the association, and it is to be presumed that these payments were to be made at the principal place of business of the association in the absence of a showing that it was agreed that they should be made at some other place. Civ. Code, §§ 1488, 1489. In Bank of Yolo v. Sperry Flour Co., 141 Cal. 314, 74 Pac. 855, 65 L. R. A. 90, there was no express stipulation or agreement as to where the contract declared upon was to be performed, and the question as to the proper place for the trial of the action was therein submitted for determination. It is not necessary to restate the facts of that case here, it being sufficient to say that the question of venue therein was required to be determined, as thus far we are determining the question here, upon such circumstances as arise from the contract itself, and those under which it was made, considering also the respective residences of the parties. The court said, quoting from the syllabi:

> "In a suit upon the contract of a corporation where no place of performance is expressly stipulated, it ought to be held performable in the place where the circumstances, viewed by the light of pertinent Code provisions, indicate that the parties expected or intended it to be performed."

As we have tried to show, the circumstances in this case, considered in the light of the provisions of the Civil Code last above referred to, clearly indicate, we think, that it was the intention of the parties that the contract involved herein was to be performed in Tulare county.

But a complete reply to the proposition, it seems to us, is in the allegation that "said transactions took place therein"—that is, in Tulare county. The counsel for appellant, however, declares that that allegation involves a legal conclusion, but adds that, if it were necessary to concede that it involves the statement of a fact, it can be of no advantage to the plaintiff, since, as he contends, it refers to "the transactions" conducted by the St. Johns River Association, and does not include the transactions of the appellant.

[6] Conceding that the objection that the averment involves the statement of a legal conclusion is important or material in the consideration of this appeal, we are not reluctant to say that the allegation does not involve the statement of a legal conclusion, but contains the statement of a fact. It is, indeed, much less a legal conclusion, in our opinion, than would be the averment that the contract was made and to be performed in Tulare county, which allegation, although, in a sense, a conclusion of law, would be permissible as involving the statement of an ultimate fact to be proved to warrant an adjudication that the contract was so made and to be performed. What is said in Ellis v. Central Cal. Traction Co., 37 Cal. App. 390, 395, 174 Pac. 407, is in point upon this proposition.

The objection secondly urged against the said averment, to wit, that "the 'transactions' referred to are those conducted by the St. Johns River Association, and does not include the transactions of the appellant," involves, practically, an admission that the complaint sufficiently alleges that all that was done by said association in furtherance of its ends or purposes, as indicated by the contract evidencing its formation, was in Tulare county, and this would include the work it performed, or caused to be performed, to facilitate the flow of waters in the said river to the extent to which they were entitled to flow in said stream, and also the defense and prosecution of suits at law to defend and protect the respective rights of the members of the association, including the defendant, in the waters of said river. Obviously, the admission that said averment constitutes such a statement is tantamount to an admission that the complaint contains the allegation that the contract was made and to be performed, and any obligation or liability arising by reason of its breach by the defendant arose in Tulare county. Nothing further can be said as to the scope and effect of said allegation than what is necessarily involved in the said admission of counsel, but if there might arise in the mind of any one any doubt as to the correctness of our construction of the admission of counsel to the effect that the allegation in question refers to all the transactions of the association, including the making of the contract and the carrying out of its terms by the association, we feel no hesitation in saying that the allegation in question should and is to be construed to refer to all the transactions mentioned in the complaint. The allegation is general, and we can conceive of no sound or just reason for holding that it refers to, or was intended to refer to, particular transactions only as distinguished from all the transactions concerning which the complaint speaks.

Our conclusion is, as must be apparent from the foregoing discussion, that the order of the court below denying the defendant's motion is upon the record as it appears here, entirely justified.

The order is affirmed.

MEIER v. GOLDEN STATE AUTO TOUR CORPORATION. (Civ. 3480.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 7, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 3, 1921.)

1. Death 🔑64—Testimony of invalid mother suing for death of adult daughter as to nature of witness' ailments admissible.

In an invalid's mother's action for death of her daughter under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, testimony of the mother as to the nature of her ailments during the seven years before the daughter's death, during which the latter had taken care of her, was admissible, though the mother was permitted to testify with undue particularity of detail about her various ills.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑47—Motion for nonsuit as to element of damages in action for death properly denied.

In an action by administratrix for death of her daughter, denial at the close of plaintiff's case of defendant's motion for nonsuit as to damages on the part of the daughter's divorced husband was proper; in a negligence case there can be no motion for nonsuit as to a single element of general damages, which is a matter to be corrected by instructions.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Finding on conflicting evidence binding on appellate court.

Where the evidence was conflicting on a point of fact, the appellate court is bound by the determination of the jury, unless they were misled, to appellant's prejudice, by error in the instructions.

4. Carriers 🔑246—Person traveling in autobus presumed to be passenger for hire.

A person traveling in an autobus used for carrying passengers, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, is presumed to be a passenger for hire.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Instruction in action for death of autobus passenger if erroneous held harmless.

In an invalid mother's action for death of her daughter through the negligence of the driver of an autobus on which the daughter was a passenger, in view of the circumstances, if there was error in the instruction that, if the jury reached the conclusion that the daughter was riding on the bus without payment of fare, then she was entitled to demand of the bus company that she be not willfully or recklessly injured, such error did not warrant reversal of judgment for plaintiff mother.

6. Death 🔑104(4)—Instruction that jury could consider pecuniary loss to family not erroneous.

In an action for death, the trial court, after instructing that there could be no recovery for sorrow, did not err in adding, "Yet you have the right to take into consideration the pecuniary loss suffered by the members of the family occasioned by her death, including the loss to them of the comfort, society, and protection of the decedent."

7. Death 🔑104(6)—Instruction on recovery for death of adult daughter injured after interlocutory decree of divorce held sufficient.

In a mother's action for death of her daughter, whose husband had secured interlocutory decree of divorce for desertion, the trial court properly instructed that the existence of such decree did not dissolve the marriage, and did not err in failing to instruct that in the computation of general damages the jury should make no award on behalf of decedent's husband.

8. Death 🔑99(5)—$5,000 not excessive award for death of adult daughter.

Award of $5,000 to plaintiff, an invalid mother, for death of her adult daughter, 23 years old, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Eleanor Meier, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Ione Smith, deceased, against the Golden State Auto Tour Corporation, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondent.

BRITAIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment for $5,000 entered on the verdict of a jury as damages for the death of Mrs. Ione Smith, aged 23 years, as the result of injuries sustained by her while a passenger on an automobile stage, negligently operated by an employee of the appellant in its business as a common carrier of passengers. The action was prosecuted under the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by the mother of Mrs. Smith, in her capacity as administratrix of her daughter's estate with the will annexed.

The appellant admits the character of its business and that its employee in charge of its stage was negligent. The evidence shows beyond cavil that he did not exercise ordinary, nor indeed any, care or diligence to avoid the railroad crossing collision in which he was instantly killed, and Mrs. Smith, the only other person on the stage, received the injuries which shortly thereafter caused her death. The appellant contends that Mrs. Smith was not a passenger for reward, and that under the pleadings there was no right of recovery if its contention in this regard can be sustained. At the time of the accident Mrs. Smith was in good health. She was married, but within a very short time after her marriage she had returned to her mother's home. Her husband had procured an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of desertion, but the statutory period required before final decree could be entered had not elapsed at the time of her death.

Except for the brief interval following her marriage, for a period of seven years Mrs. Smith had cared for her invalid mother, who was suffering from organic disease of the heart, and who had undergone several severe surgical operations, two of them for cancer. Mrs. Smith occupied the sleeping room of her mother, and was frequently called upon to render her attentions at night. She bathed her mother daily, fed her, assisted her in walking, and attended upon her in other ways. She also aided her father, and from her earnings had aided an elder sister to gain a special education so that she might be self-supporting. She had also a younger brother. The plaintiff waived claim of the brother and sister to participate in damages. The value of decedent's estate was a little over $100.

[1] The appellant's first contentions concern claims of error in rulings on evidence. There is a general argument upon the character of the evidence, but, except in three instances, there is no reference to either specific evidence or rulings. While the mother of Mrs. Smith was on the witness stand she was permitted to state, over objection, the nature of her ailments during the seven years her daughter had taken care of her. The appellant argues that the evidence of dependency should have been strictly confined to the condition existing at the time of the injury, but under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure such damages are to be given "as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." Among other circumstances which were proper to be considered were those showing the close, continuous, and unusual care given by Mrs. Smith to her invalid mother, and it was only in connection with the character of the mother's sickness that the circumstances could be shown. It may be conceded that, as against the objections which were made during the examination of Mrs. Meier, she was permitted to testify with undue particularity of detail about her various ills. There was a general objection to a question in which the physician of Mrs. Meier was asked to explain Mrs. Meier's physical condition during the seven years preceding the death of Mrs. Smith, which was properly overruled. Before that, without objection, the witness had testified about an apoplectic stroke prior to a surgical operation about five years before, and that following the operation Mrs. Meier was confined to her bed for fully three years. After the single objection noted above, the witness testified concerning the matters disclosed by the evidence of Mrs. Meier. Under these circumstances the error in overruling objections to her evidence, if there was error, became negligible. From the evidence introduced without objection it appears that Mrs. Smith had been rendering services to her mother such as a nurse would have rendered, and of which her mother was deprived by her death. The family physician was permitted to testify that Mrs. Smith for seven years prior to her death was normal physically, and that after her death her sister was not strong physically, and that her condition incapacitated her from caring for her mother in the proper way. There was no motion to strike out the physician's conclusions, but objections to the questions concerning the health of Mrs. Smith's sister and the effect of her condition upon her ability to render her mother service were overruled, as was an objection to a question concerning the ordinary average charge for practical nurses at Hemet, where Mrs. Meier lived. These were circumstances to be considered in determining what damages would be just.

[2] Special damages were not claimed. At the close of the plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit as to any damages on the part of Mrs. Smith's husband was denied. The ruling was proper. This court knows of no authority to support a motion for nonsuit in a negligence case as to a single element of general damages. That is a matter to be corrected by instructions, and the court's instruction upon this subject in this case is considered with other instructions later in this opinion.

[3] The argument that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence and that the judgment is against law is directed to the relative credibility of the evidence on the part of the plaintiff and defendant concerning whether or not Mrs. Smith became a passenger for hire on the stage which was wrecked. On behalf of the plaintiff was the positive testimony of an agent of the defendant that he sold to Mrs. Smith a ticket for the stage just before he saw her enter it, and on behalf of the defendant negative evidence that the ticket was not found on the body of the driver after his death. There was other evidence on the part of both parties tending to support one or the other side of the issue. There was a conflict in evidence at most, and on appeal this court is bound by the determination of the jury, unless, by error in the instructions, the jury was misled to the prejudice of the defendant.

[4, 5] Instructions on several branches of the case are attacked. Those concerning the defendant's theory that Mrs. Smith was not a passenger, but a trespasser, are first considered. The plaintiff alleged that Mrs. Smith was a passenger for reward. The defendant denied the allegation concerning the payment of fare, denied she was a passenger for reward, and denied she was a passenger. The stagedriver had been instructed not to permit any one to ride without payment of fare. In view of the testimony of the defendant's agent that Mrs. Smith had paid her fare, the theory of the defendant that she was riding free at the invitation of the driver had no support in the evidence. Even though the evidence of the agent could be wholly disregarded, the utmost that could be said of the negative circumstances proved by the defendant is that they might have warranted an inference based upon a suspicion. The court instructed the jury that a person traveling in an autobus used for carrying passengers is, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, presumed to be a passenger for hire. This is a correct statement of law, and, in view of the evidence of the sale of a ticket, did not injure the defendant. By the next instruction the jury was properly told that a common carrier might demand fare either at starting or at any subsequent time. The court had previously instructed the jury upon the duty of carriers of passengers for hire, and had read the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provide for damages in a suit permitted to be brought by the personal representation of a person killed by the wrongful act or negligence of another. By an instruction, numbered 7, the jury was informed "that a carrier of persons without reward must use ordinary care and diligence for their safe carriage," and instruction numbered 8 was as follows:

> "The court instructs the jury, that, if from the evidence you arrive at the conclusion that Ione Smith was, at the time of the accident, riding upon defendant's autobus or stage without payment of fare for such passage, then she was entitled to demand of defendant that she be not willfully or recklessly injured."

It is argued that the giving of these two instructions constituted fatal error, and also that an instruction requested by the defendant should have been given. The requested instruction was to the effect that, unless Mrs. Smith was a passenger for hire, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The only evidence upon the subject of the admitted negligence was that the driver of the stage approached the crossing at a high rate of speed, and without stopping, reducing speed, or apparently giving any attention to the signals of a heavy freight train visible for a considerable distance from the road, ran upon the crossing, where the stage was struck by the locomotive. The impact was such that the heavy iron fixtures and bars on the front of the locomotive were bent in the direction in which the automobile was traveling, thus indicating the force or momentum with which it struck, and hence its high rate of speed. From these facts, which were not disputed, the only possible deduction to be drawn was that the driver of the stage was reckless and did not exercise the ordinary care and diligence required of a carrier of passengers without reward. Civ. Code, § 2096. As has been stated, there was no evidence to support the defendant's theory that Mrs. Smith was a mere trespasser on the stage. Under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure the gravamen of the action was the fact of the death of Mrs. Smith by negligence while she was a passenger, not whether or not she paid her fare. Whether or not she was a gratuitous passenger, or one for reward, was important only in considering the degree of care required by the carrier. When it was shown to have used none, its liability for damages for her death became fixed. Upon application the court would no doubt have permitted an amendment to the complaint by adding the purely formal allegation that Mrs. Smith was a passenger, or by striking out the allegation in regard to her having paid her fare; but this was unnecessary. The defendant undertook to disprove the allegation that Mrs. Smith was a passenger for reward by circumstantial evidence that she had not purchased a ticket, and that she was a mere trespasser at the invitation of the driver of the stage in violation of the defendant's orders. It wholly failed to prove the driver's invitation or violation of its orders, and it made no offer of evidence that Mrs. Smith had knowledge of its orders to the driver. No notices were shown to have been published. The universal custom prevailing in the operation of railroads by which train employees are prohibited from carrying passengers without fare or tickets is such that all are charged with notice of it. The use of automobiles for the carriage of passengers is not yet greatly differentiated from a similar use of wagons and carriages of an earlier period, when the owner himself might be the driver, and either he or his hired driver might upon occasion give a wayfarer "a lift" or even invite a friend to ride with him when his conveyance was not crowded. The reasons of public policy which caused legislation against passes given in return for political services rendered to great railroad corporations have not yet been shown to apply to drivers of auto stages operating for the most part on comparatively short routes and carrying comparatively few passengers. For these reasons the case of Sessions v. Railroad Co., 159 Cal. 599, 114 Pac. 982, and similar cases relied upon by the appellant are clearly differentiable. There was an entire absence of evidence to show that Mrs. Smith collusively agreed with the driver of the stage to defraud the defendant, or had any knowledge of the limitations of his agency in control of the auto stage. So far as the evidence showed, she was rightfully on the car as a passenger, and her personal representative was entitled to damages for her death by the negligence of the carrier's agent. His negligence was of such a character as to support a verdict for damages, even though she was a gratuitous passenger. The evidence that she had paid fare was ample to support the case pleaded by the plaintiff.

[6] Under these circumstances, if there was error in the instructions, it was of such a character as does not warrant a reversal. The contention that, after fully instructing the jury that there could be no recovery for sorrow, the court erred in adding, "Yet you have the right to take into consideration the pecuniary loss suffered by the members of the family occasioned by her death, including the loss to them of the comfort, society and protection of the decedent," is without merit.

[7] So also is the contention that the court should have instructed the jury that in their computation of general damages they should make no award on behalf of the husband of Mrs. Smith. The court properly instructed the jury that the existence of the interlocutory decree of divorce did not dissolve the marriage. The circumstances concerning the marital relationship were before the jury, which no doubt gave proper consideration to them in reaching the amount of general damages awarded not to any particular heir, but to the personal representative of Mrs. Smith's estate. The instructions as a whole correctly stated the law as it applied to the facts disclosed at the trial, and were in no sense misleading.

[8] The verdict is attacked as excessive in amount. The rule that appellate courts should not set aside judgments on this ground, particularly where, as in this case, there has been a motion for new trial, unless the award of damages is so high or so low as to shock the conscience, has been pointed out so frequently and declared so vigorously that it may be accepted as axiomatic. In this case it cannot be said that an award of $5,000, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, was excessive, or large enough to shock the conscience of any reasonable person.

The judgment is affirmed.

LAPIQUE v. PLUMMER et al. (Civ. 3231; L. A. 5755.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 18, 1921.)

1. Evidence 🔑43(1) — Judicial notice taken of court records.

The District Court of Appeal will take judicial notice of its own records.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

2. Pleading 🔑8(11)—Allegation that plaintiff is successor in interest of certain persons held a conclusion.

A complaint, starting out with a statement that plaintiff is the successor in interest, etc., of certain persons, held only a legal conclusion, not showing that plaintiff was a party in interest, although he referred to his "grantors and predecessors," but did not name them in the complaint, nor show in what manner he acquired his title from them.

3. Mortgages 🔑605 — Complaint held not to show compliance with judgment requiring payments on a mortgage.

A complaint in an action to restrain defendants from in any manner interfering with plaintiff's possession of land under a judgment under which plaintiff's predecessor was required to make certain payments held not to show compliance by plaintiff or predecessor with the terms of the judgment with relation to such payments on an instrument therein decreed to be a mortgage.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1180(2) — Reversal of order denying new trial held to vacate judgment.

Where plaintiff appealed from an order denying her motion for a new trial, a judgment of the Supreme Court that "the order appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial" had the effect of vacating and rendered for naught the judgment entered in the court below, notwithstanding a prior affirmance of such judgment, and such judgment could not thenceforth be effective for any purpose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by John Lapique, successor in interest of the estate of Maria Espiritu Chijulla De Leonis and her son, Juan J. Menendez, against Eugene R. Plummer and Maria L. Dunnigan. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

THOMAS, J. This is an appeal on the judgment roll alone from a judgment entered after the sustaining of a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend.

We regret that there is no appearance in this court by respondents.

By the complaint it is alleged that this plaintiff is the successor in interest of one Maria Espiritu Chijulla De Leonis and her son, Juan J. Menendez; that plaintiff's "grantors and predecessors," on March 2, 1895, commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against one Laurent Etchepare, praying for an accounting, for the setting aside of a power of attorney, and for a conveyance of certain described property, and on December 23, 1895, caused attachment to be levied on certain real property, which levy was made and the return of the sheriff thereon filed; that said "attachment is still in full force and effect"; and that thereafter the case was tried and judgment entered, wherein it was adjudged and decreed that the deed executed by the plaintiff to the defendant in that action was executed to secure a present indebtedness and prospective advancements by the latter to the former, and hence, while in form a deed, it was in fact a mortgage, further decreeing that the plaintiff there, upon the payment to the defendant of the sum designated in the judgment, with interest thereon, be entitled to a reconveyance of the said property, free and clear of all incumbrances that may have been placed thereon by said defendant, and also providing that in case said defendant refuse to accept said sum and reconvey said property that plaintiff might make such payment to the clerk of the court, in which case the latter was authorized to make such reconveyance. The date of the entry of this judgment was June 3, 1901.

The complaint next alleges that on June 7, 1901, Etchepare died intestate in Los Angeles county; that thereafter, by proceedings in the superior court, Frank E. Walsh was appointed administrator of the estate of said Etchepare, and in due time qualified as such, letters of administration being issued to him, and that he entered upon his duties as such administrator, continuing as such until his discharge by the court on September 15, 1908; that by reason of the instrument construed and found by the court to be a mortgage, the said Etchepare and, since his decease, Walsh, as administrator of his estate, "have been in possession of the real property described in said action, from the 31st day of July, 1894, down to the 9th day of March, 1917"; that, on October 30, 1901, Walsh, as such administrator, appealed from the judgment referred to, the same being, on September 10, 1903, by the Supreme Court affirmed; and that the judgment of June 3, 1901, thereupon became, and now is, final.

The complaint then sets forth that the defendant Plummer herein "appeared as agent for plaintiff's grantors and predecessors in said action," and that as such he (and others not parties to this action) "failed, refused and neglected to foreclose said mortgage," or to pay said defendant or Walsh, as administrator of said estate, the sum adjudged to be due plaintiff in that action, but, by reason of the possession as already set forth, the said defendant Etchepare, and, since his death, Walsh, the administrator, have collected the rents from the property involved, converting the same to their own use, and that said agent (Plummer) and others are "wholly insolvent and wholly unable to pay" same to this plaintiff; that the said Maria De Leonis "died intestate in Los Angeles county on or about the 10th day of April, 1905, leaving her last will" in favor of her only son and heir, Juan J. Menendez; and that this will "was duly admitted to probate on or about March 10, 1908, and a decree of distribution duly given and made in said estate," which is still in full force and effect. It is further alleged that, with the intent of defrauding this plaintiff, certain persons, not parties to this action, and the defendant Plummer, who is alleged to have been the agent or attorney of Walsh, not a party here, "commenced, prosecuted, and defended * * * a large number of actions, in the matter of the De Leonis estate," in an effort to render ineffectual the judgment of June 3, 1901; that on August 15, 1916, defendant Plummer commenced an action against this plaintiff to quiet title to the land affected by and described in the judgment of June 3, 1901; that this action was tried and judgment entered against the defendant therein, who is plaintiff here; "that under and by virtue of the judgment of June 3, 1901, his (plaintiff's) grantors and predecessors are the owners in fee simple and in possession of said property; that these defendants "threaten" to do various things in reference to the property; and that defendants herein are insolvent. Then follows an allegation of tender by plaintiff of the sum designated in the judgment of June 3, 1901, to the clerk of court, "as provided in said decree," with an averment that defendants herein "are now and have been since June 3, 1901, in the use and occupation of said real property, and tenants in possession, and liable to account to plaintiff for the value of its use and occupation." Finally, appears a prayer that the defendant Plummer be restrained from in any manner "obtaining" a judgment in the action prosecuted by him against this plaintiff; that the defendants in this action be restrained from in "any manner tending to render the attachment [or final decree or judgment] ineffectual," or interfering with plaintiff's "possession"; and that it be decreed that plaintiff is the owner in fee, that he has been in exclusive possession of said property at all times since March 9, 1917, and that he is entitled to the possession and occupancy thereof.

A general demurrer to this complaint was by the court sustained without leave to amend; and in due time the judgment from which this appeal is taken was entered.

In presenting his appeal to this court, appellant has undertaken to lighten our labors with the explanation in his brief that the action was conceived and the complaint filed to accomplish the following ends: (1) To prevent a multiplicity of judicial proceedings; (2) to "prevent" a cloud upon plaintiff's title; (3) to prevent defendants, in the action instituted by Plummer, from rendering the judgment of June 3, 1901, ineffectual and void; and (4) to prevent "collusion." With this "explanation" in mind, we proceed to a consideration of the sufficiency of the complaint.

As some famous or notorious jurist is said to have observed, "the complaint is full of fatal errors, and the only question to be decided is, 'Are there enough?'" One of these fatal errors—apparently immaterial in the mind of the pleader—is that the complaint nowhere shows plaintiff to be a party in interest. It is true he starts out with a statement that he is the successor in interest, etc., of certain persons; but that is a legal conclusion, and is nowhere supported by an allegation of fact. It also is true that plaintiff does refer to his "grantors and predecessors," but they are not named in the complaint, nor is it shown in what manner plaintiff deraigns title from them.

The complaint consists almost entirely of legal conclusions, without any supporting allegations of fact. There is no allegation that the orders contained in the judgment of June 3, 1901, have been complied with. The allegation with respect to this phase of the case shows no payment or tender of the amount named in that judgment to the defendant therein, nor does it set forth any reason or excuse for such tender or attempted payment to the clerk of court in the first instance. Finally, the complaint shows on its face that both parties to this action, as well as their predecessors in interest, "now are and have been since June 3, 1901, in possession," etc., of the property in question. The foregoing, in our opinion, will suffice to support the conclusion that the lower court's ruling in sustaining the demurrer was correct.

Appellant has brought up no bill of exceptions showing that he asked for and was denied leave to amend, or that he proposed any particular amendment to this complaint; nor does he present any argument, were such proper otherwise, even indicating that he could, if given the opportunity, remove any of the defects found in his complaint. Under these conditions, there was no abuse of discretion by the learned trial judge.

[1] In the instant case appellant appears in propria persona, and that he is a perennial litigant is proverbial. We take judicial notice of our own records, and find that the books contain many actions in which he appears, causing us to believe that he is of the opinion, at any rate, that he has a grievance which ought to be corrected. Practically all of these cases were decided against him. In view of these facts we have deemed it best to go into the whole case, notwithstanding the same might have been disposed of in but a few sentences. As we have said in Lapique v. Walsh, 188 Pac. 1021; we repeat here:

> "We are always anxious to get at an appreciative understanding of appellants' troubles, whether real or imaginary; but it must be confessed that in this case we have studied the record on appeal—if such it may be termed—in vain to find any connected legal history of the transactions involved."

Without further discussion, we cite as authority for our conclusion upon all the points here urged the discussion and citation of authorities appearing in the case of Lapique v. Walsh, No. 3232, 195 Pac. 296, this day decided, and hold that the record is entirely insufficient to support any contention, attempted to be raised on this appeal, that the complaint does not state a cause of action against these defendants, or either of them, and that therefore the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WELLER, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2, 3] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, is denied. It is true that, as stated in the opinion of that court, the complaint nowhere shows plaintiff to be a party in interest. It is manifest that his general allegation of ownership contained in paragraph 22 of his complaint is a mere legal conclusion, based solely upon the specific facts previously alleged, and must be treated as such. There is no allegation of fact therein showing that he has acquired the interest of either Maria Espiritu Chijulla De Leonis or her son, Juan J. Menendez. It is also true, as stated in the opinion, that the complaint does not show compliance by the alleged predecessors in interest of plaintiff or the plaintiff himself with the terms of the judgment of the superior court of June 3, 1901, with relation to payment of the amount due on the instrument decreed thereby to be a mortgage.

[4] We deem it proper to make the following statement with regard to this case. The complaint of plaintiff shows fully that all his alleged rights are founded upon this judgment of June 3, 1901, which judgment, upon an appeal therefrom by the defendant, was affirmed by this court on September 10, 1903. De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 73 Pac. 813. The complaint further shows, however, that the plaintiff took an appeal to this court from an order made after judgment, and that a decision thereon was given by this court, which is reported in volume 145 of our reports, at page 200, 78 Pac. at pages 637, 638. Reference to that decision shows that the appeal was one by the plaintiff from an order denying her motion for a new trial in said action, and the judgment of this court, given October 29, 1904, was that "the order appealed from (denying a new trial) is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial." This general order necessarily had the effect of vacating and rendering for naught the judgment of June 3, 1901; and this notwithstanding the prior affirmance of the judgment. See Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 327, 27 Pac. 186; Houser & Haines Mfg. Co. v. Hargrove, 129 Cal. 90, 61 Pac. 660;

People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 82, 112 Pac. 866, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148. It is thus made to appear that the judgment upon which plaintiff founds his whole claim was vacated by the judgment of this court given October 29, 1904, and could not thenceforth be effective for any purpose.

All concur, except LENNON, J., absent.

LAPIQUE v. WALSH et al. (Civ. 3232; L. A. 5756.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 18, 1921.)

1. Tender 🔑22 — Proper tender under judgment decreeing instrument to be mortgage held not alleged.

Where judgment, decreeing an instrument a mortgage, provided for tender of amount due to defendant, but if defendant should refuse to reconvey that such tender be made to the clerk of the court, a complaint, simply alleging that a tender of a certain amount was made to the clerk of the court, was insufficient, where it was not averred that tender had been made to defendant and been refused.

2. Mortgages 🔑605 — Offer to set off judgments held not proper tender of amount due on instrument declared a mortgage.

An offer to offset one judgment against another held not a proper tender under a judgment decreeing an instrument to be a mortgage and providing for a reconveyance to plaintiff on tender of payment of amount owing defendant.

3. Appeal and error 🔑948—Denial of leave to amend on sustaining demurrer assumed to be no abuse of discretion.

On appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered after demurrer by defendant without leave to amend, where appellant has not brought up any bill of exceptions showing that he asked for and was denied leave to amend, or that he proposed any particular amendment to his complaint, and nothing appears in appellant's brief assuming such presentation proper, which might even indicate his ability to remove any defects which might be found in the complaint, it must be assumed that there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in making the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend.

4. Mortgages 🔑213 — Ejectment not maintainable against mortgagee in possession.

Ejectment will not lie by mortgagor or his successors against a mortgagee in possession or his successors.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Pleading 🔑8(11)—Allegation of ownership held conclusion.

Allegations of ownership in complaint in ejectment held based solely on specific allegations of fact set forth and to be mere legal conclusions of the pleader.

6. Mortgages 🔑605 — Complaint held not to show payment on mortgage.

A complaint, in ejectment by one claiming under a judgment declaring an instrument to be a mortgage and requiring payment of amounts due mortgagee, held not to show compliance with the requirement of the judgment of a payment to the defendant of the amount found due on the mortgage, and hence—right of possession.

7. Ejectment 🔑65—Complaint held to sufficiently show, as against general demurrer, making of valid decree of distribution of estate.

A complaint in ejectment held to sufficiently show, as against a general demurrer, the making of a valid decree of distribution of the estate of a decedent to persons under whom plaintiff was claiming.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by John Lapique, successor in interest, etc., against Frank E. Walsh, as administrator of the estate of Laurent Etchepare, deceased, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

THOMAS, J. An appeal on the judgment roll alone from a judgment entered after the sustaining of a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend.

The action appears to be one wherein plaintiff seeks the ejectment of defendants from certain premises, with damages. The complaint shows that on June 3, 1901, judgment was entered in the superior court of Los Angeles county decreeing that a certain purported deed executed by one Miguel De Leonis to one Laurent Etchepare was in fact a mortgage given to secure a then existing debt; that the former, on payment to the latter of the sum of $2,444.09, with interest, was entitled to a reconveyance of the property described in said instrument; and, should said Etchepare refuse to accept such payment and reconvey the property as adjudged, that the clerk of court execute such conveyance accordingly. This judgment, according to the complaint, "has not been reversed, vacated, or set aside, and is now in full force and effect." It next is alleged that, during the pendency of that action—prosecuted by the widow of De Leonis—Etchepare died, being succeeded therein by the defendant here, Walsh, as administrator of Etchepare's estate; that Walsh, as such administrator, thereupon took possession of the real estate in question, as well as the rents, issues, and profits thereof; and that the latter not only "refused, failed, and neglected to collect said mortgage for the sum of $2,444.09, with interest thereon, * * * and refused, failed, and neglected to reconvey" said real property, but also, with others named here as codefendants, "commenced, prosecuted, and defended a large number of actions to render the final decree and judgment [above mentioned] wholly ineffectual, before a conveyance in said action." It also is shown that on September 15, 1908, Walsh, as administrator, moved the probate court, ex parte for his discharge as such administrator which motion was duly granted. The order so made, plaintiff claims, was void, the court having been without jurisdiction to make the same.

On April 10, 1906, Mrs. De Leonis died testate in Los Angeles county, leaving surviving her an only son and heir Juan J. Menendez, who thereupon qualified as executor of her estate. Plaintiff avers that on March 10, 1908, Menendez filed his account as the executor of said estate, whereupon, after hearing, the court distributed to said executor, as heir, the estate of said deceased, "whether described in the decree of distribution or not"; that on March 12, 1912, said Juan J. Menendez conveyed "all his right, title, and interest in and to said plaintiff's estate" to the plaintiff herein, John Lapique, who is now the owner and holder thereof; that on February 28, 1917, this plaintiff delivered to the clerk of said court a certified copy of the decree and judgment first above set forth, together with certified copies of various other judgments, liens, and incumbrances claimed by him to be subsequent and subject to the judgment first referred to, as well as an affidavit showing the amount due from the plaintiff to defendant therein, accompanying the same by a notice to said clerk of court directing and commanding him to reconvey the real property already referred to and fully described in the instrument which was in form a deed, but in fact a mortgage, tendering and offering to pay to said clerk the sum of $5,452.35, the same being "an offset of one judgment against another" for said amount, leaving a deficiency judgment in said action "against the defendant and his administrator" on said date, in favor of plaintiff herein, in the sum of $12,795.89; that said offer and tender were by said clerk peremptorily rejected; that on July 31, 1894, the defendants in that action ousted plaintiff's grantors and predecessors in interest from said real estate, and that ever since the latter have been out of possession thereof by reason of the alleged wrongful and unlawful possession of such defendants. Wherefore plaintiff claims damage for such wrongful withholding and exclusion, for the value of the use and occupancy of the premises in question during all of said time, and for the recovery of possession thereof.

The foregoing recital of events leading up to the commencement of the action now before us constitutes our understanding of the facts herein as gleaned from the record on appeal, and will suffice to disclose at least two fatal errors in the complaint filed herein, the presence whereof afforded the lower court abundant authority for its action in sustaining the general demurrer without leave to amend, viz.: (1) There is no showing in the complaint that the provisions of the judgment of June 3, 1901, have ever been complied with by the plaintiff herein, or by any of his predecessors in interest; (2) there is no showing that a petition for distribution was ever filed in the matter of the estate of Mrs. De Leonis whereon the probate court might legally base a decree distributing her estate to plaintiff's grantor, Juan J. Menendez, a part of, which estate, according to the complaint, is the property involved in this action.

[1, 2] As to the first point: Nowhere in the complaint does there appear an allegation that any tender or payment of any kind was ever made by anyone to the defendant in the action first referred to herein, as provided by the terms of the judgment entered June 3, 1901; and it was only under such circumstances that a tender and payment was authorized to be made to the clerk of the court. Obviously this was an essential averment, failing in which the complaint must be deemed deficient in its statement of a cause of action for possession of the property in controversy. And even though the tender to the clerk, as made by plaintiff, was legal and proper—though we hold it was not—still, attention is called to the fact that the latter attempted a compliance with the judgment in a manner not contemplated or directed thereby—not by the payment of money, as therein provided, but by the alleged "offsetting of one judgment against another."

As to the second point, it is elementary that no decree of distribution could be granted, or distribution of the estate of which Menendez was executor and the only heir ordered, simply upon the filing and hearing of an "executor's account," as appears from the complaint to have been done. The mere suggestion of such a situation eliminates plaintiff as a proper party in interest herein.

[3] Respondents contend, and we think correctly, that appellant has not brought up any bill of exceptions showing, for instance, that he asked for and was denied leave to amend, or that he proposed any particular amendment to his complaint. Nor is there anything presented in appellant's brief—assuming such presentation proper—which might even indicate his ability to remove any defects which might be found in the complaint. It will therefore be assumed, in the absence of such showing, that there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in making the order complained of. Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 669, 74 Pac. 290; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 Pac. 516; Aalwyn v. Cobe, 168 Cal. 165, 142 Pac. 79.

[4] Further, the complaint shows upon its face that plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed. For example, it shows an outstanding mortgage, with the successor in interest of the mortgagee in possession under such mortgage. Under these circumstances ejectment will not lie by the mortgagor or his successors against the mortgagee in possession. Specht v. Specht, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314; Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 462, 27 Pac. 763; Sellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 69, 33 Pac. 786; Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 113, 42 Pac. 473; Cory v. Santa Ynez Land, etc., Co., 151 Cal. 778, 91 Pac. 647; Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 Pac. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844.

We have carefully read and considered the transcript and briefs herein, as well as all the points which, according to our understanding of his exasperatingly ambiguous record, appellant has attempted to raise. Our conclusion is that the complaint does not state a cause of action, that the record is entirely insufficient to support any of the contentions attempted to be made (Lapique v. Walsh, 188 Pac. 1021), and that the order here attempted to be questioned was properly entered.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J., WELLER, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [5, 6] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, is denied. As in the case of Lapique v. Plummer, L. A. 5755, 195 Pac. 293, in which a similar application is this day denied, it is manifest that the general allegations of ownership contained in the complaint are based solely on the specific allegations of fact set forth therein, and must be treated as mere legal conclusions of the pleader. The complaint fails to show right to possession on the part of the plaintiff even under the terms of the judgment of June 3, 1901, on which the plaintiff relies, as in L. A. No. 5755, as the whole basis of his claim, in that it fails to sufficiently show compliance with the requirement as to the payment to the defendant therein of the amount found due on the mortgage, a condition precedent to transfer by the defendant of the property, and, of course, to right of possession in plaintiff's predecessor in interest or in plaintiff. The attempted belated tender of February 28, 1917, to the clerk of the superior court was not such compliance, both for the reasons given in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal and because of the unexplained delay.

[7] We are inclined to the conclusion that the complaint sufficiently showed, as against a general demurrer, the making of a valid decree of distribution of the estate of Mrs. De Leonis to Juan Menendez, and do not concur in the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal on this question, but that conclusion is not essential to the maintenance of the judgment given by that court.

This complaint does not show, as does the complaint in L. A. No. 5755, the granting of the new trial in the action in which the judgment of June 3, 1901, was given, with the consequent vacating of that judgment. For that reason the demurrer must be considered without reference to that fact, and we have so considered it.

All concur, except LENNON, J., absent.

McKAY v. McKAY. (S. F. 8967.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1921. Rehearing Denied Feb. 26, 1921.)

1. Money lent 🔑6—Answer held to sufficiently negative existence of loan.

Where complaint was phrased in language of common count for money loaned and cash advanced for the use and benefit of defendant's decedent, defendant's answer, expressly denying an indebtedness in any sum whatever between the decedent and plaintiff "either on account of any of the matters referred to in plaintiff's complaint or otherwise, or at all," held to sufficiently negative the existence of a loan to the decedent, and hence proof was required on the part of the plaintiff as to the fact of the making of the loan.

2. Evidence 🔑89—Presumption that money paid was due disputable.

The presumption to the effect that money paid by one to another was due to the latter is disputable (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

3. Trial 🔑165—Evidence viewed in light most favorable to plaintiff on motion for nonsuit.

On a motion for nonsuit the evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case and every presumption and inference that may be fairly deduced therefrom must be viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff's case and against the motion for nonsuit.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑221(6)—Evidence held to establish existence of loan by wife to deceased husband.

In an action by wife against husband's estate, evidence held to warrant an inference that plaintiff was not indebted to decedent, and that money received by him was loaned to him, and that he intended to account therefor to her at some later time.

5. Husband and wife 🔑49¾(5)—Husband receiving money from wife held presumptive debtor.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 158, 2219, 2235, the fact of the receipt by the husband of his wife's money presumptively makes him her debtor and imposes upon him the legal duty of returning it to her, and no affirmative proof is required on the part of the wife to show that the husband received the money as a loan, and not as a gift, to the contrary, the burden is upon the husband or his heirs claiming the money to show circumstances entitling him or them to retain the same.

6. Evidence 🔑88—Presumption of want of consideration in transaction with wife, held to prevail over other presumptions.

The presumption that any advantage obtained by a husband from a wife was obtained without consideration and under undue influence must, in the absence of any rebutting evidence, prevail over the presumption that money paid by one to another was due to the latter.

7. Executors and administrators 🔑221(6)—Evidence sufficient to support inference that money lent to decedent was not repaid.

In an action by a wife against estate of husband to recover money lent to husband, where plaintiff established advances and loans to the husband, failure of the decedent's cashbook to disclose a repayment, together with the fact that no receipts for a repayment were found among decedent's effects, held sufficient to compel the denial of a motion for nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff had not established nonpayment of the debt.

8. Executors and administrators 🔑221(1)—Burden on defendant to show repayment of loan from claimant to decedent.

In an action by wife against the estate of her husband to recover money alleged to have been lent to him, the plaintiff having proved advances and loans to the husband, the burden of proving repayment by decedent rested upon defendant.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. McKay against David McKay, as executor of the last will and testament of Angus McKay, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 183 Pac. 574.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff below, appellant here, instituted this action against the executor of the last will and testament of her deceased husband for the sum of $2,400, claimed as a balance due to her for moneys alleged to have been loaned and advanced by her to her husband during his lifetime. The proved facts of plaintiff's case are these: Upon five different occasions between November, 1908, and July, 1914, decedent received from plaintiff, out of her separate property, sums varying in amounts from $400 to $1,000. These facts, because of defendant's objection to any testimony by plaintiff "as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3), were established primarily by documentary evidence. This evidence consisted of plaintiff's bank passbooks which showed certain withdrawals from her bank account, decedent's passbooks showing deposits of identical amounts in his bank account at about the same time as the withdrawals from plaintiff's bank account, and a cashbook kept by decedent containing debit entries of the same sums and date as the deposits. In addition to this evidence, the receipt of said sums by decedent was an admitted fact in the case. Upon this the plaintiff rested.

There being no evidence whatever as to the purpose for which these sums were transferred to decedent and no direct evidence of an indebtedness of either party to the other, the trial court simply applied to the established and admitted facts of the plaintiff's case the presumption "that money paid by one to another was due to the latter." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 7. Therefore, upon defendant's motion, the trial court entered a judgment of nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiff's evidence failed to show that the decedent was indebted to plaintiff at any time in any sum whatsoever, and that, assuming that there was evidence of an indebtedness, the evidence failed to show that it was not paid by the decedent. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The defendant's answer, by merely denying the indebtedness and failing to deny specifically the facts out of which the indebtedness is claimed to have arisen, did not admit the existence of the loan inferentially alleged in the complaint. The complaint is phrased in the language of the common count for money loaned and cash advanced for the use and benefit of said decedent, and therefore, while directly averring an indebtedness, it only indirectly avers the existence of a loan or advance of cash by plaintiff as the origin of said indebtedness. Defendant's answer expressly denies an indebtedness in any sum whatever between the decedent and plaintiff "either on account of any of the matters referred to in plaintiff's complaint or otherwise, or at all," and further expressly denies that "said sum of $2,400, or any other sum, is or ever was due or owing from defendant to plaintiff." In view of the fact that the making of the loan was only alleged by indirection in the complaint, the denials of the answer must be held to sufficiently negative the existence of a loan, and hence proof was required on the part of the plaintiff as to the fact of the making of said loan.

We are of the opinion that the proven and admitted facts of the plaintiff's case, aided by the presumption flowing therefrom, which will be discussed hereafter, establish the existence of the loan to decedent by plaintiff and thereby make out a case for the plaintiff sufficient to overcome the motion for nonsuit.

[2-4] The presumption relied upon by respondent to the effect that "money paid by one to another was due to the latter" is a disputable presumption (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963), and upon a motion for nonsuit the evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case and every presumption and inference that may be fairly deduced therefrom must be viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff's case and against the motion for nonsuit. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252; Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 278, 165 Pac. 946. In this behalf it is apparent that, when considering the motion for nonsuit, certain inferences favorable to the plaintiff and naturally arising from the plaintiff's evidence were ignored by the trial court. Thus decedent's cashbook, admittedly in his own handwriting and offered and received in evidence, contained not the slightest indication of an advance of any considerable sum by decedent to plaintiff, either previous or subsequent to the transfer of the money in question from plaintiff to decedent. In view of the exactness with which decedent's cashbook was shown to have been kept, both by intrinsic evidence and the testimony of respondent, who was fairly familiar with certain business affairs of decedent, and in view of the minuteness of the entries therein, which even included small items of household expense, it may readily and rightfully be inferred that, had plaintiff previously become indebted to decedent for the sums turned over to him by her, the cashbook would have shown the origin of such indebtedness. The evidence also tends to show that plaintiff was in affluent circumstances, possessing considerable cash of her own, and from this fact an inference is fairly deducible that she was not indebted to her husband. Therefore, whatever its weight upon a trial on the merits, the evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case may justifiably be said, when considered in the light most favorable to plaintiff upon and for the purpose of a motion for a nonsuit, to warrant the inference that the plaintiff was not indebted to decedent, that the money received by him was loaned to him, and that he intended to account therefor to her at some later time.

[5] The presumption that "money paid by one to another was due to the latter," relied upon by respondent, cannot control in the presence of the established and admitted facts of the plaintiff's case. Pursuant to the provisions of sections 158, 2219 and 2235 of the Civil Code, transactions between husband and wife are covered and controlled by the rule applicable to transactions between trustees and beneficiaries, which is to the effect that, where the trustee obtains an advantage from the beneficiary, the presumption is that such advantage was secured without consideration and as the result of undue influence. It is the settled rule that the fact of the receipt by the husband of his wife's money presumptively makes him her debtor and imposes upon him the legal duty of returning it to her, and no affirmative proof is required on the part of the wife to show that the husband received the money as a loan, and not as a gift. To the contrary, the burden is upon the husband, or his heirs claiming the money, to show circumstances entitling him, or them, to retain the same. White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 322, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723; Wormley's Estate, 137 Pa. 101, 20 Atl. 621; Stickney v. Stickney, 131 U. S. 227, 9 Sup. Ct. 677, 33 L. Ed. 136.

[6] In the instant case the plaintiff, as the wife of decedent, proved the payment by her to the decedent of considerable sums of her own money. We therefore have before us, as the trial court had, a situation out of which two presumptions operating as evidence might arise, namely, that money paid by one to another was due to the latter, and that any advantage obtained by a husband from a wife was obtained without consideration and under undue influence. It is evident that the latter presumption must, in the absence of any rebutting evidence, prevail over the former, for not only is it the less general of the two, but the very reason for the existence of this particular presumption is to afford relief in just such contingencies as the present, namely, when there has been a transfer of money from the wife to the husband. The result is that the fact of the relationship of the parties creates a presumption of lack of consideration and undue influence which, until it is overcome by other evidence, is paramount to the general presumption, which would arise under ordinary circumstances upon mere proof of payment, to the effect that money is due to the person to whom it is paid. Wilcox v. Wilcox, 171 Cal. 770, 774, 155 Pac. 95. Of course, it is possible that the circumstances accompanying or following a transfer from the wife to the husband might be of such a nature as to overcome this presumption as to undue influence, and thus revive the general presumption as to the purpose of payment specified in subdivision 7 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Pasadena, etc., Bank v. Bryson, 189 Pac. 816. No such circumstances appear, however, in the present case.

It follows, then, that, transfers of money by plaintiff to her husband having been proven and admitted, a prima facie case was made out for the plaintiff. It thereupon devolved upon the representative of decedent's estate to prove that a valuable consideration therefor was given by decedent or that the money in question was a gift to the decedent, free from that undue influence which is otherwise presumed. White v. Warren, supra.

[7, 8] It was contended by counsel for defendant that, assuming the advances and loans had been established and the indebtedness proven, the nonsuit should be granted because of plaintiff's failure to prove the nonpayment of the debt. The failure of the cashbook to disclose a repayment by decedent, together with the fact that no receipts for a repayment were found by defendant among decedent's effects, were sufficient to have compelled the denial of the motion for nonsuit on this ground. Cowdery v. McChesney, 124 Cal. 363, 57 Pac. 221. Moreover, it was unnecessary for plaintiff to prove the allegation of nonpayment. If there had been a repayment by decedent, the burden of proving it rested upon defendant. Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127; Hurley v. Ryan, 137 Cal. 461, 70 Pac. 292; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142.

For the reasons stated, the nonsuit was erroneously granted, and therefore the judgment entered thereon is reversed.

MEYER v. MEYER. (L. A. 6097.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 18, 1921. Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1921.)

1. Divorce 🔑184(10)—Finding as to adultery not disturbed.

The trial court's finding of adultery, where supported by evidence, will not be disturbed.

2. Divorce 🔑184(10)—Finding as to connivance conclusive.

Where the evidence, at most, showed only facts from which a possible inference might be drawn that plaintiff wife planned to bring about the adultery of her husband, the determination of the trial court against such inference was final.

3. Divorce 🔑256—In case of husband's adultery, wife may be allowed a sum made a charge against the community property.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, authorizing the court granting a divorce for adultery to divide the community property as it deems best even to the extent of assigning it all to the innocent party, it was proper for the court, instead of dividing the property, to award to plaintiff wife a sum of money and make its payment a charge upon defendant's property by requiring defendant to give a mortgage upon it for that amount.

4. Divorce 🔑240(5)—$18,000 alimony to wife with seven children assigned from community estate held not excessive.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, contemplating that in cases of divorce for adultery more than half the community property shall be assigned to the innocent party, the exact amount being left to the court's discretion, an allowance of $18,000 to the innocent wife who is given the custody of seven minor children by the marriage held not excessive.

5. Divorce 🔑227(1)—Where motion for attorney's fees is continued, allowance in decree must be based on needs of wife at beginning of action.

Where an application for attorney's fees in divorce was made before trial and continued by consent to the trial, the amount should be based on the wife's needs for attorneys' services at the beginning of the action.

6. Divorce ⚷282—Objection to allowance of attorney's fees should be made in trial court.

An objection to the allowance of attorney's fees should be made to the trial court if it is to be reviewed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Victoria Meyer against Camille Meyer for divorce. Interlocutory decree granted to plaintiff, and from an alimony award of community property, the defendant appeals. Decree affirmed.

Appel & Hatch and D. P. Hatch, all of Los Angeles (Ansel Smith, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff and defendant were wife and husband respectively. The plaintiff obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of the defendant's adultery. As an incident of the divorce, the decree awarded the plaintiff $18,000 as her share of the community property. The defendant appeals.

[1] The defendant's first contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding of adultery. It is unnecessary to detail the evidence. Suffice it to say that its character was such as amply to sustain the finding. The defendant himself admitted conduct on his part of a very questionable character at best, and there was other evidence which, if believed, as it evidently was by the trial court, could hardly leave any doubt as to what took place.

[2] The defendant's second contention is that the plaintiff brought the defendant and alleged co-respondent together for the purpose of having the latter induce the defendant to commit adultery with her. The court found to the contrary, and the evidence, at most, showed only facts from which a possible inference might be drawn that the plaintiff planned to bring about the adultery. The evidence was not such as to require such inference to be drawn, and, this being the situation, the determination of the trial court as to the effect of the evidence is final.

[3] The third point is concerned with the division of the community property. Section 146, Civil Code, authorizes the court which grants a divorce for adultery to divide the community property between the parties in such proportions as it may deem just, even to the extent of assigning it all to the innocent party. In this case it appeared that there was community property in the state of Washington consisting of real estate of the value of $25,000. This real estate was not divided in kind by the decree, nor was its sale and a division of the proceeds directed, but the defendant was directed to pay the plaintiff $18,000, and its payment was made a charge upon the property by requiring the defendant to give a mortgage upon it for that amount. The authority of the court so to charge a lien upon the property is questioned. The language of section 146 mentioned is that upon divorce the community property may be "assigned" to the respective parties in such proportions as the court deems just. It is evident that under this language the court could have assigned to the plaintiff an interest in the community property to the extent of $18,000. This, in effect, is all that it did do by the decree in question. The point furthermore is settled contrary to defendant's contention by the authority of Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 542, 46 Pac. 609, 55 Am. St. Rep. 86. Mayberry v. Whittier, 144 Cal. 322, 78 Pac. 16, cited in his behalf, was concerned with a very different state of facts, and is not in point.

[4] It is also contended by the defendant that the assignment of $18,000 to the plaintiff was excessive. The statute contemplates that in cases of adultery or extreme cruelty more than one-half of the community property shall be assigned to the innocent party· the exact amount even up to all of such property being left to the discretion of the court. We cannot interfere with the exercise of this discretion unless it has been abused, and we see no reason for concluding that it was abused in this case. For one thing, the seven minor children of the marriage, the custody of whom was given to the plaintiff, would by themselves come pretty close to justifying an award of all the community property to the plaintiff if the court had seen fit to make it.

[5, 6] The last contention of the defendant is that the decree is erroneous in allowing the plaintiff $500 for attorney's fees, the point being that no allowance was necessary in order that the plaintiff might further prosecute her case, since the case had practically come to an end. The fee in fact was apparently allowed, not for future legal services, but for services already rendered. The answer to the point is that the allowance was made in response to an application made before trial and continued by consent until the trial. It is not questioned but that the making of an allowance would have been proper when the application was made. This being true, when the application is continued by consent, it is fairly to be taken that it is continued upon the basis of the court making an allowance, if any, as of the time of the making of the application. Furthermore, no objection whatever to the allowance was made in the trial court by the defendant. If he had objection, he should have made it.

Decree affirmed.

ADAMS v. WHITE BUS LINE et al.

(L. A. 6401.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1921.)

1. Judgment 🔑833—Judgment in action for tort assignable.

While a cause of action for a tort is not assignable, such a claim, when merged in a judgment, becomes a debt and may be assigned.

2. Judgment 🔑878(2)—Order of payment and execution of assignment immaterial in determining whether judgment was assigned or satisfied.

The order in which money was paid, where there was a payment of the amount of a judgment and an assignment executed, does not control in determining whether a satisfaction or an assignment of the judgment resulted, if it was one transaction and the intent was to constitute an assignment.

3. Judgment 🔑878(2)—Payment by and assignment to joint tort-feasor gives no right of contribution.

There is no right of contribution between defendants whose concurrent negligence has made them jointly liable in damages, and, where one of several joint wrongdoers pays a judgment obtained against them all, he acquires no right of contribution by taking an assignment of the judgment in the name of a man of straw, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 709.

4. Insurance 🔑606(5)—Insurer of joint tort-feasor not entitled on payment to be subrogated to right of insured.

Where indemnity company for a bus line paid a judgment obtained against the bus line and another arising out of concurrent negligence of the bus line and such other person, it was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the insured against the other defendant.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Mary I. Adams against the White Bus Line and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, Edward E. Kelley, and R. T. Lightfoot, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. In this case the plaintiff, Mary I. Adams, obtained judgment against the defendant White Bus Line, a corporation, and defendant George P. Stiles, jointly, for injuries inflicted by the concurrent negligence of defendants. The defendant White Bus Line carried indemnity insurance with the Western Indemnity Company, an insurance corporation. This company paid the amount of the judgment to plaintiff, and at its request the company, instead of entering satisfaction, assigned this judgment to one Powell, manager of defendant White Bus Line.

After this payment had been made to plaintiff, the defendant Stiles applied to the court in which the judgment was pending for an order directing the entry of satisfaction of said judgment on the ground that the payment by the indemnity company to the plaintiff satisfied the judgment as to both defendants.

This appeal is taken by defendant White Bus Line from the order of the court directing such entry of satisfaction.

In considering this appeal the Western Indemnity company may as well be eliminated as a factor in the case. There was no privity or relation between it and the plaintiff or the defendant Stiles, and its payment to the plaintiff was no more than the act of the insured, the White Bus Line. The insurance company was not entitled to have the judgment kept alive, as it had no recourse against either of the defendants. The status of the parties is the same as if the White Bus Line had itself advanced the amount of the judgment and taken an assignment from plaintiff on its own initiative.

It is apparent from the evidence that the money was paid on account of the White Bus Line, and the assignment was to its manager and for its benefit. It will hardly be claimed that any further recourse could be had under this judgment against the White Bus Line.

The obvious purpose of the assignment was an attempt to keep the judgment alive against the codefendant, Stiles.

[1, 2] If the case were such that contribution could be enforced between the defendants, the transaction might have proved effective as an assignment. While a cause of action for a tort is not assignable, such a claim, when merged in a judgment, becomes a debt and may be assigned. Black on Judgments, vol. 2, § 942; 15 R. C. L. p. 774; Charles v. Haskins, 11 Iowa, 329, 77 Am. Dec. 148; Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 58; Freeman on Judgments, vol. 2, § 425. It was clearly enough the intention of the parties here that the payment should result in an assignment, and not in a satisfaction. The order in which the money was paid and the assignment executed does not control if it was one transaction and the intent was to have it constitute an assignment.

[3] But the generally accepted doctrine is that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors. Although in some jurisdictions an exception has sometimes been made when the act sued on occurred in the exercise of a lawful business and was merely negligent, and not willful or malicious. Ankeny v. Moffett, 37 Minn. 109, 33 N. W. 320; First Nat. Bank v. Avery Planter Co., 69 Neb. 329, 95 N. W. 622, 111 Am. St. Rep. 541. The great weight of authority, however, is against the right of contribution between defendants whose concurrent negligence has made them jointly liable in damages. The rule applicable to this case is stated in Harbeck v. Vanderbilt, 20 N. Y. 395:

> "Where one of several defendants against whom there is a joint judgment pays to the other party the entire sum due, the judgment becomes * * * extinguished, whatever may be the intention of the parties to the transaction. It is not in their power, by any arrangement between them, to keep the judgment on foot for the benefit of the party making the payment. If, therefore, in such a case the latter take an assignment to himself, or, unless under special circumstances, even to a third person for his own benefit, the assignment is void and the judgment satisfied."

Where one of several joint wrongdoers pays a judgment obtained against them all, he acquires no right of contribution by taking an assignment of the judgment in the name of a man of straw. Boyer v. Bolender, 129 Pa. 324, 18 Atl. 127, 15 Am. St. Rep. 723.

It has been sought in this state to avoid this rule on the theory that the provisions of section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure were intended to apply to joint tort-feasors. Such an interpretation of that section was denied in Forsythe v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 569, 87 Pac. 24. Discussing this point, it is said in the opinion by Mr. Justice McFarland:

> "It is beyond doubt the well established * * * rule that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors. Appellant contends that this rule has been changed by section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but we do not think so. That section does not pretend to deal with the matter of the right of contribution between tort-feasors. Its plain intent is to simply provide that, when there is a judgment against two or more defendants who are entitled to contribution from each other and one pays the whole or more than his proportion thereof, 'the person so paying or contributing is entitled to the benefit of the judgment to enforce contribution or repayment. * * *' It certainly cannot be said that the Legislature, while enacting section 709 as a part of the law of procedure, necessarily intended to change, or did change, the fundamental principle that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors."

To the same effect, Dow v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 162 Cal. 136, 121 Pac. 379.

In the case at bar the plaintiff was a passenger upon a stage of the defendant White Bus Line. The injury to plaintiff was caused by a collision between this stage and an automobile driven by the other defendant, Stiles. They were joined in the action as being jointly and severally liable for the accident. They were both found negligent and were held liable for this concurrent negligence. Under this state of facts it is clear that neither could recover in an independent action against the other, as the negligence of each contributed to the damages resulting from the collision.

[4] This lack of an independent cause of action or a right of contribution, of course, also answers appellant's suggestion that the indemnity company, having paid the liability incurred by the White Bus Line, was entitled to be subrogated to its rights as against the other defendant. That question has already been litigated, with the result that, both being negligent, neither has a claim against the other. The plaintiff was entitled to one judgment and one satisfaction, and this she has had, with the result that the judgment was paid and defendant Stiles was entitled to an entry of satisfaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 9528.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1921.)

1. Venue 🔑80—Statute requiring dismissal after change on failure to pay costs within year held mandatory.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 581b, that, where an action was not originally commenced in the proper county but is transferred, the costs and fees of transmission of the pleadings and papers must be paid by plaintiff within one year from the time when pleadings or papers arrive in the custody of the clerk, is mandatory, being addressed not only to the parties but to the court, which loses jurisdiction.

2. Venue 🔑80—Dismissal for failure to pay fees upon change may not be set aside.

Where a court has dismissed a cause after transfer upon change of venue for plaintiff's failure to pay costs thereof within one year, it is not authorized, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to set aside such dismissal because of the neglect of plaintiff's attorney to make such payments, where it clearly appears that the payment was not made within the time.

3. Prohibition 🔑3(5)—May be granted by Supreme Court though right of appeal existed at time of application to district court.

Though an order of the superior court vacating its dismissal of a cause for failure to pay costs on change of venue was appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, as a final order after judgment, so that the district court might for that reason have refused application for prohibition against the vacating order, yet, the superior court being without jurisdiction to make such order or to further proceed, as it proposed to do, and further prosecution of the action being expensive and inexpedient, the Supreme Court, on transfer to it for rehearing, might, in its discretion, grant prohibition.

In Bank.

Application of P. M. Davis for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of Alameda County and A. F. St. Sure, judge thereof, to prevent further proceedings in a pending action. Writ granted.

Frank L. Hain, of Oakland (Richard M. Lyman, Jr., of Oakland, of counsel), for petitioner.

Street & Street, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This cause was begun in the District Court of Appeal of the First district, and after decision by the Second Division of that court its judgment was vacated and the cause transferred to this court for rehearing.

The proceeding is for prohibition to prevent the superior court from further proceeding in an action before it, wherein Angie M. Davis and others were plaintiffs and the petitioner, P. M. Davis, was the defendant. The complaint in that action purported to state a cause of action for the reformation and enforcement of a certain written agreement. In its nature it was a personal action. P. M. Davis, the defendant in the action, was a resident of the county of Alameda. He appeared to the action in the county of Kern and procured an order of that court granting a change of venue to the county of Alameda on the ground that the defendant was a resident of that county and that the county of Alameda was the proper county for the trial of the cause. Thereafter the pleadings and papers in the case were transmitted to the clerk of the superior court of the county of Alameda and were delivered to him on May 22, 1917. The costs of filing the same anew in the county of Alameda were not paid by the plaintiff, or at all, within one year from the time they were received by the clerk as aforesaid, nor until after the making of an order dismissing the action. On October 22, 1919, on motion of the said defendant, petitioner herein, the superior court of the county of Alameda made and entered its order dismissing the said action upon the ground that said plaintiff had not paid the fees for filing the pleadings and papers anew in the superior court of Alameda county, as provided in section 581b of the Code of Civil Procedure. Afterwards, on December 16, 1919, the plaintiff, Angie M. Davis, paid to the clerk the fees for filing the pleadings and papers anew, and thereupon moved the court to vacate and set aside its order dismissing the action, on the ground that the same was made through the mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of said plaintiffs. The superior court granted this motion, made an order setting aside the previous judgment of dismissal, and it subsequently allowed the plaintiffs to file an amended complaint and proposes to proceed with the cause as if there had been no dismissal thereof.

[1] Section 581b, aforesaid, provides as follows:

> "No action heretofore or hereafter commenced, where the same was not originally commenced in the proper county, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore or hereafter commenced must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been transferred, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the costs and fees of transmission of the pleadings and papers therein to the clerk or justice of the court to which it is transferred, or of filing the papers anew, have not been paid by the plaintiff for one year after the time when such pleadings or papers shall have arrived in the custody of such clerk or justice."

It will be observed that this provision is mandatory in its nature and that it is addressed not only to the parties but to the court, declaring that the court must of its own motion dismiss such an action where the costs have not been paid within the year specified. It is exactly the same in this respect as the provision of subdivision 7 of section 581 as amended in 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 398) and now incorporated in section 581a by the act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 712), which provides as follows:

> And "no action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all actions heretofore or hereafter commenced must be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, unless summons shall have issued within one year, and * * * served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action."

The only difference is that the statute of 1889 used the word "shall" in the direction that the court shall dismiss the action upon its own motion or on motion of any party interested, whereas section 581b used the word "must" in that connection. By the statutes of 1907, incorporating the provision in section 581a, the word "must" is substituted for the word "shall" previously used therein. The two sections are therefore in all respects identical, and are to be considered as having the same effect in the cases for which they respectively provide. In the case of Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470, the court had under consideration the effect of subdivision 7 of section 581 in a case where the summons had been issued when the action was commenced but had not been returned or filed within three years thereafter. After quoting the language of the Code aforesaid, the court declared that it was prohibitory and not merely directory; that the courts were required to dismiss actions where the condition of the statute had not been complied with; and that the right of the plaintiff to prosecute the action had been lost by the failure to return and file the summons. In a similar case (Swortfiguer v. White, 141 Cal. 576, 75 Pac. 172) the court says that—

> The "action was practically put an end to, and it was the imperative duty of the court to have dismissed it at the expiration of three years from its commencement; and the substitution of the appellant in place of the former plaintiff in that action, the French bank, over four years after the commencement of the action, and the filing of a so-called amended supplemental complaint thereafter could not revive the former action so as to change the result." 141 Cal. 579, 75 Pac. 173.

In Modoc L. & L. Co. v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 Pac. 848, where the summons was not returned within three years, it was said that—

> "The court is deprived of jurisdiction to take any other action than to dismiss the cause, whether one day or many years elapse before its attention is called to the subject."

White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 Pac. 450, was a proceeding in prohibition in the case aforesaid, entitled Swortfiguer v. White. The application was made on the ground that the summons had not been served or returned within the three years, as required in subdivision 7 of section 581 above quoted. It was held that the court had no power to proceed further in the case and that the writ of prohibition should issue. After saying that the conduct of the petitioner in that case was wholly indefensible, the court said:

> "But it remains true that he is only claiming what the law commands, and his case is no worse than that of any debtor who pleads the statute of limitations against a just demand."

To the proposition that the petitioner had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal, and that therefore prohibition would not lie, the court said:

> "Such remedy by appeal is, perhaps, plain, but can hardly be called speedy or adequate. Petitioner has a present right to the dismissal of the action as against himself * * * and such right cannot be protected or enforced by an appeal from a possible judgment in the action to foreclose."

[2] These authorities govern and settle the present case. Respondent argues that the court had jurisdiction under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to set aside the judgment of dismissal, and that its order to that effect is therefore conclusive, except upon direct appeal. It may be conceded for the sake of the argument that if the judgment of dismissal had been set aside on the ground that, although the fees had been paid in time, it was given by reason of some inadvertence and neglect of the plaintiff whereby she had failed to appear, or, having appeared, had failed or had been prevented from showing facts which would have justified a refusal to give that judgment, and she had, on the motion to vacate it, shown that she had good grounds on the merits for opposing the dismissal, the superior court would have had jurisdiction to vacate the judgment of dismissal, and that the order to vacate it could not be attacked by a proceeding in prohibition.

But that is not the case we have before us. The only answer that could have been made to the application for dismissal in the present case, and the only ground that would have been sufficient to warrant a vacation thereof after such judgment was given, would be that the fees for filing the pleadings and papers had actually been paid within the year allowed by section 581b, or, possibly, that the plaintiff had been prevented from making such payment by some fraud or other conduct of the defendant that would have created an estoppel against him to claim the benefit of the provisions requiring a dismissal. There was no attempt to set forth any such ground. It was admitted that the fees were not paid until after the year had expired. The only showing in regard to the failure to pay them was that the attorney for the plaintiff, who resided at Taft in Kern county, had retained an attorney in Oakland to represent the plaintiff and had sent him the money to pay such fees, and that the Oakland attorney had received the money but had failed to pay the fees therewith, or at all. It was not claimed that the defendant had done anything to induce the failure to pay, or that he was aware thereof, or of any other thing done in the attempt to pay.

It appears therefore, as matter of law, from the facts disclosed by the moving papers, that the fees had not been paid in time. This being the case, it follows, under the plain provisions of section 581b and the principles established by the decisions above cited in regard to the meaning and application thereof, that the superior court had then no power or jurisdiction to entertain the motion or to do anything in the action except to dismiss it. If there had been no judgment of dismissal at that time, the only duty resting upon the court and the only power it had, from the admitted facts, was to enter a judgment of dismissal. And this was a continuing duty and the sole power of the court even after it had made the order vacating the dismissal. Instead of then giving leave to plaintiffs to amend their complaint it should have dismissed the action. It had no power to do anything else. The merits of the action are not material to the question. As has been said, the case is similar in this respect to a statute of limitations. White v. Superior Court, supra.

[3] With regard to the remedy by appeal the facts are that the order vacating the judgment of dismissal was made on January

2, 1920; that it was a special order made after final judgment and was appealable; and that the right of appeal expired on March 2, 1920. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 963, subd. 2. On that day the present proceeding in prohibition was begun in the district court by the filing of the petition upon which that court issued an order to show cause. While the existence of the right of appeal at that time might have been a sufficient reason for that court to have then refused to entertain the petition (Glougie v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 675, 147 Pac. 972) yet, in view of the fact that the superior court was then and ever since has been without power or jurisdiction to proceed further in the action, as we have shown, but nevertheless proposes to do so, and that further proceedings of any kind, except to again dismiss the action, would be void, we are disposed to grant the writ, rather than put the parties to further vexation and useless expense by further attempts to prosecute it. The question is largely one of discretion, and we deem it the better policy to terminate the proceedings forthwith.

Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue forbidding the said superior court or any judge thereof from proceeding further in the action therein above referred to, wherein Angie M. Davis et al. are plaintiffs and P. M. Davis is defendant.

NELSON v. TROUNCE et al. (L. A. 6438.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Statute requiring contractor's bond applies to contract with board of education of San Diego.

St. 1897, p. 201, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1422, requiring the board of education to exact bond from school contractors for benefit of materialmen and laborers, held applicable to the board of education of the city of San Diego, notwithstanding St. 1905, p. 918, Charter of San Diego, art. 7, § 3, providing that the duties and powers of the board of education shall be such as are now or may hereafter be enjoined and conferred on the boards of education in city and school districts by the laws of the state of California, and Pol. Code, § 1617 et seq., prescribing duties of boards of education without requiring execution of such bond.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑81(2)—Filing of claims by materialmen and laborers held sufficient for recovery on contractor's bond.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring mechanic's lien claims to be filed within 90 days after expiration of 30-day period following cessation from labor on the building, is not applicable to the filing of claims of materialmen and laborers under St. 1897, p. 201, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1422, requiring such claims to be filed as a condition to recovery on school building contractor's bond; the filing of claims for material furnished or labor performed for school contractor within 90 days after completion of the contract being sufficient.

3. Trial 🔑388(4)—Finding of fact as to fact admitted in answer not necessary.

Court is not required to make a finding of fact as to fact admitted in the answer.

4. Schools and school districts 🔑85—Board completing contract need not apply to claims of materialmen and laborers difference between contract value of work done and amount theretofore paid contractor.

Where on school contractor's default the board of education completed the contract, and in so doing exhausted the entire balance of the contract price not paid the contractor prior to the default, and with the consent of the contractor's surety paid the subcontractors and materialmen directly, there was nothing due the contractor not paid, and the board was not required to apply the difference between the contract value of the building at the time of its abandonment by the contractor and the amount theretofore paid the contractor to the claims of materialmen and laborers for material furnished to and labor performed for the contractor.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of default judgment to prove materialman's claim held not prejudicial to surety.

Where actions by materialmen and laborers on school contractor's bond were consolidated, the offer in evidence and filing in such action by a materialman required to litigate his claim therein of a default judgment recovered against the surety in another action in support of such materialman's claim held not prejudicial to the surety, where the surety was liable on its bond, and there was no dispute as to the amount due to such materialman.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Olaf Nelson against Harry D. Trounce, the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company, and another, in which the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company and others filed cross-complaints. Judgment for plaintiff and for cross-complainants other than the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company, and the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company appeals. Appeal dismissed as to some of the unnamed cross-complainants, and judgment affirmed as to plaintiff and some of the other unnamed cross-complainants.

Miller, Thornton, Miller & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, Ray M. Harris, Ward, Ward & Ward, J. Weinberger, Hoff & Chatterson, Clifford C. Pease, Wright, Winnek & McKee, Sweet, Stearns & Forward, and Hendee, Rodabaugh & Mark, all of San Diego, and Swanwick & Donnelly and G. E. Delevan, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action was begun by the plaintiff to recover upon a bond given by the defendant Chicago Bonding & Surety Company for the payment of laborers and materialmen upon a contract for the building of Garfield school, executed by the board of education of the San Diego school district as owner with the defendants Harry D. Trounce and William Stoecker, copartners. The defendant bonding company, having been sued in a number of actions by materialmen and laborers, asked that all these actions be consolidated, and that the parties be required to file their claims by way of cross-complaint in this action. The court made such an order, and the various parties filed their cross-complaints, whereon judgments aggregating $12,293 were rendered, from which the bonding company appeals.

The contract price for the erection of the school building was $38,440. The bond in accordance with the statute was for half that amount or $19,220. The bond is in the usual form, recites the giving of the contract and the amount thereof, and in the condition thereof is the following:

> "Now, therefore, if the said principals fail to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, we, the said surety, will pay the same in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in this bond, to wit, the sum of nineteen thousand two hundred twenty dollars ($19,220.00), which said sum is one-half of the contract price of said work, provided that all such claims shall be filed as required by section 2 of an act of Legislature approved March 27, 1897, entitled 'An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics, or laborers employed by contractors upon state, municipal, or other public work,' in pursuance of which enactment, as amended by an act approved May 1, 1911, the foregoing bond is given."

The contractors abandoned the work on the 15th of March, 1915. Worked ceased upon the building for more than 30 days, and thereafter the board of education completed the work; the building being fully completed October 18, 1915. At the time the contractors abandoned the work they had been paid 75 per cent. of the value of the work and labor done, and the building was 48 per cent. completed. The difference between the value of the building estimated according to contract rate and the amount paid to the contractors at the time of its abandonment was $4,612.80.

The appellant raises three points on the appeal: First, that the bond is void for the reason that the law requiring the execution of this bond (Stats. 1897, p. 201, amended 1911, p. 1422) did not, it is claimed, apply to contracts executed by the board of education of the San Diego school district; second, that the claims of the various parties were not filed within time for the reason that the contract was completed within the meaning of the bonding statute 30 days after March 15, 1915, and that all the claims which were filed on the theory that the completion of the building was the time when the 90 days for filing claims began were therefore too late; third, that the amount of the value of the building at the time of its abandonment over and above the amount paid the contractor ($4,612.80) should be applied to the claims.

Was the bond void?

[1] In 1905 the charter of the city of San Diego was amended with reference to the duties and powers of the board of education as follows:

> "The duties and powers of the board of education shall be such as are now, or may hereafter be enjoined and conferred on boards of education in city and school districts by the laws of the state of California." Stats. 1905, p. 918, art. 7, § 3, Charter of San Diego.

Appellant's contention is, in effect, that the powers and duties of trustees of common school districts and of boards of education in city school districts are defined in Political Code, § 1617 et seq., and that the charter by reference incorporates only these provisions of the Political Code therein; that these provisions thus incorporated in the charter do not require a bond, hence, as the giving of such a bond is, it is contended, a municipal affair, the charter provision controls over the general laws under which the bond was given, and, as no bond is required, the bond is void. If this position as to the charter is correct, appellant's position finds some support in the case on which it relies, namely, Loop Lumber Co. v. Van Loben Sels, 173 Cal. 228, 159 Pac. 600. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to point out that the charter does not refer to any particular Code or Code section defining the duties and powers of boards of education, but to the laws of the state of California. That law as contained in the Statutes of 1911, p. 1422, requires boards of education to exact a 50 per cent. bond from contractors for the benefit of materialmen and laborers, and hence by the foregoing provision of the San Diego charter was included therein.

Were the respondents' claims filed in time?

[2] The statute under which the bond was given requires that verified claims be filed with the board of education within 90 days after the "completion of the contract." Appellant points out that the statute does not say the completion of the building or structure. Section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure with reference to mechanics' liens and the filing of claims and stop notices expressly provides that "cessation from labor for 30 days upon any contract or on any building" shall be "deemed equivalent to completion for all the purposes of this chapter." Appellant therefore claims that the school contract was completed April 14, 1915 (that is, 30 days after work ceased on March 15, 1915), and that the claims filed with the board of education were too late, being filed more than 90 days thereafter. But section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, by its express terms is confined to the provisions of the Code with relation to mechanics' liens contained in that chapter of the Code. As the statute under which the bond here involved was given is not contained in that chapter, the words "completion of the contract" should therefore receive their ordinary acceptation. This contract was completed when the building was finished in accordance with its terms on October 18, 1915. Consequently all the claims of the respondents were filed within time.

[3] The appellant in his opening brief calls attention to the fact that there is no finding that cross-complainant T. B. Pennick filed a verified claim within the time provided by law. But it appears that in the answer of cross-defendant, the appellant, the filing of this claim was expressly admitted, and therefore no finding of fact was necessary.

[4] Appellant's third contention is that the sum of $4,612.80, which represents the difference between the contract value of the building at the time of its abandonment by the contractors and the amount theretofore paid the contractor under its terms, should have been applied by the board of education to the claims of the respondents. The board of education completed the contract, and in so doing exhausted the entire balance of the contract price. There was therefore nothing due to the contractor at any time that has not been paid. The course adopted by the board of education in the completion of the contract, namely, the agreement on behalf of the board of education to pay the subcontractors and materialmen directly, was assented to by the appellant. There is nothing in the point made by the appellant.

[5] In addition to the foregoing contentions, which apply to all the claims, appellant specially complains of the judgment in favor of Pacific Sewer Pipe Company. It appears that at the time this action was commenced by Olaf Nelson the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company had brought an action in the superior court in Los Angeles county upon the bond. The order of consolidation in this case secured by the appellant directed that all the persons named by the appellant in its cross-complaint as defendants, including the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company, be required to litigate their claims in this suit, and that such claims and actions be consolidated and joined. In accordance therewith, the respondent Pacific Sewer Pipe Company filed its answer and cross-complaint in this action October 19, 1916, setting up the same cause of action then pending in Los Angeles county. On January 31, 1917, a default judgment was taken in the action in the superior court of Los Angeles county, and that judgment was subsequently offered in evidence in this case in support of the allegations of its supplemental cross-complaint, filed by leave of court January 8, 1918, showing the recovery thereof. The appellant was not prejudiced by this irregular procedure; for, as we have seen, the appellant was liable on its bond for the claim, and there is no dispute as to the amount.

Since the foregoing was written the appellant has filed an application for the dismissal of the appeal as to the respondents T. B. Pennick, W. J. Bailey & Co., Pacific Coast Steel Company, Taylor-Rossman Hardware & Supply Company, Pacific Sewer Pipe Company, Hammond Lumber Company, Julius Brombacher, L. A. Wright, and Los Angeles Denison Block Company.

The appeal is dismissed as to the above-named respondents upon motion of the appellant, and as to the other respondents the judgment is affirmed.

CURTIS v. HOLEE et al. (L. A. 6435.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions ⚷143(6)—Mortgagor's grantee could extend running of limitations by acknowledgment of debt without personally assuming it.

Mortgagor's grantee could extend the running of the period of limitations under Civ. Code, § 2911, and Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, by entering into extension agreement, under section 360, requiring acknowledgment of debt to be in writing, "signed by the party to be charged thereby," in order to toll statute, though grantee did not assume payment of the mortgage debt, since the grantee, owning the land subject to the mortgage lien, was, to a limited extent, charged with the debt and interested in its payment.

2. Limitation of action ⚷148(1)—Acknowledgment of mortgage debt by mortgagor's grantee sufficient to toll statute.

The acknowledgment by mortgagor's grantee of the existence of the mortgage debt in writing with sufficient certainty is sufficient to take the debt out of the operation of the statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 360; an actual promise to pay not being necessary.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

3. Limitation of actions 🔑145(1)—Acknowledgment of mortgage is an acknowledgment of the debt secured.

The acknowledgment of the mortgage is an acknowledgment of the debt secured by the mortgage, with regard to tolling the statute of limitations.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑145(1)—Acknowledgment of debt constitutes acknowledgment of the mortgage securing it.

Acknowledgment of the debt by the mortgagor's grantee with knowledge on his part of the existence of the mortgage constitutes an acknowledgment of the mortgage itself, and takes the mortgage out of the operation of the statute of limitations; for the mortgage is merely an incident of the debt evidenced by the note.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑145(1)—Extension agreement held to toll statute.

Extension agreement entered into by mortgagee and mortgagor's grantee written on back of mortgage note and expressly referring to note held sufficient acknowledgment of existence of mortgage to toll statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, though no mention was made of the mortgage itself, where the note expressly referred to specified that it was secured by mortgage.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Emma F. Curtis against A. D. Holee and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. C. Woods, of Los Angeles, and Simpson & Simpson, of Pasadena, for appellants.

Joseph H. Call and Asa V. Call, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The pleaded facts of the plaintiff's case, briefly stated, are these: The defendant A. D. Holee on June 20, 1912, executed a note, secured by a mortgage on real property, in favor of one M. M. Arthurs, in the sum of $2,500. The mortgage note by its terms was due and payable "on or before three years after date," and the interest thereon, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, was to commence running from July 1, 1912. The mortgage was duly recorded in the county recorder's office of the county wherein the mortgaged property was located. The mortgagor, Holee, conveyed the mortgaged property to one Haymond on or about the 1st of July, 1915, when he was still the owner in fee simple, subject to the mortgage, of the mortgaged property. Haymond made and entered an agreement in writing with M. M. Arthurs, the original and then owner of the said note and mortgage. This agreement, which was written on the back of said note, provided that, in consideration of a raise in the rate of interest, provided for in and by said note, from 6 to 7 per cent. from the date of said agreement, namely, July 1, 1915, the time for the payment of the note was extended to June 20, 1916. At the time of the execution of said agreement of extension, namely, on July 1, 1915, the sum of $75 was paid on account of interest and $500 was paid on account of the principal of said note. Subsequent to the execution of said agreement of extension, on August 16, 1915, the said Haymond conveyed the mortgaged property by grant deed to F. E. Lindblom, which deed, after specifically describing the mortgaged property, expressly stated that it was conveyed "subject to a mortgage to secure a note for $2,500 * * * in favor of M. M. Arthurs, upon which note there has been paid the sum of $500 on the principal," and that "the note was extended for one year from July 1, 1915, and the interest rate raised to 7 per cent. in place of 6 per cent." This deed from Haymond to the Lindbloms was duly acknowledged and recorded in the recorder's office of the county wherein the mortgaged property and the property mentioned in the deed is situated. The Lindbloms thereafter conveyed said property by grant deed, also expressly subject to said mortgage and the extension heretofore mentioned, to one Werner. Werner subsequently conveyed said property by grant deed, also subject to said mortgage and extension, to the appealing defendant herein, Ruth Gold. On October 29, 1917, M. M. Arthurs, the original owner of the note and mortgage, sold and assigned the same to this plaintiff and respondent, which assignment was thereafter duly recorded in the county wherein the property is situated.

This action to foreclose the mortgage as extended was instituted and filed August 29, 1919. Pending the hearing and determination of defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant A. D. Holee entered into a stipulation with the plaintiff that her default might be entered and a judgment might be taken by plaintiff against her upon condition that no deficiency judgment should be entered against her.

Answering the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant Ruth Gold admitted the truth of the allegation that Holee, the mortgagor, did, by grant deed, convey the mortgaged property to Haymond, but, while conceding that all the subsequent conveyances of the property were made subject to the mortgage, affirmatively alleged that it did not appear from the grant deed to Haymond that the conveyance to the latter was made subject to the said mortgage. For lack of information and belief, the answer denied that Haymond and Arthurs agreed in writing at any time or at all that the payment of said note and mortgage should be extended to June 20, 1916. Further answering, the defendant Ruth Gold interposed the defense of the statute of limitations, pleading that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337, subd. 1, and section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also by section 2911 of the Civil Code of the state of California. Upon the issues thus framed, a trial was had and judgment rendered for the plaintiff upon findings made in favor of and in substantial accord with the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint and against the defense of the statute of limitations. From the judgment of foreclosure and sale the defendant Ruth Gold has appealed.

As previously indicated, the question of the liability of the original mortgagor has been eliminated from the case, and the question of the liability of appellant for a deficiency judgment does not arise upon this appeal, for no deficiency judgment was rendered.

It is a stipulated fact in the case that Haymond, as the grantee of the defendant Holee, did not, when taking a conveyance of the mortgaged property, agree to pay the note in suit or assume the mortgage by which it was secured, and, because of this fact, it is insisted, upon behalf of appellant, that the agreement between Haymond and Arthurs, the owner of the mortgage, for an extension of the time within which the note would mature, is insufficient, under the provisions of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as evidence of a continuing contract which would take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. The insufficiency is claimed to result from the fact that Haymond was under no legal obligation in the first instance, or at all, to pay the note or assume the mortgage, and therefore the extension agreement, in so far as it related to him, was not signed by a party to be charged with the original indebtedness. In other words, it is the contention of the appellant that the grantee of a mortgagor who does not assume the mortgage is a stranger to the mortgage debt to whom the provisions of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply, and that therefore the legal life of a mortgage note cannot be continued by the written agreement of such a grantee of the mortgagor.

[1] As previously stated, it is admitted that Haymond did not agree to pay the note and mortgage and never became personally liable thereon, but, since the mortgage was on record at the time of the conveyance of the property to Haymond, the property itself continued subject to the lien of the mortgage after it was acquired by him. While, under such circumstances, the grantee is not personally liable for the debt, nevertheless, in view of the fact that our laws render the land primarily liable for the payment of a mortgage debt (Crisman v. Lanterman, 149 Cal. 647, 87 Pac. 89, 117 Am. St. Rep. 167), the grantee of land subject to a mortgage, as long as he is the owner of the thing which is the fundamental source of satisfaction of the debt, is, to a limited extent, charged with the debt and interested in its payment. For this reason the grantee of the mortgagor who takes subject to a mortgage is not such a stranger to the mortgage or the mortgage debt that he cannot, while he is the owner of the mortgaged property, extend and continue the same as against himself and his successors in interest. Fitzgerald v. Flanagan, 155 Iowa, 217, 135 N. W. 738, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1104. Therefore it is not necessary, in order to take a mortgage out of the operation of the statute of limitations as against the grantee of the mortgagor and his successors, that the grantee who signs the acknowledgment thereof should have personally assumed the payment of the mortgage.

[2-5] We turn, then, to a consideration of the form of acknowledgment in the present case. If the grantee acknowledged the existence of the debt in writing with sufficient certainty, that will suffice to take the debt out of the operation of the statute. Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 218, 41 Pac. 1028; State, etc., Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245, 251, 62 Pac. 466, 600; Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 40. An actual promise to pay is not necessary. Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 346, 71 Pac. 494, 649. When such an acknowledgment is made before the note becomes barred by the statute of limitations as applied to the date originally designated for the payment of the note, it constitutes a continuation of the life of the original obligation beyond the operation of the statute of limitations as applied to the original obligation. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Daniels v. Johnson, 129 Cal. 415, 61 Pac. 1107, 79 Am. St. Rep. 123; Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, 60 Pac. 42. The acknowledgment of the mortgage is an acknowledgment of the debt secured by the mortgage. Foster v. Bowles, supra; Girard, etc., Co. v. Dixon, 89 Neb. 557, 131 N. W. 912. And, conversely, it must be that an acknowledgment of the debt by the mortgagor's grantee, with knowledge on his part of the existence of the mortgage, as admittedly was done by the grantee of the mortgagor in the instant case, constitutes an acknowledgment of the mortgage itself and takes the same out of the operation of the statute of limitations, for the mortgage is merely an incident of the debt evidenced by the note. While the extension agreement in the instant case does not, in so many words, make mention of the mortgage, still that agreement was written upon the back of the mortgage note and made express reference thereto. The note, upon its face, bore the caption, "Note secured by mortgage," and therefore, considered and construed in connection with the note to which it referred, the agreement to extend the time for the payment of the note constituted an unqualified acknowledgment of the mortgage and the debt secured thereby, sufficiently direct and distinct to arrest the running of the statute of limitations.

It was not essential that the plaintiff's complaint should allege, nor the trial court should find, that the conveyance from Holee, the mortgagor, to Haymond, his grantee, was made subject to the mortgage in suit. The complaint alleged that the mortgage was recorded prior to the transfer to Haymond, and, moreover, the execution of the extension agreement, particularly when coupled with the payment of a part of the principal and some of the interest due upon the mortgage note, was a sufficient acknowledgment that the property conveyed was transferred subject to the mortgage. Fitzgerald v. Flanagan, supra; McLane v. Allison, 60 Kan. 441, 56 Pac. 747. It likewise operated to toll the statute of limitations as against the successors in interest of Haymond, all of whom took the mortgaged property expressly and affirmatively subject to the mortgage and to the agreement extending the legal life of the mortgage note.

What we have thus far said in effect adversely disposes of the remaining points presented in support of the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.
